PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 23, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

FOOD PRODUCTION (S. DOC. NO. 11).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the commission's final report on the price of gasoline in the year 1915. The communication and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce without printing.

FOOD PRODUCTION (S. DOC. NO. 11).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant, information relative to the action being taken by the department to induce a larger production of foodstuffs throughout the United States. The communication and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered printed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee in charge of the pending bill has been detained for a few moments, and there are very few Senators here. I suppose the Senate can not do anything until more Senators arrive. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oregon having entered the Chamber, I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We wish to proceed with the unfinished business, Mr. President, and I do suggest the absence of a quorum, because there are some who desire to speak and I do not see them in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Chamber by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are detained on official business in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I propose the following unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on Thursday, April 26, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that at 5 o'clock p. m. on that calendar day will vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 1871 through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day, April 26, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill nor more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator serious in asking the Senate to vote on this bill to-morrow?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I really think we ought to reach a stage in the proceedings where we can agree to a vote on the bill. It has been under consideration since Saturday. We all realize the great importance of the measure. So far as I am advised there are only a few Senators who have indicated a desire to speak on it. There may be more, but those who have advised me that they intend to address the Senate on the subject could easily finish by that time. But I will say to the Senator there may be a great many others who are going to address the Senate who have not indicated any purpose to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator from Oregon will find it to be a fact that there are others who have not indicated to him their purpose, and it strikes me that if we get a vote on the bill by Friday or Saturday we will be doing very well, all things considered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator knows me well enough to know that I never have desired to prevent the full discussion of a measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope that we may be able to reach a time when the bill may be voted upon. I beg that the Senator will suggest a date that would suit him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest a date that will suit me personally. I do not know how it may be with my associates on this side of the chamber or my friends on the other side, but I would suggest to the Senator to make it Saturday in place of Thursday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to do that, if there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to agree to it—as important as the bill seems to be—because the whole preparation for the defense of the country is in the air until Congress acts. Any reasonable date, so that we may know the bill is going to be disposed of soon, will suit me. One o'clock on Saturday would suit me.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I think, could better test the sense of the Senate by changing the date to Saturday. There may be objection to that. I will personally agree to it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator really think it would be better to wait until we see what the developments are to-morrow? By to-morrow we would be in a better position to fix a time. I think it is a little early now to fix a day. The Senator does not know how many desire to speak on the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, my purpose in bringing up the matter at this time was to have some sort of expression from the Senate, to see how Senators felt. I am perfectly willing to let it go over until later in the afternoon and then take up the matter. By that time I hope we may be able to know about how the bill is likely to proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be willing to let it go until to-morrow and take it up then?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We can do that.

Mr. BORAH. I certainly have no desire to delay a vote on the bill, but I think we would make more progress, perhaps, if we would wait until to-morrow to see how the matter runs to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to see that there is no opposition to such a course. So far as I am concerned, I realize fully the importance of this legislation, and I am willing to let the matter go until to-morrow, and I will say to the Senator that I will bring it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may be that the debate will end to-day.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator from Oregon takes his seat I should like to ask him if it would not be worth while before we fix a time—and I am as desirous as anybody to have a time fixed as early as possible—to assure ourselves as to the situation of the House? We might get in such a position that the bills would cross, and we would find ourselves with one bill passed by one House and another bill passed by the other House, which would only lead to complications and delay.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator I do not think there is any danger of that. I have been in consultation with one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and I think that can be avoided.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he means to indicate by that suggestion that the Senate would necessarily share the opinion of the House or whether its action would influence our action at all?

Mr. LODGE. Not the least. It was only the parliamentary situation that I was thinking of; that it would bring more quickly the Houses together, because the bills, I apprehend, will differ somewhat. If the House bill came here, for instance, and we substituted our bill for it and sent it back, that would bring us at once to a conference. If each House passes a separate bill about the same time, we may create some situation that it would take time to arrange.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I desire to say that if it is the purpose of Senators to pass the bill in charge of the Senator from Oregon it seems to me it should be done promptly. All the plans of the Commander in Chief await our action, and the force and effect and propriety of what we are about to do should not be dissipated by protracted debate. I do not believe the Senate is going to change this bill in any essential particular, and I hope the Senator from Oregon, who has charge of the bill, will speed its consideration to an early conclusion. The country, of course, expects the highest wisdom to prevail, without cavil or subterfuge. What the people desire is to be officially informed of our plans.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that legislative situation might be avoided without any difficulty. Senators will remember that when the Army reorganization bill was passed a couple of years ago one was passed by the House and another by the Senate, and we did not get into the impasse that has been suggested. I think there will be no trouble about the legislative situation.

Then, Mr. President, I withdraw the requst for the present, but I will say to the Senate that I shall either later in the afternoon or to-morrow when the Senate convenes propose it again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire if I can——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment just to put in two amendments?

Mr. REED. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must enforce the rule, or it must be repealed—one of the two. A Senator on the floor addressing the Senate is not to be interrupted for the purpose of making any report, introducing resolutions or amendments, and the Chair is required by the rule to enforce it. It can not be violated by unanimous consent. I wish the Committee on Rules would recommend a withdrawal of the rule, because it is violated every hour of every day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, America has been the most positive of all modern nations in asserting the doctrine that a nation must rely for its defense upon the valor and the patriotism of its citizens. We have been foremost in repudiating the idea that a government is best defended by hired men, who make fighting a profession. We have hitherto asserted that free men with arms in their hands could defend the Republic; and until within the last 30 days we have proudly boasted that the manhood of America, without coercion of law or threat of authority, would, if called, rush to the colors and defend them against all enemies. This is the historic doctrine of the Republic. We are now asked to repudiate it.

We have listened for some days to discussion of the bill; we have read in the press many articles largely along one line and seemingly inspired by one purpose. Both in the Senate and outside of the Senate this bill is greatly misunderstood. I have talked with intelligent men outside the Senate and I have talked with Senators who plainly did not understand what is contained within the four corners of this proposed measure. I intend, if the Senate will give me its attention and its patience, to analyze some of the false arguments and notions that have been put forward and to endeavor, if possible, to arrive at a plain statement of what is involved in this measure.

Mr. President, this bill is constantly referred to as a bill for universal service, and arguments in favor of universal service are mustered in favor of the bill. It is not a bill for universal service. It in fact directly affects less than one-half of 1 per cent of the total population of the United States. It does not affect them as a matter of their own volition, but as a matter of coercion. They are not to be selected by reason of any condition in life as citizens by reason of any special qualifications which they may possess, but they are to be subjected to the hazard of the gambler's chance, and are to be called into the service, not because they come voluntarily, not because any special duty is imposed upon them but because the gambling chance has fallen against them.

It is claimed that the military task now set is so great that it is necessary to reverse all our traditional policies in order that it may be accomplished. The fact is that in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, we provided for the entire force to be called out under the pending bill, except the 500,000 conscripts, and under the Volunteer Army bill, which was passed in 1914, we provided for volunteers in case of war. So the only new proposition we have now is to raise by conscription 500,000 men, instead of the raising of those 500,000 men by voluntary service.

Now, mark you, the volunteer-officer bill, passed less than two years ago, was approved by the War Department, and was the product of the War College. The national-defense act, passed less than 11 months ago, was sanctioned by the War College, and was the product of the military authorities. It did not undertake to change the volunteer act of 1914, and therefore in effect affirmed it. So that we are now not only asked to reverse the traditional policies of our country as they have existed from the first—nay, more, the traditional policies of the English-speaking people as they have existed for a thousand years—but we are asked to reverse the recommendations of the War College itself, made less than 11 months ago.

The national-defense act provided for a peace strength and a war strength for the Army and the Navy, and for the organization of a militia force for the various States which might be called into the service in time of war. War was declared on the 5th day of April. On that day the total strength of the Army and Navy was slightly below the maximum peace establishment. Enlistments from that day on have been rapid, so that the Army and Navy have been recruited as follows: From April 5 to April 23 the Regular Army increased from 129,000 to 145,000. Enlistments are now coming in at the rate of 2,000 per day. The total authorized war strength of the Regular Army under the proposed bill is 304,500. The total number yet to be raised in the Regular Army is 159,500. At this rate of 2,000 a day, in 75 days of time the Regular Army will be filled to its full war strength.

The strength of the Navy on April 5 was 64,680. It had been recruited up, on April 23, to 77,422. Its total authorized war strength is 87,500. There were left to be raised on the evening of April 23, according to the reports sent in, only 10,087 men, and they were coming in at from 1,300 to 2,000 per day.

The Marine Corps, on the 5th of April, had a total of 14,100 men. On April 23 it had 17,000. Its total authorized war strength is 17,400. On April 23 it was within 400 of the war strength, and undoubtedly has reached that point now.

How about the militia? The authorized strength of the militia seems to be in dispute. I am unable to get from the War Department any answer that satisfies me. I do not say this in criticism; but, as I read the militia law, as written in the national-defense act, it provided for a militia of 200 for each Representative and Senator, with an increase of 50 per cent on June 3 of the present year, and with a proposition of further increases of 50 per cent each year until the militia reaches 800 for each Representative in Congress. The Militia Bureau states that if the present organization was recruited to peace strength the total that could be raised would be 220,000 men. As a matter of law, however, the States are given the authority to enlist to the number of 800 for each Representative and Senator; and, if that is done, the total number to be raised could, by the action of the States, not of the Government, be brought to 424,800.

Now, what are the facts about the militia? On the 5th day of April it numbered 125,000. I have estimates and figures here to show that, notwithstanding the War Department stopped enlistments, they nevertheless raised the total number approximately at this date to 220,000, or peace strength, while the total authorized strength under the law of the Government is only 159,300. The militia officers in the States, acting under the authority and right of the States, notwithstanding the retarding action of the Federal Government, have gone beyond the legal requirements of the defense act, which provided for 159,300 men, and have to-day approximately 220,000 men enlisted.

Mr. President, those figures are an estimate. I propose to show the Senate how I arrive at that estimate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I sent out telegrams last night to the adjutant general of every State in the Union. I am now receiving replies and shall be glad to turn over the information to the Senator. I think they will bear out the statement he makes as to the militia.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I did not send telegrams to all of them; but I have here now some telegrams that I propose to lay before the Senate. The question I am now discussing is the present situation. Whatever that is, we ought to know it. We will gain nothing by indulging in fancies when it comes to raising armies.

I sent the following telegram to the adjutant generals of the States of Missouri, Ohio, Kansas, Pennsylvania, Nebraska, Iowa, Arkansas, Minnesota, California, Oregon, Texas, Massachusetts, New York, and Mississippi:

Please wire me, collect, immediately, for use in Senate, number of recruits National Guard of your State since declaration of war; how many regiments called into service. Have these regiments been recruited to peace strength? Have you been authorized to recruit to war strength? Can you promptly recruit the guard of your State to war strength? Prompt reply requested.

JAMES A. REED.

I shall read the answers because I want the Senate to know the facts upon which I am acting.

Nevada, Missouri—

This comes not from the adjutant general but from the general commanding in Missouri, a man who was on the Mexican border from first to last during the recent troubles there—

One thousand four hundred and seventy recruits enlisted since declaration of war. The St. Louis and Kansas City regiments, which are the only Missouri troops so far called into Federal service, were promptly recruited to the authorized peace strength of 100 men per company. They have not been authorized to recruit to war strength yet. All Kansas City units, including the Third Regiment, Battery B, the Signal Corps Battalion, and the Ambulance Corps, are all at full peace strength and have a waiting list. We have not yet been authorized to exceed peace strength.

H. C. CLARK.

That is from Missouri.

Now I am going to give you the only discouraging answer I have received:

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Five hundred recruits in Ohio National Guard, Third and Sixth Regiments and First Battalion Signal Corps Engineers and Field Artillery, are now in Federal service. Regiments have not been recruited to peace strength. No authority to recruit to war strength. Can not promptly recruit Ohio Guard to war strength.

WOOD, Adjutant General.

Mr. President, I was born in Ohio and feel a little pride in the State. I undertake to say, knowing the history of Ohioans for gallantry, that the militia can be recruited to war strength; that Ohio does not merit the inglorious distinction of being the only State that can not recruit its guard to war strength. That is not like Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. As the Senator has referred to Ohio, there is not any doubt about the patriotism of the people of that State, and they will do their duty; but I am satisfied that the sentiment of the State is in favor of the conscript plan, and I say that, basing my opinion upon letters and telegrams that I have received from all sections of the State.

Mr. REED. I am not asking whether the sentiment of the State is in favor of the conscript plan. I am asking whether it is necessary to apply conscription in the grand old domain of Ohio in order to get a few men in the Army. I say not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the plan of conscription does not do away with the raising of the National Guard to war strength. In fact, it rather contemplates that it shall be raised; and my information is just as the Senator from Missouri has given—that in every State where it has been pushed they have raised it to full peace strength and are ready to raise it to war strength.

Mr. REED. Now, here comes "Bleeding Kansas;" a better name is "Glorious Kansas."

Recruits since declaration of war, 1,503. No regiments called into service from State. Have not been authorized to recruit to war strength. Many organizations have enrolled additional men to bring them to war strength. Guard can be promptly recruited to war strength. Applications from all parts of State for new organizations. All organizations now peace strength.

MARTIN, Adjutant General.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask the Senator if he means by that to minimum peace strength or to maximum peace strength?

Mr. REED. Maximum peace strength is what I understand is meant. I read my telegram, and I am reading the answers just as I received them.

Mr. WEEKS. I heard the Senator read his telegram, and I do not think he stated whether maximum or minimum peace strength was meant. Very many National Guard organizations were under minimum peace strength when they were called last summer.

Mr. REED. I can answer the Senator from the language of these telegrams. When an adjutant general wires that he is up to peace strength and that he has a waiting list he manifestly must mean that he is up to the maximum peace strength, or he would not have a waiting list; otherwise he would enlist those on the waiting list and bring his organization up to the full strength.

I know these telegrams are a little discouraging to the advocates of military compulsion. I know that it is the old military idea that in order to have a good soldier you must first have a slave, and I am going to try to show that that miserable idea still lingers in some parts of America. The detestation of a volunteer officer and the contempt in which he is held by war authorities is well illustrated down here at the War College.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] just called my attention to an illustration of the truth of the statement I have just made.

Within that magnificent structure, the War College building, are four pedestals on which are to be placed the statues of the four men selected from all countries and times whose memories are best calculated to arouse the ambition and inspire the souls of the Army officers who attend the War College. One of these pedestals is already occupied. It supports the statue of Frederick the Great, of Prussia. The three remaining positions of honor are reserved for Napoleon, for Cæsar, and for Alexander. There was no place for Washington. There was no spot saved for any of those valiant men who rode to death and deathless fame as volunteer officers.

But I proceed with these telegrams:

HARRISBURG, PA.

Telegram received. Returns not in showing recruits enlisted in Pennsylvania National Guard since declaration of war. Four regiments of Infantry now in United States service. All regiments now above minimum peace strength. Have not been authorized to recruit to war strength, but if so authorized can do so promptly, as many organizations have waiting list to bring to war strength.

THOMAS J. STEWART,
Adjutant General.

A telegram from Nebraska:

Approximate number recruits since declaration of war, 518. One regiment called into Federal service. Regiments have been recruited to peace strength. Orders from War Department are to recruit to 100 men per company Infantry. No orders received to recruit to war strength. Can recruit to war strength and, if necessary, furnish additional regiments.

HALL, Adjutant General.

From Des Moines, Iowa:

Recruits, guard, since declaration war, approximately 1,600. One regiment Infantry in Federal service. War Department would not allow this regiment to recruit to peace strength when first called, stating no equipment available. Past few days have authorized recruiting, and they are to-day 103 below peace strength. Organizations not in Federal service. Have 534 above peace strength required by War Department. No authority to recruit to war strength, but could do so in few days, as many organizations have waiting lists more than sufficient to fill to war strength. War Department refuses to allow additional organizations under defense act, while many could now be organized, adequately housed, and efficiently officered if we were permitted to act.

GUY E. LOGAN, Adjutant General.

Well, that sounds like Iowa. She was settled largely by soldiers just after the great war. Her loyalty has never been doubted.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Reference your wire this date, 1,820 recruits obtained since declaration of war. One regiment called into service. Almost recruited to peace strength. Not authorized to recruit to war strength. Can recruit guards promptly to war strength.

ENGLAND, Adjutant General.

Add to my message yesterday that in my opinion plans of administration should be followed.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Reference your telegram 22d instant, approximate strength California National Guard 25th ultimo, 3,624; approximate strength 20th instant, 5,642; increase, 2,018. California Naval Militia same dates, 945, 1,350; increase, 405. Called into Federal service 3 Infantry regiments and 6 companies Coast Artillery National Guard, and 11 deck divisions, 2 engineer divisions, 1 marine company, and 1 aeronautic section Naval Militia. All units approximate minimum peace strength. Recruitment to war strength first authorized, then suspended, and now authorized only to recruit minimum peace strength, Regular Army.

How do you suppose the National Guard is to recruit to war strength when the orders are to recruit only to minimum peace strength?

I continue reading:

Statement issued by War Department that National Guard called for police purposes only is practically cessation of recruiting. Should War Department order all National Guard into active service and issue statement that they are for expeditionary purposes recruitment required can be obtained in 48 hours. At present recruiting for organizations in Federal service permitted only at mobilization camps. This office now successfully recruiting through chamber of commerce at some station of each company not now in Federal service.

BORREE, Adjutant General.

The telegram just read rings with true Americanism. It is the expression of a man who believes that American citizens are yet willing to defend the flag and to vindicate the honor of the Republic. It is the expression of a man who has not yet come to the belief that you must drag American citizens like cravens to the line of duty.

PORTLAND, OREG.

Reference your wire even date, number of recruits received since call approximately 1,970. One regiment of Infantry called and mustered into service at full war strength. Information as to authority on recruitment should be procured from War Department. Reference your last question, remaining units of this State can be recruited to full war strength promptly, as all forces now filled to maximum authorized strength, with large waiting list.

WHITE, Adjutant General.

Now, here is a telegram from the adjutant general of Texas. He evidently thought that he would save the Government or me some money, and he referred me to the war authorities here. He says:

Respectfully suggest that all information requested from all the States is of record in Militia Bureau, Washington.

The adjutant general did me too little honor and the War Department too much. He assumed that I did not have sense enough to go first to the War Department to inquire, and he further assumed that the War Department had the information on hand, which it did not have. So I can not give you any information from Texas.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

One battalion Infantry recruited to maximum peace strength has been called into Federal service. Not authorized to recruit it to war strength. Will have no difficulty in recruiting guard of State to war strength when call is made.

CHRISTIAN, Adjutant General.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will state that I have received telegrams from the adjutant general some two weeks ago insisting upon authority to recruit to full strength the Second Regiment; and unless that authority has been granted in the last two or three days, although it is stated that they have ample numbers on the waiting list to recruit to full strength, they have not been authorized to recruit the Second Regiment.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

BOSTON, MASS.

Response to your telegram 22d instant. Massachusetts National Guard has enlisted 2,407 men in the organizations not called into Federal service since March 24. Three regiments of Infantry have been called by President and are now recruited to peace strength. Authority to recruit entire Massachusetts Guard to war strength requested, but refused. Can recruit entire guard to war strength in three days.

Splendid! I somehow like that doctrine from Massachusetts better than the doctrine of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who has so earnestly declared the country should adopt conscription. The State that makes the road to Lexington and the field of Concord holy ground still has red-blooded men.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Reference your telegram, about 3,000 recruits New York National Guard since declaration of war. Six regiments Infantry and one squadron of Cavalry in Federal service. Not all at maximum peace strength. State authorities have not authority to recruit for organizations in Federal service. War Department has not granted authority to recruit to war strength. Could promptly recruit at this time to war strength if we could get authority from War Department to do so. Withholding of this authority very discouraging and has bad effect on National Guard.

LOUIS W. STOTESBURY,
Adjutant General.

I commend that sentence to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that that last sentence in the telegram from Adj. Gen. Stotesbury, of New York, is no news to the Senator from New York. It could be done very, very shortly.

Mr. REED. Then why is the Senator from New York trembling in his boots lest we can not get 500,000 men in the United States without conscripting them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York is not trembling in his boots with respect to the ability to recruit the National Guard to maximum war strength by the volunteer system which is provided for in the bill now under discussion.

Mr. REED. Well, is the Senator of the opinion that the patriotism of the country will be exhausted when the National Guard has been brought to war strength, or will there still be others ready to join as volunteers under the Volunteer Army bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York does not regard the patriotism of the young men of the country as having been exhausted in the event the National Guard will be filled to maximum war strength nor the Regular Army filled to maximum war strength. The Senator from New York, however, regards it as very doubtful whether an additional 500,000 volunteers can be organized under efficient officers.

Mr. REED. Now, that brings up once more the question of efficient officers, and let us forever and a day put a quietus to it. This whole question has been argued here upon the assertion that you can not have good officers for volunteers. The Volunteer Army bill, which the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] proposes to put into force, provides substantially a method of selecting officers for the Volunteer Army as is provided for selecting officers for the proposed conscript army, except that the number of men taken from the Regular Army to be put into the Volunteers is limited, I think, to four officers to each regiment. But the President makes every appointment of every officer under the Volunteer Army law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In just a moment. If there is danger of getting bad officers for the Volunteers, then the same danger will exist for the conscript army. Now, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely call the Senator's attention to section 7 of the Volunteer Army act of 1914. I think the Senator will find that it is at variance with the statement he has just made.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will say to the Senator the principal difference between the selection of officers in the present bill and the section of the volunteer act of 1914 is that an omission is made in the present bill by which about 11,000 officers who have been selected and registered and passed upon by a board of Army officers under previous volunteer acts are omitted entirely from the present bill, and we have about 11,000 less officers to choose from by that omission. I wish to say that I am going to offer an amendment to the bill which will include those officers as a part of the Army.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator from Tennessee is correct. I am quite sure that section 7 of the volunteer bill reposes practically absolute authority upon the President in the selection of officers. I read:

SEC. 7. That in appointing the volunteer officers authorized by this act the President may select them from the Regular Army, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, from the country at large, from the organized land militia of the District of Columbia, and, upon the recommendation of the various governors——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There you have the variance; it begins right there.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Now, wait a moment—upon the recommendation of the various governors—

But the President is not obliged to take the recommendation of the various governors or anybody else.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator to read the balance.

Mr. REED. Very well; I will read it:

from the organized land militia of the several States and Territories in proportion, as far as practicable, to their respective populations, and as far as compatible with the interests of the military service, from the localities from which the troops with which the officers appointed upon said recommendation are to serve shall have been recruited.

Now, is there a man here who will claim that that does not give the President a free hand to reject any man who is incompetent? What, then, becomes of this miserable pretense that the volunteers must go out badly officered, since the President has as wide authority as the country and the privilege of picking from the entire population of the land, civilian and military? The truth is, this case is being argued on a false issue and has been so argued from the first.

I repeat, and I challenge denial, that under the Volunteer Army act the President of the United States must put the sign manual of his approval on every officer. The charge, therefore, that the Army will be incompetently or inefficiently officered amounts to an assertion that the President of the United States will not do his duty. If you make that with reference to the volunteers, then you have likewise condemned the President as an unfit man to select the officers of the Regular Army. No man will bring that charge against President Wilson.

I have just one more telegram to read:

JACKSON, MISS.

Five hundred and fifty-six men recruited since war resolution. One regiment Infantry in Federal service recruited to peace strength. No authority to recruit to war strength, but authority to recruit to statutory peace strength for Regular Army 100 men per company. The regiment is short 298 men, account no Federal transportation available for recruits. National Guard can be recruited to war strength promptly, provided—

I would like to have the Senator from Mississippi hear this—provided War Department will make definite assignment of character and number of troops desired from State and authorize for recruiting parties and transportation of recruits at Federal expense.

SEALES, Adjutant General.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not hear the first part. Will the Senator let me see it?

Mr. REED. I will send it to the Senator. It simply states the situation.

Mr. President, I have read every telegram I have received. I sent them out indiscriminately; I did not pick particular States for any reason. As the names of the States came into my mind I asked my stenographer to write them down and send the telegrams. Has any Senator here received a report from his State that it can not recruit its National Guard to full war strength? Is there a Senator here who will arise and say that his State is not willing to do its part?

Now, what is the real significance of these telegrams? They say that the War Department has absolutely handicapped the militia officers; that instead of calling upon them to recruit to full war strength, such orders have not been issued, but, on the contrary, recruiting has been actually stopped. Notwithstanding this, according to the best estimates I am able to make, the National Guard actually has been recruited to 220,000, which is over 60,000 in excess of the total number the Federal Government will, on the 3d of June, be authorized to demand from the States under the national-defense act.

The State authorities may, by virtue of their power as State officers and not because of the requirements of the national-defense act, further increase the militia to 424,000. Should this amount be raised—and the adjutant generals whose telegrams I have read are substantially unanimous in the opinion that it can be—then that would furnish a force of 265,000 in excess of what the Government can require; and if this 265,000 is subtracted from 500,000 it is proposed to conscript, there will be left to be raised either as conscripts or volunteers only 235,000 men.

I turn to another proposition. It is said that we can not rely upon volunteers. It is argued by the proponents of this measure that there is something wrong about volunteers. The prevalent opinion seems to be that the only way you can get a good soldier is to take a citizen by the nape of the neck and drag him in. And yet they stand here arguing, and the Secretary of War has been heard to argue, that the present bill does admit volunteering. He says, and the chairman of the committee says, there can be nearly 400,000 volunteers raised in the militia, and therefore the system is not purely a draft, for, say these distinguished gentlemen, you may volunteer if you want to do so.

Now, let us examine that argument and apply a little common sense and reason to it. If 400,000 men can volunteer in the National Guard and are to be accepted in the National Guard, then they are either fit for soldiers or they are not fit for soldiers. If you admit they are fit for soldiers, then you have admitted that the volunteer plan is a good plan, because it gets you 400,000 good soldiers. Of course the guard are not strictly volunteers within the ordinary meaning of that term, but they come voluntarily to the colors, and in that sense they are volunteers.

Now, let us have done with men standing here in one breath arguing that volunteers can not make good soldiers and at the same time saying, "You people ought not to complain because we are going to give you 400,000 volunteers who will not make good soldiers." If they will not make good soldiers, then you have no right to admit them at all. If they will make good soldiers, then you have lost your argument against the volunteer system and your case is ended.

The telegrams I have read anent the recruiting that has been going on in the Regular Army and Navy make it perfectly plain that there will be no difficulty whatever in securing without draft all the recruits required under the present bill.

The total number which the bill provides for is 500,000 conscripts and 160,000 additional men for the Navy and the Army. The National Guard, as I have said, has already gone beyond the legal requirements of the Federal statute, they requiring but 159,000, while the guard, in the face of all that the Government has done to discourage it, is at 220,000.

Remember now that the Regular Army is recruiting at the rate of 2,000 per day. Remember that the Government has been tendered the services of a vast number of voluntary organizations now practically ready to serve in bodies.

In view of these facts, can any man doubt the ability of the Government to secure the troops now desired without resorting to conscription? I affirm that this Government can secure the troops without compulsion. I challenge again any Senator to rise on this floor and say that if the Government calls on his State for his quota of troops it will not produce them. I dare any Senator to stand here and make that statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not think any Senator will make that statement. I do not think that anyone has had it in his mind to make that statement. But I do make the statement that from my own experience in my State the young men who have volunteered in the National Guard are splendid young fellows from the farm, from behind the counter, from the manufacturing enterprises, from the shipbuilding plants, from the machine shops, and the very men who ought not to be permitted even to go into the service.

Mr. REED. Now, that brings up another proposition, to wit, volunteering ought not to be permitted, not because the volunteer will not come in sufficient numbers, not because he will not come willingly, not because he will not serve faithfully and gallantly, but because he is too valuable a man to be taken out and shot. That is the argument. Is that, then, the selective draft? Is that, then, your democratic draft? Is that this blessed plan which you have been telling us falls equally upon all, resting its burden alike on rich and poor, high and low?

Is the reason for selective draft to be that some military man shall go around and say to the wealthy son of a wealthy man, "You have a large fortune to manage; you shall not go, even though willing; we will lay our hand on some poor wretch who has had no advantage in life; he will make good cannon fodder"? Or perhaps the military gentleman, being actuated by the spirit of democracy and equality and fairness, will say to the machinist who has been drafted, "You had an opportunity to learn the trade, and therefore you shall not go; I will look around and find some one who never had a chance, who can only work with his arms, and say to him, 'You have no trade, and therefore it shall be your business to die in defense of the man who has the trade.'" That, sir, is democratic equality of the selective draft.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator once more? The Senator misconstrues the insistence of men who occupy the same position with reference to this question that I do. I belonged to the National Guard for five or six years. I was the captain of a company for a number of years, and I only got out of it in 1892.

Mr. President, the men who were in the company which I commanded were young fellows from the farms out in the country, young clerks, and the class of men I mentioned a while ago. The rich men's sons were not in it, but the young men who were volunteering to serve at that time and to prepare themselves for the defense of their country were the same character of young men who are being prepared now. There were many men in my community who ought to have served, such as bankers' sons. I am not criticizing them; they did not have to serve unless they wanted to do so; but the richer class of men did not go into the National Guard, and the Senator from Missouri knows that just as well as I do. Why should they be exempt?

Mr. REED. The remarks of the Senator are no answer to the inequalities and injustices which will result from the selective draft. They are utterly aside from the question. What has the experience of the Senator with the National Guard to do with the selective draft?

It is claimed that the selective draft is democratic because it will fall on all alike.

A moment's consideration will demonstrate the utter falacy and absurdity of this claim.

First. There are in the United States approximately 104,000,000 people.

No one proposes to apply the military burdens to any but the male population. Hence, the first exemption must be approximately 52,000,000 females.

Second. Of the 52,000,000 males, approximately 32,000.000 are under the age of 19 or over 45, or physically incapacitated.

Hence, there is another absolute exemption of 32,000.000, which, added to the 52,000,000, gives absolute exemption to 84,000,000 of the population.

This leaves liable to military duty approximately 20,000,000.

Third. Of the 20,000,000 of military age, it is proposed to apply the draft to only those between the ages of 19 and 25. Of these there are approximately but 6,000,000.

Hence, it appears that there is completely exempted from even the gambling hazard of the draft 98,000,000 of people.

Fourth. The draft is to be applied to 6,000,000, but here the burden does not fall equally. All must equally take the gambler's hazard, but only 1 in 12 will be drafted.

Fifth. But the inequality does not end here. If you win out in the gamble, if you escape being drawn, if some other man is drawn, that man may be entirely excused either under general rules made by some military board in the name of the President or by the judgment of some military tribunal, and you may find yourself substituted for the man let out.

The board is clothed with absolute power to exempt any man whose release it thinks is "for the national interest." Accordingly, this board having drawn a plumber or machinist or druggist may say his release is "necessary to the national interest" and grab a laborer in his stead; or it may conclude the laborer is "necessary to the national interest" and let him go and grab the farmer, and so on.

Under this scheme you are not given the equal chance of the gambler's hazard, because if you win in this game at the military roulette wheel your winnings are liable to be turned over to the man who stood beside you and lost. Now, that may be necessary, but I am tired, sick, disgusted with the argument that a draft of this kind falls equally on all, and is therefore democratic. Here is the claim that the draft imposes an equal burden upon the population. Expressed in figures the draft falls on 8¼ per cent of the male population between 19 and 25. It falls on one-fortieth of the male population between 18 and 45—the military population. It falls on one two-hundred-and-eighth of the total population. This the advocates of the new-fangled doctrine of military democracy call equality. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I desire to return to one phase of the question that I was discussing. I said I would challenge any man here to rise as the representative of his State and say that the people of his State are such cowards and poltroons that they will not respond to a call for volunteers. I dare any man to say it, in view of the fact that 5,000,000 gallant Englishmen, constituting 11 per cent of the total population of England, volunteered; that 400,000 Canadians volunteered—and I am informed that nearly 40,000 of them are American citizens who have moved over into Canada or who went over there to live—and approximately 400,000 men of Australia and New Zealand.

Now, mark you, England did not adopt the draft until 5,000,000 of her men had volunteered, and when she did adopt it she did it merely to apply to 600,000 men who had proven they were not willing to do their duty.

The Canadians more nearly resemble the people of the United States than those of any other nation on earth. You can cross the Canadian border, and, unless you get into some of the French-speaking Provinces, you can not tell that you have gone from the United States into Canada by your intercourse and talk with the people. These men are almost bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. The war has been very close to Canada, for the Canadian is as loyal to Great Britain as are the sons of Great Britain who were born within the confines of England or of Scotland. The Canadian Government, notwithstanding the great stake and interest that country had, with Germany for three years almost thundering at the gates of the mother country, with her own sons bleeding upon the plains of France and gallantly leading charges until regiment after regiment had been decimated and redecimated, so that there were scarcely enough left to be called the skeleton of a regiment—with all this, Canada has not gone to conscription. I repeat that with all this Canada has not gone to conscription.

Australia had a tremendous stake, and New Zealand had a tremendous stake. They did not go to conscription, and England did not. Although she is in form a monarchy and although her people have been taught loyalty, although they have sucked reverence for the Government in the very milk of their mothers' breasts, although they are a wonderful people to stand by their Government and accept its mandates, England did not go to conscription until 5,000,000 of her people were on the battle line; until, indeed, the majority of her homes were already represented by those who were fighting and dying in defense of England.

We are 3,000 miles away from the scene of conflict, and yet we are told we must come to conscription at once. Let me read you a line or two from Collier's—"The Story of the Great War"—about conscription in England. These articles were prepared by P. F. Collier & Sons with great care. Speaking of the draft, they say:

> The measure only aimed at the 657,160 single men who had failed to attest after patient inducements had been extended to them under the volunteer system. As a conscription measure it was therefore only a whip for recalcitrants, and the fact that the overwhelming majority of men in the trenches, in training, or in the home guards had volunteered without being canvassed, or hectored, or shamed into joining the colors, proves that the voluntary system had only failed in reaching a minority, though the latter had been considerable enough to necessitate legislation. In fact Lord Derby pointed out later that if not a single man to whom the conscription bill applied came forward until he was fetched, the British Army would nevertheless consist of 93 per cent volunteers and 7 per cent conscripts.

Who is holding the line in the north of France? Who is charging the German trenches in the north of France? Who is bearing in triumph the proud flag of England in the north of France? History will answer—the volunteers of England. Who has the right to say, in the face of this testimony, that the United States must go to conscription to raise a paltry half million troops, when men are coming into the Regular Army at the rate of 4,000 a day; and it is well known that men do not ordinarily fancy service in the Regular Army, a fact that is shown by the circumstance that the Regular Army can never recruit up to peace strength in time of peace.

Mr. President, I want the privilege of digressing for just a moment from this particular line of thought to deal in some generalities.

Two hoary miscreants—hereditary autocracy and military caste—have traveled side by side the road of the centuries. Hereditary autocracy asserted that a select few had been divinely appointed to administer the affairs of government, and that all others were incompetent to make or enforce laws. Military caste declared that the State could only be effectively defended by the professional soldier. The first of these heresies was overthrown by the votaries of popular government and expelled from the United States in 1776. It has since been driven from country after country, and to-day it is making a last stand in the capitals of the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs. The second has been repudiated by the chief military powers of Europe. Germany, Austria, and France have all abandoned standing armies of professional soldiers for universal military training, which is only another way of saying that these governments have found that the professional soldier can not withstand the citizen soldier if the latter be properly trained.

In no sense of the word were the armies of France and Germany at the outbreak of the present war composed of professional soldiers. The military establishment embraced all citizens capable of bearing arms. The army in active service was composed of those citizens who at the time happened to be in training. The United States and England, of all the first-class nations, have adhered to the doctrine of the standing army. At the outbreak of the European war they were the most poorly prepared for a great military conflict.

It is proper at this juncture to note that the experience of modern times has clearly demonstrated that the only real defense of a nation must be found in the body of the people. She can not rely upon professional soldiers. She is forced to place her confidence in the mass of her population.

I am not now discussing the question of training or of universal service. The point I seek to emphasize is that in time of war the great military powers have been compelled to abandon the professional soldier and to rely upon all the people. The question of universal military training goes to the utilization of all the powers of the people. The question of draft or conscription applies alone to the method of calling people; but the bald fact remains that the professional soldier has given place to the citizen soldier in the great armies of the world, and no single great nation to-day relies upon anything but the citizen soldier. Voluntary military service and representative government have always been deemed essential to a free people.

Mr. President, it may be entirely out of place to hark back to the Constitution, to go back to tradition, to speak with reverence of the fathers; and yet somehow I can not escape the idea that the great wheel of human experience turns round and round upon the axis of the centuries, and that experiences repeat themselves, and that the wise men of 1776, standing in the fierce light of their experience, reading the pages of the world's history splashed with blood, seeing how chains had been forged and fetters had been riveted for the limbs of the people, understood even better than we can understand where the evils originated, and how they must be met and crushed. And so, sir, certain principles became ingrained in these old patriots, and among those were two of transcendent merit, viz, that voluntary military service and representative government were twins that could not be separated in a free country.

Let me call your attention to some observations of Mr. Greene, the historian:

> The usual statement of our military policy is that we maintain a small Regular Army in time of peace, raise large volunteer forces in time of war, and maintain at all times a "well-regulated militia" in the various States. This policy rests upon certain fundamental principles, namely, distrust of a standing army, reliance upon untrained troops, and dependence upon voluntary service. It is a singular fact that while we have been successful, not only in the general result but in the specific military events, in all our wars except the second war with Great Britain, yet the principles upon which our armies have been raised and organized have been denounced by professional soldiers in every generation—> beginning with Washington, as wasteful, extravagant, inefficient, and wrong.

Says this author—

I deny the statement regarding Washington, and shall answer it from this author's own words. Washington denounced the way we were getting volunteers, but he did not denounce the volunteer system.

Continuing, this author says:

> The policy which we have adopted was not, as Gladstone said of the Constitution, "struck off at one time by the brain and purpose of man," but, on the contrary, is due in part to our geographical situation, but chiefly to racial prejudices which have their roots far back in English history; as far back, indeed, as the very beginning of English—as distinguished from British—history, in the fifth and sixth centuries.
> The Teutonic tribes which then conquered Britain and founded England brought with them two ideas of profound significance—namely, the ideas of representative government and of voluntary military service; these ideas or principles have never been abandoned, but have been maintained, developed, and enlarged during nearly 1,500 years. They are the foundation of English civilization, English government, and English habit of thought. Our ancestors brought them to America in the seventeenth century, at the very time when the Stuart kings were endeavoring to rule without Parliament, to levy taxes without legislative sanction, to create a standing army for the destruction of the liberties and the religion of the English people. These twin principles—representative government and voluntary military service—were the foundation of the State no less in Virginia than in New England, for, while the Puritan looked upon the army as an instrument of oppression, to the Cavalier the words "standing army" meant Cromwell's disciplined troops, who had arrested members of Parliament, stabled their horses in cathedrals, insulted and robbed the nobility and gentry, and murdered the king. To both Cavaliers and Puritans, therefore, as they founded their settlements in America, the name of "standing army" was hateful, with a bitterness and intensity of hatred which we can at this distance hardly appreciate. A hundred years or more later this hatred was, if possible, still further intensified by the acts of an English King and Parliament, who again used a standing army to enforce their law for levying taxes against the will of those taxed. Thus the outbreak of the Revolution found our ancestors, North and South, not only inheriting the hatred of a standing army through generations of their own forbears, but at the instant confronted with a standing army as the instrument of the oppression which they were determined no longer to tolerate. Detestation of the word army was not alone an inherited prejudice, but a vital fundamental principle in the political faith of the day.
> On the other hand, the militia in England antedated the regular army by at least 1,000 years; it was part of the local government, and although derided in Dryden's Witty Verse it was always popular with the great body of the English people. It was essentially the same in the sixta century as in the seventeenth, and again in the nineteenth; its members were by turns fishermen, husbandmen, judges, and warriors; they followed the trade of soldier, not as their chief occupation, but as incidental and subordinate to some other occupation by which they gained food, shelter, and clothing. Their service was voluntary, although—for the ablebodied—the liability to service was universal; they elected their own officers; they were part of the people, and not a class apart.

Mr. President, it would be well for us to give attention to these lessons of history. In Europe they require universal military service. That is bad enough, but they had in connection with it in Germany one other thing. They had a class of professional officers which constituted a military caste; and so, in Germany, the army came to dominate the State. So, in Germany, the citizen was compelled to salute the soldier as he passed him on the street. I saw in a Washington paper a few days ago, as perhaps the first fruitage of this new policy, an article declaring that our citizens should be at least required by custom to salute the uniform as it passed by. In Germany they continued to salute the uniform and salute the military gentlemen in it until at last the military caste, overcoming all else, was able to thrust Germany into this world war, into the vortex of which we have at last been dragged.

And now it is said that as we enter that war the first thing we must do is to abandon a great fundamental principle of Americanism; that we shall refuse to defend our country by volunteers; that we shall lay the heavy hand of authority upon the shoulders of our young men and compel them to come, refusing those who volunteer and dragging in those who for one reason or another do not desire to serve. Mr. President, let us be careful that in overthrowing Prussianism we do not destroy Americanism.

Why should America repudiate the volunteers? In what I am about to say I mean to give no possible offense to that great national with which we are now allies, and yet I can not refrain from referring to the proud traditions that are dear to the heart of every schoolboy of our land.

Confidence in the valor of our people was early planted in the hearts of Americans. The advocates of professional military establishments received their first great shock when on the 9th day of July, 1755, Braddock and his trained soldiers, overwhelmed, routed, and about to be massacred upon the bloody field of Monongahela, were rescued by a 23-year-old Virginia planter and his skin-clad volunteers. Twenty years later, before the same intrepid commander and his band of ragged continentals, the trained soldiers of Great Britain fled at Princeton and the Hessian hirelings broke in disgraceful rout at Trenton. Finally, the professional soldier, Cornwallis, surrendered his army of regulars to Washington and his volunteers at Yorktown.

There was no standing American Army when the guns spoke first at Lexington. There was no standing American Army when the troops froze and starved and suffered at Valley Forge. There was no standing American Army when the proud flag of England came down, never to rise again in this country, save as we lift it as an act of courtesy; and it came down before the volunteer soldiers of the young Republic.

The claim that the volunteer soldier can not defend his country against professionals is repudiated by the story of Bunker Hill, where Warren, the civilian general, poured his heroic blood into the baptismal font of liberty. The claim that men who fight for love of country are not the equal of those who take up arms for hire, or who make soldiery a life profession, is answered by the immortal names of Israel Putnam, Ethan Allen, John Stark, and Nathanael Greene. It was given the lie when Francis Marion rallied the forest chivalry of South Carolina to prodigies of valor. It was destroyed forever when mad Anthony Wayne led the forlorn hope against the fortress of Stony Point.

The whole of the difference between a soldier who makes a profession of arms and the citizen who draws his sword in defense of country is summed up in Wayne's letter to Washington reporting the Battle of Stony Point. I want to read it all. It is the shortest and most glorious letter ever penned by an American commander:

> DEAR GENERAL: The fort and garrison, with Col. Johnston, are ours. Our officers and men behaved like men determined to be free.
> ANTHONY WAYNE.

"Behaved like men determined to be free." Silently, without a whisper, they had crept to the fortress, silently they had advanced to the charge, silently they use the cold steel, and their lips broke forth in sound only when the flag of young America went up, and then these volunteers paused to cheer.

The War of the Revolution was fought and won by volunteers against the trained soldiers of the foremost military nation of earth. The American volunteer fought for home and liberty, and as he stood upon the battle line a vision of empire filled his soul and inspired him to deeds of valor which have never been performed by men fighting for hire.

The War of 1812 is constantly referred to and commented upon. Well, what of the War of 1812? The failures and mistakes of that war were the failures and mistakes of an administration and of a small body of military gentlemen, most of whom had been officers in the great Revolution. The truth is the country was plunged into war without any time for preparation. The truth is that the old generals failed. But wherever there was brought into the Army new blood and a reasonable time allowed for preparation and the forces were approximately equal victory nearly always perched upon our arms.

Upon the sea who gave luster to the American reputation and to American valor? Was it a professional or was it the volunteer Paul Jones? What soldier gave glory to our arms? Was he not a former Member of Congress, a volunteer soldier at the head of volunteers? On the 8th of January we still celebrate the Battle of New Orleans, where Jackson, with 1,500 volunteers, beat back and conquered 15,000 professional soldiers of Europe. And yet some people say that volunteers can not be trusted to defend the country.

Who fought and won the Mexican War? At the beginning of that war the Regular force was only 8,600 men. Not many would volunteer in the Regular Army in time of peace. None of us when we were boys would have joined the Regular Army in time of peace, but if war had been threatened and there had been no other place to go some men in this body would have been gallant enough to have joined. So it is in the country. The Army was only 8,600, but immediately the Army was recruited. Men joining under such circumstances have many of the characteristics of volunteers. The purely volunteer forces, however, aggregated 73,532.

So far as I am aware, no page of history records a single fact indicating that the volunteers did not perform their task as well as the Regulars. The immortal march of Col. Doniphan, the St. Louis lawyer, at the head of 900 volunteers, down the Santa Fe Trail, and his defeat of 4,000 Mexicans is a fitting example of the character of service rendered by the volunteers of the Mexican War.

Sir, who fought the War of the Rebellion? At its beginning there were in the Regular Army only 15,000 men. Let me read you a little about that from Greene, and I am reading from an article by a gentleman who undertakes to justify a change from the present system. I read from page 306:

REGULAR ARMY FROM MEXICAN WAR TO CIVIL WAR.

The close of the war brought the usual reduction—to 10,320; but the Army was soon increased by adding to the number of privates in each company, equivalent for the whole Army, about 4,400, and later by two regiments of Cavalry and two of Infantry, about 4,000 men, carrying the authorized total to 18,349. At no time, however, did the actual strength exceed 15,000. With these exceptions there was no additional legislation until the outbreak of the Civil War.

REGULAR ARMY DURING CIVIL WAR.

Enlistment in the Regular Army was not popular. Its total strength never reached 26,000, or two-thirds of what was authorized, and of these a large number were stationed in the fortifications and on the western frontier. The force available for the field was probably less than 10,000, and most of these served in the "regular division," forming part of the Fifth Army Corps. They formed an inconsiderable part of the great Army by which the war was carried on.

Note the enlistments in the Regular Army were very unpopular during the whole of the war. They could not get above 26,000 Is it not the fact that men do not want to enlist in the Regular Army which has caused the Regular Army officers to-day to recommend a bill by which men will no longer be asked to enlist, but will be drafted in and put under their command? I would not say to-day a thing harsh or unjust of the Regular Army officer, or of the Regular Army. I recognize the fact that we must have a small Regular Army. But I warn the Senate and I warn the country that when it is proposed to build up the Regular Army by forced conscription in a time like this it will be only one step further to fill the Regular Army by conscription in time of peace, and when that transpires in the Republic, one of the great facts that distinguish the free country of America from the autocratically ruled, king-cursed countries of Europe will have largely disappeared. It is foolish to take the step, because there is absolutely no necessity for doing so.

Mr. President, I told you the number of the Regular Army who were in the last great war. On the Federal side the total number of volunteers and militia was 2,762,670. There was that total number of volunteers and militia called for. There actually came 2,778,340, several thousand more than were called for.

In the face of that experience gentlemen pretend to tell us that our country, nearly three times as great in population as it was when the War of the Rebellion began, can not raise for its defense an army of 500,000 without resorting to conscription. The most hateful word in the English language is "conscript."

Mr. President, we had only a little over 2 per cent of conscripts in the Civil War. Let us see how it worked at that time. Gen. Miles said:

As far as conscription was concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War with unsatisfactory results. I think there were 54,000 men added to the Army—54,000 additional to the 2,000,000 men—by conscription; but I know that just at the time of the crisis of the Gettysburg campaign thousands of the best troops, drilled and disciplined men in the Army, had to be taken out of the field and sent back to suppress the riots occasioned by that unpopular measure. Approximately 10,000 or 12,000 were ordered to New York—and I know that there was a brigade in Pennsylvania which was organized at Huntingdon, and instead of being sent to the field where they were needed they were sent to Philadelphia to maintain order. It was a very unpopular measure at that time in that great crisis of the Nation.

President Wilson, in his history, volume 4, page 236, in commenting upon the experience of our Government at that time, states:

The draft act meant that Congress realized at last the magnitude and the almost desperate difficulty of the war it had embarked upon. In carrying it into execution the Government learned something more of the temper of the people. Intense excitement everywhere accompanied the progress of the conscription. The excitement culminated more sharply and ominously in New York than anywhere else, and in the city of New York very serious outbreaks occurred—savage "draft riots," which were to linger in the recollection many a long year like an ugly nightmare. For four whole days of that memorable summer (July 13–16, 1863) the town was practically at the mercy of mobs which surged in its streets almost at will and defied the Government to put the obnoxious act into execution. It was executed, none the less, in the end. Inequalities in its enforcement as between locality and locality were corrected but its essential rigor was not abated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. On yesterday I telegraphed a well-known military man in my State and made inquiry as to the experience New Hampshire had in the Civil War in the matter of enlistment and conscription. I have the reply by telegraph, and if the Senator will permit me—it is only a few lines—I should like to read it.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. He says:

New Hampshire, in the Civil War, furnished 17 regiments of Infantry, 1 regiment each of Cavalry and Artillery, 3 companies of sharpshooters, and 3,500 enlistments in the Navy, making a total of 39,000 volunteers. A few men were drafted in August, 1863 and sent to regiments at the front. Further drafts were unnecessary, as quotas were easily filled.

Then he makes a note—

I am strongly tempted to intrude a humble personal opinion, as follows. Conscription policy unusually bad, inducing wholesale desertions.

We had wholesale desertions from one regiment which was conscripted near the close of the war.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I can not help reflecting how rapidly opinions change, and how a constant force employed against a resistant body will be certain to improve the first opportunity to break through. All this is well illustrated here. The constant desire of the Regular Army to compel service, the constant belief of the Regular Army officer due to his training, due to his environment, that to the trained soldier alone can the safety of the State be entrusted, is improving this opportunity to break through the barriers the fathers set up, and will, I fear, impose upon this country, not for this day or this hour but for the future, the principle of involuntary military service.

But only a few months ago they did not dare avow such a doctrine. A few months ago they had a prize contest for essays on military subjects, and the gold-medal prize was awarded First Lieut. James J. Mays of the Twenty-fourth Infantry of the United States Army. It is published in the Military Journal of April, 1910. He states of the draft system:

It is not compatible with our institutions that the General Government shall exact military service from any citizen except under some contingency such as justified the conscription of the Civil War. The spirit of our system is that the General Government may call upon the States for quotas of militia, and the States shall fill those quotas from its Organized Militia and from volunteers until calls for volunteers fail. After that conscription may be resorted to.

After the call for volunteers has failed, after the men have been given a chance to save their country, after the brave have been given the opportunity to come forward.

I continue reading:

Conscription could also be resorted to when there was not time to await the results of calls for volunteers. Conscription must be a last resort in the United States.

And that was awarded the gold medal prize by a body of high Army officers. But, ah, that was a few months ago. "A change has come over the spirit of our dreams." The god of war is tramping with bloody feet across the earth and men are forgetting that there is a Republic to preserve and that it may be as easily destroyed from within as from without.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I suppose the Senator is aware of the fact that in awarding prizes for essays of that character in the Army and Navy it is based on the literary character of the work and the character of the argument rather than the question discussed.

Mr. REED. I suppose that if a lot of Army officers are called upon to write on military subjects the test is whether they will write good, sound sense, not whether they produce examples of the literary art. If the prizes are given because of literary polish, that is only additional evidence that the United States Army itself needs some reformation. A fine test is the literary test to apply to an Army officer. Why, in such a contest as that I might enter, and JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS would skin any officer of the Army alive and get all the gold medals. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say that it was based entirely upon literary excellence. I said on the literary excellence and the character of the argument.

Mr. REED. Oh, literary excellence and the character of the argument. Well, I am glad to know they really give some consideration to the argument. But I shall not waste further time discussing the point.

I call attention to the Volunteer Army law passed in 1914, drawn by the War Department. This is what Gen. Wotherspoon said, I presume under oath, at least before a committee of Congress:

> This is decidedly the best bill I have ever seen drafted for this purpose, and, so far as I can see, meets every requirement of the Government that can be anticipated.

Now, that was in 1914. In 1916 the Army officers came forward with another bill, a general reorganization of the Army bill, and they did not touch the Volunteer Army law because it was so perfect, I presume. But Gen. Wotherspoon was not the only man who testified about it. Gen. Wood, speaking of the Volunteer Army bill, said:

> I believe the bill as now presented to be a thoroughly good bill, and I recommend its approval as tending to provide a means for raising and properly organizing volunteer troops in case of war, and I believe that the bill as proposed is a great improvement on the existing law.

Brig. Gen. Murray, Chief of Coast Artillery and assistant to the Chief of Staff, of the War Department, said:

> As I further understand it, the bill was prepared first by that branch of the General Staff known as the War College Division, and later received the approval of the Chief of Staff and of the Secretary of War.
> As a whole, I think the bill is an excellent one, and one that should be made a law; but there are one or two little verbal changes in it that I would suggest or invite attention to. So much for the bill generally.

In his annual report for 1911, after the Army Board had been working a long time to get this bill through, Secretary Stimson said:

> I earnestly recommend the passage of the volunteer bill. There is no new policy or principle involved in the proposed volunteer bill, which is based on the experience of all previous wars.

In 1912 the Secretary of War again recommended the bill—the same bill now a law that the minority of the committee are now asking you to put in as an amendment to the pending bill. This is what the Secretary then said:

> There is now pending in Congress a bill which makes such a provision, and which I believe is admirably adapted to meet the exigencies which would be presented in case of war.

Why, they got this act up for just such an emergency as we now have; and all we are asking is that it shall be now applied.

What kind of men are we? Are we acrobats, who turn somersaults, quite indifferent whether we turn forward or backward? Have we any principles; have we any anchorage; have we any convictions? Has Congress any duty to perform? Was this body, that was created by the fathers in the light of the experience of the ages, that was intended directly to represent the people and to speak for them and respond to them, created in vain? Are Senators to lay aside their judgments? Is Congress, that was given the sole right to declare war, to abdicate its office and its functions in matters pertaining to the conduct of the war? If so, then Congress is a useless and an expensive thing. Unless this body is to exercise its best and its soundest judgment, unless carefully and prayerfully in the presence of a great crisis such as now confronts our land every Member of Congress shall do his duty, then are the people betrayed. In so speaking I am not concerned with the dignity of Senators or of Representatives. I care nothing for their prerogatives. But I am concerned that the people of the United States shall be represented as in their Constitution provided. I am concerned that they shall have a voice, and the only way the people can speak is through the lips of Senators and Representatives, who speak not in their own right, but in the right of the sovereign people.

Yielding always to argument, to reason, to persuasion, conceding always that my associates and that our great President and his Cabinet all have opinions worthy of the highest consideration, still in the end I must, under my oath of office, stand for that which I believe is of the fundamentals; and, sirs, I shall not change my opinion with reference to the gravity of dragging citizens in by involuntary draft and substituting it for a volunteer army without giving any opportunity to volunteer—I shall not change my opinion on that question, even though the General Staff may have changed its mind in the last nine months.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is criticizing the General Staff for having changed its position in reference to this legislation, and I know the Senator wants to be fair about that. I think it is safe to say that Congress at no time has adopted the General Staff plan without such modification as practically to nullify the original intent.

Take the Army reorganization plan of 1916, which was crystallized into a statute known as the act of June 3, 1916. That was not the General Staff plan in its entirety, though it was in part; and the Senator from Missouri will remember the discussion that we had at that time on the floor of the Senate. The proposition of the Secretary of War was the continental army scheme, which was in the nature of a general Army reorganization; but that was not accepted. That was the recommendation of Mr. Garrison, who was then Secretary of War; and the Senator will remember that on the floor of the Senate, as a final compromise, there was submitted what was known as section 56 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, which was the volunteer act. It was not the plan of the General Staff, but it was attempted to be embodied in the national defense act of June 3, 1916, in order to arrange for a volunteer system instead of the continental army, and the Senate voted it down by a vote of one or two. So the national defense act, taking it in its entirety, was not the General Staff plan, but it was changed very materially from the General Staff plan.

I desire to have this go into the RECORD in connection with the Senator's statement. The General Staff plan did not involve the federalization of the militia, the National Guard of the country. That was formulated and presented to the other House by the National Guard representatives themselves, and it was finally embodied in the national defense act; but it was not a part of the General Staff plan.

Mr. REED. Now, let us see where that leaves us. The Regular Army Staff got up a volunteer army plan, submitted it to us, and had it adopted in 1914; and they came here and testified it was the right thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment, if the Senator pleases. I want to conclude this, and then I will yield to the Senator. They said that it would create an effective force of 502,000 mobile and Coast Artillery troops.

When they came to submit the national-defense act to us, it was so drawn that it seemed to leave the militia out, and some Members of Congress insisted on putting the militia in. That, I understand, is the change which the General Staff did not like. Congress put the militia in, or hung it onto the national-defense act. So all Congress did was to add the militia plan to the plan which had been formulated by the General Staff; and whatever value the militia is, it is that much value in addition to the plan of the General Staff. So I do not see what point there is in the Senator's argument. Within a short time after Congress preserved the militia we had to call them, and it was demonstrated that they were ready to serve; and they are ready now to serve.

Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee if he desires to interrupt me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to a fact in answer to what the Senator from Oregon had to say. While it is true that there was some difference about the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, and some difference between the General Staff and Congress, in so far as the volunteer act of 1914 was concerned, it was adopted after seven years of request on the part of the General Staff.

Here is what the Senator from Oregon said in submitting the volunteer plan in 1914 to the Senate. The Senator stated in his report:

The legislation now proposed has received the approval of the military authorities and has been pending in various forms before Congress for the last seven years. It has been urgently recommended by every Secretary of War since the incumbency of Mr. Root. Its general purpose is to provide for a complete organization of any force of volunteers that may hereafter be called out, whether that force be a single regiment or an army of a million men.

And that bill, thus urgently pressed by the General Staff, came before Congress and passed practically without any amendment and by the unanimous vote of this body and, I believe, of the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? What he has read has reference to the act of 1914?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question but that was a good plan as compared with the legislation on the statute books at that time, just as the Dick bill of 1903 was a very great improvement on the former legislation. It was the crystallization of the better sentiment of the country into a law that improved the militia laws that had been enacted prior to that time. As the Dick law was an improvement over the laws as they before existed, the act of 1914 was a very great improvement over that, because it came more nearly to federalizing the handling of the Army of the United States. I said at that time, and I repeat now, that it was the best and most constructive piece of legislation that ever found a place on our statute books affecting the military organization up to 1914. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED. Yes; and now they propose to wipe it out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just once more? There was an attempt to make it a part of the general reorganization plan here on the floor of the Senate, though it was not what the Senator claims it was—a part of the General Staff plan. I think the Senator was one of those who voted against it in 1916.

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator is in error about my ever having voted against any proposition for a volunteer army. The Senator knows that I have always been an advocate of the citizen soldiery, of volunteer armies in time of war, and of the militia in time of peace, and if there was such a vote at the time the Senator speaks of it was because the question was presented from some other angle. I have no recollection of any such occurrence.

Now, Mr. President, while I am speaking about that, here is the report made by the Senator himself. I read the title:

February 20, 1914.—Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

In the report he states:

A study of the bill was made by the War College Division of the General Staff under date of August 7, 1913, and is incorporated below as part of this report.

They state:

2. In the five principal wars in which the United States has been engaged since its existence as a separate State the records show that of the total number of men enrolled 7.5 per cent were furnished by the Regular Army, 69.7 per cent were volunteers, and 22.8 were militia, rangers, and emergency men.

That answers the question of who has taken care of this country in time of danger, does it not?

3. The report of the Board on the Organization of the Land Forces of the United States shows that at the outbreak of war with a first-class power we should be capable of mobilizing at once an effective force of 502,000 mobile and Coast Artillery troops as a minimum for the first line, and that to augment this force and replace losses plans should be in existence for raising immediately an additional force of 300,000 men; total, 802,000 men—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, it is not proposed to change that system to improve it; it is proposed to annihilate it and to substitute for it a system that is covered with odium, and that is handed down to us with the execrations and curses of all the past clinging to it—a conscript system pure and simple, a system that broke down when it was attempted during the Revolutionary War; that broke down when it was attempted during the War of 1812; that was a failure in the great Civil War, when it only produced 2 per cent of the troops, and when the good troops were busy keeping the bad troops in order and suppressing riots. It is proposed to wipe out the very things the General Staff has been recommending for years and that the distinguished chairman of the committee himself has asked us time and again to adopt, and which, following his lead, we have adopted.

And how about these volunteers? Grant was a West Pointer, but he had left the Army and he was out near St. Louis engaged in farming. He volunteered. Of course, he brought to his task all the knowledge and learning he had acquired at West Point and all that he had acquired in the War with Mexico. He was the greatest soldier of all modern times. This is what he had to say, speaking of the two armies that met, one from Burkesville Junction and the other from the neighborhood of Raleigh, N. C., the union of Sherman's army and another:

The troops were hardy, being inured to fatigue, and they appeared in their respective camps as ready and fit for duty as they had ever been in their lives. I doubt whether an equal body of men of any nation take them man for man, officer for officer, was ever gotten together that would have proved their equal in a great battle.

And yet the great majority of the officers, if I mistake not, were volunteers, and nearly all of the men were volunteers. In the old line of the Army there were only 10,000 Regulars, and they were assigned to one corps. Grant continues—and I wish he was carnate and with us in the flesh now in this crisis of our country—and gives this as his opinion:

The armies of Europe are machines; the men are brave and the officers capable, but the majority of the soldiers in most of the nations of Europe are taken from a class of people who are not very intelligent and who have very little interest in the contest in which they are called upon to take part.

Our armies were composed of men who were able to read—

And listen to this—

men who knew what they were fighting for—

And now note this—

and could not be induced to serve as soldiers, except in an emergency, when the safety of the Nation was involved, and so necessarily must have been more than equal to men who fought merely because they were brave and because they were thoroughly drilled and inured to hardships.

But of course Grant is gone; and behold, a greater than Grant is here!

Sherman, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] stated in the RECORD a day or so ago, like Grant, eulogized his volunteer soldiers. And Lee! With what kindliness he regarded his gallant troops. And Stonewall Jackson! With what fatherly care and invincible courage he called to his men, "Come on." And from every hillside cottage there went up prayers for the army, the Army of the North and the Army of the South, and for the army's success, because in the army was the boy who had gone voluntarily to fight. He had not been dragged there by a corporal's guard; he had left home with the kisses and tears of the mother upon his cheek, but he had left also with her "God bless you" following him, and with the cheers and congratulations of his neighbors and friends as he went forth, a gallant man offering to serve his country. What a different picture there would have been if the corporal's guard had battered at the door with the butts of their muskets, if they had torn an unwilling son from the arms of a despairing mother, if they had carried away the father while children wept and clung to their mothers' skirts, if they had dragged father and taken brother and son to the death line to take their chances of being killed.

When you do things of that kind, you break the spirit that is the one invincible thing in war, the spirit of volunteer service and sacrifice, the spirit that must be in a body of men if they stand for great achievement, the spirit of Thermopylæ, where the Greeks chose death rather than life in a country disgraced; the spirit which was evinced the other day when on board a British vessel which had been torpedoed and was sinking, the British volunteer stood at attention as the ship went down bearing him to his death—that spirit that has never lost a great war or a great campaign for a great nation; that spirit that has lived in America and will live as long as it is appealed to in the name of country and duty and home. But it will not be cultivated by a posse comitatus driving a boy to trial or by a corporal's guard dragging him against his will to the line of battle.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] read a telegram in which reference was made to desertion under the conscript system. Yes; if you apply this law you will have desertions. The man who hangs back and does not want to serve, to whom, as Abraham Lincoln said, God Almighty may have given a pair of coward's legs—this man will desert. Then we will be treated to the spectacle, it being a time of war, of the firing squad, of the blast of the rifles, of the groan from bloody lips, of the limp body sinking to the ground, and of mother and sisters coming to bear away the corpse. We shall have all this in this land of the free and home of the brave; the while there are men willing to serve, anxious to serve, men who would regard the privilege of putting upon their shoulders the uniform of their country as a prize of honor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator has paid a very magnificent tribute to the fighting qualities of volunteer soldiers, and I hesitate to interrupt him in what may be the peroration of his eloquent address; but I want to ask him if the world has ever known any better fighting than has been done during the present war by the German Army, in which there are no volunteers, as I understand?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the advocates of this draft system naturally go to Prussia for all of their examples as well as for their philosophy.

Mr. MYERS. They may well go there for an example of fighting, I submit.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. It will be a digression—perhaps the chairman of the committee desires also to plant himself on the Prussian soil. If so, I yield to him.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to plant myself as a Democrat on the Jeffersonian soil, Mr. President. I think Secretary Garrison was recognized as a pretty able man and a pretty good Democrat. In his reported plan, presented to Congress on January 6, 1916—which differs from the War College plan, let me say to the Senator—he says what I am about to read. The Senator spoke of our planting ourselves on the Prussian soil. He says:

> It is curious to realize that as far back as 1805 the fundamental idea of this plan received actual expression. On December 31 of that year Thomas Jefferson, writing to the Secretary of War, Gen. Dearborn, inclosed a bill to be sent to Congress proceeding exactly along the lines now recommended. The only difference is that Jefferson's bill required universal military service.

I just wanted to call the Senator's attention to that.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. REED. I should be glad to, although I should like to answer this particular statement first. Does the Senator quote Secretary Garrison as a military authority? Why, Secretary Garrison left the Cabinet because the plan he had submitted was turned down by the present President of the United States, if the press is to be credited with having told us the facts, and I think it did.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I do not quote Secretary Garrison as a military expert. I quote him as an expert on Jefferson, but I do agree with the Senator that he was not a military expert. As a matter of fact, he turned down the General Staff plan in toto and adopted one of his own that had not been heard of before.

Mr. REED. And then he got turned down by the President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; which was very proper.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the authority just quoted by the Senator from Oregon. Mr. Garrison says, in his report, that—

> If the volition of the citizen does not result in the securing of the needed number, there will be a complete demonstration of the inability of any volunteer system to produce results. It is certainly not the sentiment of this country to-day that any such failure is possible. It is the widespread belief that our people realize their responsibility and duty to their Government, and will cheerfully and gladly render it. Certainly they must be given the opportunity to do so before there is any procedure upon the assumption that they will not do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that, of course, is from Mr. Garrison. Now, whether the chairman of the committee will reject that because it was the utterance of a man not skilled in military matters, or whether he will accept it because it was the utterance of a man skilled in Jeffersonian philosophy, I do not know. It comes from the same source.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I was not quoting Mr. Garrison as a military expert, and I do not claim to be one myself; but I differed very radically from the Secretary of War in his views about the Army. I rather favored the General Staff plan, Mr. President; and if I were to read from it to-day the country would conclude that if that plan had been followed we would not be involved in this critical condition now with respect to the Army, because they recommended a feasible and a most excellent plan.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want now to answer the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who, having asked me a question, has gone out of the Chamber. However, I might as well answer him in his absence, because he is not the only man who points to Germany as the ideal that we ought to follow.

Mr. President, I would rather see my country lose a great battle, I would rather see my country lose a great campaign, I would rather see my country suffer anything except the overthrow of her institutions, than to see her reduced to that kind of military servitude which has cursed Germany. I can not see what there is left for a man to fight for or die for if he must live under the domination of a class, a caste, that is headed by a man who asserts that God Almighty picked him out and put him upon this earth to dominate the lives, the fortunes, and the happiness of millions of people.

But, Mr. President, the question of general military training properly applied does not necessarily Prussianize our country, and that is a matter with which I have a very considerable sympathy, if it be worked out in a way so as not to place great hardships upon the people.

But what has that to do with this question? The truth is Germany has made a wonderful fight. The truth is she has been preparing her people for it for many years, and the system is a development of over 150 years of experience. She started in with the theory of standing armies under Frederick, the father of Frederick the Great. She continued that theory under Frederick the Great, although it was enlarged to a considerable extent. Finally Prussia abandoned it, and said: "Every man shall serve; every man shall be a soldier; every man shall be trained."

What was the result of it? France had to come to universal military training, and other countries had to come substantially to it. Thus great military powers were being created, and in the end came the clash; and now we are told that in our own country, because of that system set up over in Prussia, we must begin drafting our citizens without once giving them an opportunity to come voluntarily to the colors.

But, Mr. President, I deny that the experience of the war in Europe has demonstrated the superiority of the German system. It did demonstrate that she could strike quicker than any other nation, except perhaps a nation that had trained everybody as she had. It demonstrated that. But the experience on the fighting line over there has been that the English and Canadian volunteer, once he is trained, once he is equipped, is a better fighting man than the German. The experience of the last few weeks has demonstrated that these volunteers know how to go to their death with cheers upon their lips. It has demonstrated that invincible spirit that lives through every kind of disaster. It can not be claimed, sir, that there is anything in the war in Europe that argues in favor of universal military service except the one proposition of being instantly ready to pounce upon a neighboring State.

But, Mr. President, the chairman of the committee knows that we do not have universal military training now, so what use is there in talking about it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to the Senator, with his permission, that we would have it if I had my way.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator became a convert to that doctrine, I think, about six months ago.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is very much mistaken about that. I made speeches on it a year and a half ago and introduced in the Senate a bill on the subject a year and a half ago.

Mr. REED. Well, a year and a half ago.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But I want to say to the Senator that I became converted to it long, long ago, when, as governor of Oregon, I found how many men who ought to have been in the militia of the State were not in it.

Mr. REED. Well, I do not know just when the Senator's conversion took place. I guess I was mistaken. Probably a year and a half ago he began making speeches for it; but if he had had it adopted when he first spoke about it on the floor of the Senate, if this military board known as the General Staff had recommended it a year and a half ago, and if we had adopted it, we would not yet have had it in practical operation. It took 17 years to establish general military service in France. But what is to be gained by discussing the question of what we might have or what we might not have? We do not have at this time universal military training.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that he was discussing it; nobody else was discussing the universal military training feature; but in his discussion of it he did not state my position correctly. The fact is, I want to say to the Senator, that the idea of preparing a bill on the subject did not originate with the General Staff or anybody else. As a matter of fact, nobody has been with me in the War Department until very recently on the principle involved in universal military training.

Mr. REED. Very well. The Senator says I was discussing it and nobody else was. The question was dragged in here by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and I have been replying to him; and I have been very generous, and have allowed everybody who wanted to make an argument during the course of my remarks just to come on and make it, but I am adhering to the record with reasonable tenacity.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that the whole trouble with the volunteer system has not been in the volunteer system at all; it has been in the application of that system and the management of that system. There have been defects in it, but the fact that there have been defects in the application of the system is no reason for abandoning the system. The thing to do is to correct the defects. If you have a magnificent house that has stood and weathered the storms of the years and protected you, and the plumbing gets out of order, if you are a wise man, you do not burn down the house. You have the plumbing fixed, however hazardous that undertaking may be.

The difficulty with the volunteer system was pointed out by George Washington, and it was not with the system itself. It was with the method of applying it.

This is what Washington said, speaking of the militia, and it is his final opinion. Those who have been quoting Washington as against the militia have been quoting him falsely. I am reading from Greene, page 294:

> The final word of Washington, as General in Chief, on military policy was given in the address which he sent to the governors of the States from Newburgh about six months prior to resigning his commission. * * * He stated that there were four things "essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say to the existence, of the United States as an independent power," and one of them was "the adoption of a proper peace establishment." His opinion on this was as follows: "The militia of this country must be considered as the palladium of our security and the first effectual resort in case of hostility. It is essential, therefore, that the same system should pervade the whole; that the formation and discipline of the militia of the continent should be absolutely uniform and that the same species of arms, accouterments, and military apparatus should be introduced in every part of the United States. No one who has not learned it from experience, can conceive the difficulty, expense, and confusion which result from a contrary system, or the vague arrangements which have hitherto prevailed."

So that Washington did not condemn the military system. Washington did not rely upon regular armies. Washington regarded the militia—as he used it, it was meant to cover just such a case as the present—as the great force we must call upon.

But there were defects, and these defects in our volunteer system and these defects in our militia system have been recognized from time to time, and have been from time to time remedied. The first great step in that direction was taken by William McKinley in the War with Spain. I again read from Greene. Although this article is an attempt to defend the other view, I commend its facts to the Senate.

After stating that we had called for 125,000 volunteers, and afterwards for 75,000, in the War with Spain, the author states:

> The President of the United States, William McKinley, had in his youth trudged through the long marches and fought in many battles of the Civil War; the Secretary of War, R. A. Alger, had also served in the same war; The Adjutant General, Henry C. Corbin, had not only had the same experience but was a man of rare executive and administrative ability and of tireless energy. They used their utmost efforts, and with success in persuading Congress so to legislate that the mistakes of the Civil War and our previous wars might not be repeated. It will be noticed that there was no limit except the President's discretion to the number of men to be called for—

That is, in the Spanish War—

> That national volunteers, officered by the President under regulations prescribing examinations as to their military qualifications, were provided for. Therefore, when the second call for volunteers was made, the rule was established and rigidly enforced that the recruits should be sent to fill up existing regiments from every State, and no new regiments were formed until this had been done.

That is the very defect that the Senator from Minnesota stated to us had existed during the Civil War, and it was remedied, under the advice of William McKinley, before we entered upon the War with Spain in 1898.

The author continues:

> The laws passed and the regulations established for carrying them into effect in 1898 are models for similar occasions hereafter. It should be noted, however, that the able-bodied population was then about 13,000,000, and the number of men called for, about 250,000, was only 1 in 50, instead of 1 in 2 as in the Civil War. It may be a question whether the principles established in 1898 can be carried out in a war making such a demand on our military strength as did the Civil War. There seems to be no ground to doubt that they can be, if the number of volunteers in the first call is sufficiently large, and if, in case volunteers do not respond the conscription is immediately applied.

And that is what is proposed here. We do not seek to deny you the right to force men to come if they do not come voluntarily.

The author says:

> There was no such difficulty in 1898. The number called for was ample, and the response was instantaneous, not only for the Volunteer but also for the Regular Army.

Notice how our people will come when there is any real fighting to be done.

> Within a month the Regulars were increased to 44,125 and the Volunteers to 124,804; within 90 days, Regulars to 56,258 and Volunteers to 212,094. These troops were all organized, armed, equipped and in the field within the dates named. When the peace protocol was signed, on August 12, recruiting was stopped; there were then 274,717 men in the field, of which approximately 59,000 were Regulars, 16,000 United States Volunteers, and 200,000 State Volunteers. The Army had numbered only 28,183 on April 1.

Now, Mr. President, it thus appears——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I just want to inquire the book from which the Senator is reading?

Mr. REED. I am reading from Greene, entitled "The Revolutionary War." Greene has written a number of histories. This is the one on that subject; and I was reading from pages 317, 318, and 319.

Thus, Mr. President, it appears that the volunteers and the militia have fought and won every war this country has ever had. Thus it appears that these defects in the system which had existed, which undoubtedly were a serious handicap during the Civil War, were remedied prior to the Spanish War. Thus it appears that subsequent to that time, and still further for the purpose of remedying all possible defects, the General Staff evolved the bill of 1914, a bill which places within the power of the President the naming of every officer of the volunteer forces, and gives substantially the same sources for securing those officers as are proposed to be granted under the present bill.

Now, Mr. President, with these defects wiped out, with this splendid advance made, we are asked to utterly ignore and destroy the volunteer system and to go at once to the draft.

I am aware that I have taken up entirely too much time; but I want to answer, as briefly as I can, certain fallacies that have been advanced. My friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] says that he wants to suggest the absence of a quorum. I have found that drafting men into the Senate, compelling them to come in, gets about the same kind of service that drafting men into the Army does. A man comes in and backs out. He is not interested in the question, or he does not like the speech, or he does not like the speaker, and he vamooses; he disappears.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, he deserts.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will ask the Senator if he thinks that the response to the call for volunteers for the Army would be any better than in the case of the volunteers who are listening to the Senator's speech?

Mr. REED. I do. I blame no man for not wanting to listen to anything I have to say.

Mr. MYERS. I am always interested in what the Senator says.

Mr. REED. I blame any man for not being willing to serve his country. Not listening to me is a matter of taste. Responding to your country's call is a matter of duty. I do not criticize, either, the Senators who are not listening, because many men have other things to do. Some of them may be conducting investigations. I was absent yesterday trying to get together some of this material that I have been producing here to-day, and I did not hear the speeches, I very much regret to say, of Senators who spoke on yesterday, and I may have repeated the very things that they said; but I desire now to answer some of the arguments that have been produced.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has said them well.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

The claim is that the volunteer lacks training. That is the first argument made here. Drafting men does not obviate that difficulty. Now, just get that in your heads—and let the country get it in its head—that, if volunteers fail because of lack of training, drafted men will fail for the same cause.

What is the proposition? What will be the condition of these men we are about to get. There is this difference between the drafted man and the volunteer: According to Gen. Miles's testimony, there are in this country substantially 1,000,000 men outside of the Military Establishment who have been trained as soldiers. Some of them have served in the Regular Army, some of them have served in the militia, some of them have served in military schools or have gone to military schools—1,000,000 of them. If you call for volunteers, the probabilities are that the greater part of those men will volunteer, or a great many of them—a great percentage of them.

But if you resort to the draft you substantially get untrained men. Now, if this draft, instead of being limited to boys between 19 and 25 years of age, was applied to men who had had military experience, so that we could start with 1,000,000 men who had had military experience, there would be some sense in a draft; but, instead of getting those men, it excludes them to all intents and purposes, as I shall show.

First. The age limit of the draft is so low that practically none of them will be reached.

Second. Even if the age limit were raised to embrace all capable of military service, still the number of trained men obtained by the draft would only be that proportion which the number drafted bears to the total population of the country capable of bearing arms. It is estimated that there are in the United States 20,000,000 men capable of bearing arms. If there is a total of 1,000,000 trained or partially trained reserves, then the draft of 500,000 would only reach 1 out of 40, or 25,000 of the trained men.

It is obvious, therefore, that a volunteer force will bring to the colors a greater proportion of trained men than will be obtained by the proposed draft.

The historic argument against volunteers always has been that they are composed of raw troops and that men can not fight without training.

Let us concede the fact fully that raw troops can not stand against trained men. The United States must now raise 670,000, exclusive of militia. Five hundred thousand of these under the draft system will substantially all be untrained men. Under the volunteer system a large percentage will be trained or partially trained men. Hence, the weight of the argument in this instance is in favor of the volunteer system.

The second historic argument against the volunteer is that he is not amenable to discipline. This argument has no standing in view of the provision of the pending bill and proposed amendment, because the volunteer, the conscript, and the new enlisted man of the Regular Army all serve for the same length of time, are equally subject to discipline and training; and the volunteer and conscript will be alike officered by men appointed by the President of the United States, the officers in all instances being drawn from the same general class.

The solitary distinction which any human being can draw between the volunteer and the conscript under these circumstances is to be found in the fact that the spirit which caused the volunteer to offer his service and his life is likely to stay with him in camp and field and inspire him to supreme effort, while the spirit which caused the conscript to hang back is likely to make him come to the battle like a "quarry slave scourged to his dungeon."

It surely will not be claimed that the untrained volunteer is not the equal of the untrained conscript. The problem in each case after the raw man is obtained is the same. It is one of training, except that a body of volunteers will obtain a greater per centum of trained men, as I have already shown.

Why, then, can not an effective plan to train the volunteer be evolved as easily as a plan to train the conscript?

If the volunteer system has ever failed for lack of training, then the thing to do is to furnish the training. The training must be furnished whether the man be a volunteer or a conscript.

If the volunteer system has failed for want of proper officers, then the thing to do is to furnish the officers. The officers must be furnished whether the man comes voluntarily or whether he be dragged in by a corporal's guard.

Only the prejudiced or foolish will condemn a great system because in the past it has failed through a defect not in the system but in the utilization of the system. Wherever the volunteer has failed it has not been because of the volunteer but because of the way he was handled. The defects in the system were known to military men, and they were all presumptively met and cured in the volunteer act of 1914.

Now, I put this question to the Senate: Has any English-speaking country ever drafted its citizens at the beginning of a war?

Mr. MYERS. Not that I know of, but there is a British officer over here telling the people of this country they are very sorry right now that they did not do it at the beginning of the war.

Mr. REED. Yes; there is a British officer over here now who undoubtedly is a gallant gentleman. I wish that his name might not have been drawn into this debate, but it will be remembered that the question of whether they were going to have conscription or not was debated long in England. At last Lord Derby, I believe it was, said that the married men who would volunteer would not be called under their volunteer agreement until the single men had responded. Nearly all the single men did respond, but there were some 600,000 who hung back. There is a percentage in every nation of men who will not do their duty. Thereupon the draft act was passed, applicable to that 600,000, and it was passed more for the purpose of keeping faith with the married men who had volunteered under the promise of Lord Derby than for any other purpose. To-day there are on the fighting line 6,500,000 British, of whom practically only 600,000 are conscripts, and England did not pass this law until she had upon the fighting line 5,000,000 volunteers. She did not insult her people and repudiate her traditions at the very beginning of the war by demanding that they be drafted.

We all know that this distinguished gentleman, coming here with his gallantry, his splendid manhood, with his heart inspired as it must be with love of his country and a determination to win, can not see why they should not at the very first have called the draft in England. But, sir, there were wise statesmen in England who knew that the best way to concentrate British opinion and British valor back of a great enterprise was to deal with the English people as free men and not to try and drive them. So the draft was never undertaken in England until the vast majority, 90 per cent, of all the people in England were on the battle line or represented on the battle line by their flesh and blood. Under those circumstances, of course, they could say to the people who had hung back, you must do your duty.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish again to remind the Senate that the method pursued by Great Britain which the Senator has just so eloquently described received the approval of England's greatest soldier, Lord Kitchener.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to say at this point, as there has been so much said in this debate about 5,000,000 Englishmen volunteering before conscription was resorted to, that so far as I have read or heard all the British authorities admit that it was a mistake that they did not resort to it sooner.

Mr. THOMAS. It would have been resisted then.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from Colorado mean to say by analogy that if we have a draft in this country the people of Colorado will rebel against it and will not submit to authority?

Mr. THOMAS. I say no such thing, but I do say when the people are confronted with all the brutalities of the conscript system it will not be so popular as we now imagine it is from the vast number of telegrams which have been inspired and which have been sent to us. I do say that if Great Britain had resorted to this system at the outset it would have been resisted by force from one end to the other of the British Isles, and nobody knew better the fact than those men having charge of the destinies of the British Empire. What England did was wise, and, whatever her other blunders may have been, this was not one of them.

Mr. MYERS. Then the Senator differs from many of the leading English statesmen of the day. I want to say that whatever the people of England may have done or should have done in the case of a draft, the people of Montana and, I believe, the people of all the country when the country summons them to save the honor and integrity and life of their Nation will respond.

Mr. THOMAS. They will go, most of them, when the call is made for volunteers.

Mr. MYERS. Or by draft, or any other form.

Mr. REED. The statement of the Senator from Montana absolutely shows that the draft is unnecessary and that it is brutal to apply it, for if the people of Montana are ready to come and serve and do their duty, and I know they are, then why should the draft be applied to them?

Mr. MYERS. I said they would respond when summoned, and it makes little difference to them whether the summons comes in the shape of a call for volunteers or in a draft.

Montana never will have to be dragged into war.

Mr. REED. I do not think Montana will. I think, if I know the temper of the people of that State they are keen enough for a fight. I do not think that they are any more so than the people of other States. I think the expression "keen enough for a fight" is unfortunate. I think that the people of the United States do not want war. They do not want to go into the business of killing. But when their country needs them they will come, if the country calls them. That is what I say. But the advocates of the draft say in effect that the people of the United States will not come if called, that they must be lashed like cowards on the fighting line. The only justification that can be given for the draft is that the people will not come or else an even more contemptible reason, that certain Army officers will prefer to have "compelled soldiers" rather than "voluntary soldiers."

But the Senator from Montana says that there never was any difference of opinion with English statesmen in that way.

I have already read from Colliers "The Story of the Great War," volume 8, page 2409, statements showing that a number of great English statesmen were against conscription.

You will remember that the British cabinet practically dissolved over this issue.

Even after they had been at war, when the English could hear the guns of the Germans reverberating from the battle line clear to the shores of Britain, when German ships stole out at night and bombarded the cities and towns where men and women slept, and slaughtered from the air the babes in the mothers' arms—after all that, Great Britain did not attempt to force the draft. Even after call after call had been made, and when at last the draft measure was adopted applicable to all of a certain class, not a draft by lottery, they gave those men the chance to volunteer. They did not do as you propose to do by this bill, to slap every patriot in the face and reject his service in advance, to decline the gallant swords of gallant men and to accept only those men who are forced into the service.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Roosevelt?

Mr. REED. I sometimes think some people are advocating the draft and opposing volunteers lest Mr. Roosevelt may organize a body of men and get a commission. I candidly believe, and the remark of the Senator from Montana calling the name brings it to my mind, that there may be men so small as that. So far as I am concerned, I have never offended against my politics or my conscience by voting for Theodore Roosevelt. I have seldom agreed with anything Mr. Roosevelt has ever done. I do not think I could subscribe to a single political principle that Theodore Roosevelt has ever advanced. But, Mr. President, Theodore Roosevelt is a gallant American, and if he is willing to organize a body of brave men to defend this country, then God give to his arms strength and to his soul additional valor.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say that I am in hearty accord with what the Senator said about Mr. Roosevelt. I am in favor of giving him a commission in the Army.

Mr. REED. But I suppose you would insist on drafting him. You would not let him come forward and say "I am willing"; you want to get him by the scruff of the neck and say "You must come or go to jail."

Mr. MYERS. If drafted, I do not think he would fight very hard against going into a fight.

Mr. REED. I think he would go in if he were drafted. I do not think drafting will necessarily make a man refuse to serve his country. He may be patriotic enough to serve it notwithstanding it has drafted him. When did it become necessary to draft men to get them in this country?

Here is how the volunteer system worked in England. Col. Maude says:

> England, in January, 1915, had enrolled 2,500,000 men out of a total male population of 4,600,000 between the ages of 19 and 35. This is almost two-thirds of the total men available under 40 and almost exactly the same proportion as the strictest law of compulsion in Europe (the French) would have given her. It is one-sixth more than the Germans had been taking out of their annual contingents. (Col. F. N. Maude, Nineteenth Century and After, January, 1915.)

After that England contributed nearly twice as many. Now, let me put a question. Is not Canada more closely related to the United States in the character of her population and in her geographical location than is any other nation; and is not Canada a loyal portion of Great Britain, and has her stake in this war from the first not been that if Great Britain were defeated Canada might be brought under German rule? And yet, with this great menace over her, with her people realizing the danger, Canada has not to this blessed hour adopted conscription. Yet she gave 400,000 of her sons. Just the other day it was Canadian volunteers who took the supposedly impregnable portion of the line of Germany; that part where Germany had planted herself to stay was wrested from her by Canadian volunteers. The Senator was not here, and I repeat it for his benefit.

Another loyal part of the British Empire is Australia; New Zealand is another, a gallant and brave and progressive people. Together they have furnished as volunteers approximately 400,000 men. They have not applied the conscription system to their brave people. Why, then, should we be asked to apply it? If that advice is being given from abroad, let it be taken a little farther north and given to the Canadian Parliament and to the Canadian people.

The claim that the draft is democratic is the very antithesis of the truth. The draft is not democratic, it is autocratic; it is not republican, it is despotic; it is not American, it is Prussian. Its essential feature is that of involuntary servitude. It is justifiable in a republic only when the imminence of danger is such that all rights, privileges, and liberties of the citizen must be surrendered to preserve the nation. I deny that we have reached that condition.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator leaves that point, will he yield for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the Senator if, in his examination of this question, he has thought of the proposition as to whether or not the Constitution contemplates that when an army is required it shall come from the States as States and in proportion to their population? Does not the Constitution contemplate that when an army is raised the sovereignty and autonomy of the State, as a part of the Federal Union, shall be recognized, and that volunteers shall come from the States as States rather than from the country as a whole?

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, that was originally the construction generally placed upon the Constitution; but in these latter days I am sometimes in doubt whether we have any regard for the Constitution. I do not find it necessary, however, to raise the question which the Senator has suggested, because in my view of the matter it ought to be settled upon even broader grounds. However, the objection raised by the Senator is worthy of very serious consideration.

There is a very curious argument which has been advanced, namely, that if you call for volunteers you will skim from the country all of the talent and all of the brains and all of the valor—that you will get them all at once.

Mr. President, if that is true, then it affords an excellent argument for volunteers. If you never have to go beyond the first 500,000, then you will have the bravest of the brave to compose that 500,000; but if you have to call for a second 500,000, or a third 500,000, then out of these capable men who made up your first 500,000 and who have been trained, will come the officers for subsequent levies. Instead of that being an argument against the volunteer system, it is one decidedly in favor of the volunteer system.

Mr. President, it is claimed that without this draft we may not get men as rapidly as we would desire them. My reply to that is, that under the volunteer system we will get men more rapidly than we can by the draft. I treat for the present, as a part of the volunteer system from this standpoint, the militia, although they are not, properly speaking, a part of the volunteer army. The telegrams that I have read demonstrate that the Federal Government has retarded enlistments in the militia. One reason, at least, is the lack of ability to equip them. Therefore you are getting them faster than you can equip them, and that is about as fast as you ought to want them.

Second, while before the declaration of war we could not get any enlistments at all in the Regular Army, to speak of—they came in tardily and at great expense; I think it cost us about $100 for each recruit we got, advertising to get him—yet as soon as war was declared enlistments increased, and they are having as many as 4,000 in one day. Four thousand enlistments in a day will soon raise a considerable body of men. If kept up for 100 days, it means 400,000. I have called attention to similar experiences in the Marine Corps and in the Navy; this answers the question of the willingness of our people; but, in addition to that, there are a large number of organizations in every State in the Union of men who have banded themselves together, and who are practically ready to come at a moment's call. In a few days' time several regiments can be raised in my own State. I think I am entirely within the facts when I say that within 20 days' time from three to five regiments of first-class men can be there raised. So there is no difficulty in getting troops in time.

But, mark you, it is admitted we can not equip this army before the 1st of August, and all that is asked by the minority of the committee is to give the volunteer system a chance of trial until the 1st of August.

Mr. President, they are not able to take care of the enlistments in the Navy at the present time. Let me read to you from the Washington Star, of April 23, the following:

> RECRUIT QUARTERS NEEDED—NAVY TO HOUSE MEN TEMPORARILY ON INTERNED GERMAN SHIPS.
> Navy recruiting has increased to a point where the question of temporary housing is a pressing problem. Men are pouring in at the rate of 1,300 a day, and every ship and all training stations are crowded to their capacity. Admiral Usher telephoned from New York to-day that even though he had taken over an armory in Brooklyn, as well as other quarters, the congestion remained acute.
> Secretary Daniels, after a conference with Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, announced that the German vessels interned in New York will be employed as barracks for naval recruits. Their temporary use for that purpose is expected to relieve the crowded conditions at naval stations until such time as the men may be distributed through the various arms of the service and further provision made for their accommodation.

Now, sir, in view of this state of affairs, what is left of this demand for a draft? We can get the troops. The demonstration is complete. We can get them before we can equip them. The proof in the telegrams I have read and that I have otherwise offered is incontrovertible. These men, when obtained, will be officered as the President of the United States shall say they shall be officered. They will be organized under a bill that was drawn and brought to Congress by the General Staff itself, that was recommended to Congress by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that was passed at his instance and solicitation, and largely upon his judgment. Why, then, the draft? Mark you, if the volunteer system breaks down, the draft can immediately be applied; the machinery for its application can be organized at once; indeed, not a day of delay need be occasioned; but who is there dare stand here—and I utter the challenge again—and say that his State will not bring forward its quota?

What is the great difference, then, between the draft and the volunteer system, between volunteer service freely rendered and conscription secured at the point of the bayonet? Is it possible in this country that the doctrine has been somewhere inculcated that a man will make a better soldier if he is compelled to come to the colors than if he comes voluntarily? Is it possible, on the other hand, that there are men in the Senate who believe our people have become poltroons and that they will not respond to their country's call? If neither of these arguments is brought forward, then there is no argument left for the draft.

It is no hardship to a citizen who comes forward voluntarily and offers his services that he shall be permitted to serve. You can not base your argument upon the flimsy pretext that you are protecting a man against doing a voluntary injustice to himself. What, then, is the reason? Why is it that all our policies are to be reversed? I can not answer the question. I challenge any man to give a sensible and satisfactory reason.

Mr. President, what is it makes a nation invincible in war? I answer, it is the spirit of the people. Germany was prepared for war and Great Britain was not; and yet Great Britain has responded in this war in a way that makes it perfectly plain that if a great, free people are determined upon any project, if all their hearts and souls are united in one enterprise, then is that great nation well-nigh invincible.

It seems to me that the first thing that we ought to consider in this Chamber is the creation of that invincible spirit of determination among our people, and that we should never lose sight of the fact that it will be the most potential thing in the great struggle ahead of us. Arouse the American people so that every heart and every soul shall respond to the same sentiment; build the fires of patriotism hot in the bosoms of all of the men and women of this land; and I say to you there is no nation on this earth that can stand before us single and alone.

How ought we then to treat this question? Two ways are presented. One is to create a great body of officers all over the country who shall act as registrars, and then the mandate shall go forth that all boys between 19 and 25 must on a certain day go to the county seat and there register their names—and when they go they go by compulsion of law—and when their names are registered father and mother and brother and sister hope and pray that there shall be no such misfortune as the drawing of that name. Then will come the day of the draft and the names will go into the wheel, and out of the wheel will come the fateful ticket that will tell the story to some boy that he must go, not of his own volition, but because he is ordered to go; and in that home they will wait with a sickening fear in their breasts that their son or brother may be conscripted. Then, when the conscription has taken place, an Army officer will sit down and he will say to the boy who escaped the draft, "I shall turn loose and send back to his people or to his business this young man because he is more learned than you; that young man, because he can perform in peace something that you can not perform; but you, having been more humbly born or being possessed of less of those valuable things which this machine of efficiency we are about to create demands, shall go into the trenches and you shall be shot at."

Now, mark you, treat any man in that way, appealing not to his courage, appealing not to his patriotism, and if he be not possessed of blood and iron to an unusual degree you send him to the battle line cringing from the contest. That is the picture of this bill. When you come to enforce it, it will be the corporal's guard marching down the lane to take the boy; it will be the officer of the law dragging the wretch to the courthouse in some instances—not in all, not in many, but in some—to try him; and then there will be the desertion, and, as I said a while ago, there will be the firing squad; there will be the body carried home—not all, of course; not all men will feel so because they have been drafted; not the majority; but that is the tendency, and that is the natural effect.

But now, sir, let us turn this picture around and look upon its other side. Our country calls. The President issues his proclamation and asks for the brave to come, and every boy feels somewhat of a thrill when he hears that cry. The orators will stand and paint the glory of citizenship that sacrifices itself to its country's needs; there will be the music of the boisterous drum and the inspiring notes of the bugle; there will be cheers from the people for those who go; and there will be laurel wreaths scattered along their pathway and handed to them by the lily fingers of our fairest daughters; and there will march forth from this land boys who feel they have a country to fight for, boys who feel that it is a privilege to die for the land that Washington fought for and that our fathers and our mothers baptized in blood and in tears. Such a soldiery as that will reproduce its valor back in the hearts at home, and all will stand together in one mighty demand that the justice of our cause shall be vindicated. And so once more upon the battlefields we will water with our blood the flowers of human liberty. And so once more shall we prove the courage of our race. We have our choice. I intend, so far as I am concerned, to vote to give the men of America the opportunity to volunteer in the cause of America.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall not consume very much of the time of the Senate this afternoon in discussing the pending bill. I shall not undertake to treat the subject in detail at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am always glad to suspend while the tribute of love, respect, and admiration is paid my friend, the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I want to also join with Senators in paying the tribute of my admiration and to express my gratitude for his superb effort, and to say that I wish every American citizen could have heard the speech that has just been delivered. The subject matter of that speech is substantial, and the spirit of true Americanism running through it, together with the gorgeous imagery, unanswerable logic, and peaks of eloquence reached by the speaker is to me an inspiration—a tonic for the patriotic soul. Mr. President, the speeches delivered by the eloquent Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] treat so exhaustively in detail of every question involved in the pending measure that I feel that anything I may say will fall as a "twice-told tale," vexing the dull ears of a tired Senate.

But I am going to depart somewhat from the usual course of treating the question and touch upon some of the general phases of the great problem which confronts the American people at this time.

This Congress is making history every moment.

The spirits of the illustrious dead who gave their talents and best services of head and heart to the development of this great Government, and the counsel of whose experience, should point the way in this uncertain period are doubtless with consuming solicitude looking down upon us to-day. If our fleshly ears could catch the words that fall from their spirit lips I am sure they would advise conservatism and urge the greatest care and circumspection in meeting the issues of the hour. It behooves us, therefore, Mr. President—

> To look to our work and be wise,
> Certain of sword and pen;
> We are neither children nor gods,
> But men in a world of men.

Mr. President, free government in America is undergoing a severe test. The citizen whose individuality is a vital element in government, in whom is reposed the strength and the virtue, the intellect, that writes the laws of the land, and whose toil produces the wealth of the Republic, is about to be merged into an indistinguishable mass of humanity. Verily "The individual withers and the world is more and more." The promontories and beacon lights of history, by which the ship of state has been steered successfully for 125 years are no longer regarded as safe to point the proper way. A new philosophy of government engages public attention, and leaders heretofore unknown in legislative matters are taking a prominent part in directing the Nation's course. The concentration of power in the executive department of the Government is a distinguishing, and, I think, an alarming fact in recent political developments. Hunger for power and the avidity with which every opportunity is embraced to exercise authority, characterizes the conduct of the head of every bureau in the Government. The decentralizing teachings of Jefferson, Monroe, Madison, Lincoln, Davis, and George are forgotten, or, if remembered at all, are regarded of inconsequential importance—really, they are considered obsolete—in this hour of desperate emergency.

I am not a worshiper of antiquity. An ancient error is as repulsive to me as a new lie. Time does not impart sanctity, nor longevity add truth to falsehood. I respect the past only as it gives me light by which I may walk without stumbling into the darkness of the future. But I will not reject a good idea or discard a tested system because it happens to be old.

Mr. President, it is one of the most inexplicable facts of history, which doubtless has been observed by all thoughtful students, that the so-called wise men—"the followed persons of the earth," as Walt Whitman called them—who played the most prominent parts in those periods of the world's history which mark the turning points of time, that they themselves were wholly unmindful of the consequences of their own acts at that time.

For instance, it will be remembered, that when the crisis of our late Civil War was upon us many talked of the breeze that would blow off in 90 days. Poor short-sighted souls, they little thought that humanity was gathering its resistless might to take one more bloody step in the onward march of civilization. It will be remembered also, that when Luther, with a soul illuminated with a light from God, nailed his thesis to a church door at Wittenburg, Europe saw only one disaffected monk, and little thought that really the modern world was rousing itself to shake off the dogma-drugged sleep of the Middle Ages; when Copernicus, whose genius pierced the blue canopy of heaven and discovered the long-hidden story of the stars, died, after one look at his speedily forgotten volume, few imagined then that the old heavens had folded away like a scroll, a new earth given to men, and the former things had passed away; and when the hypocritical, self-glorified Pharisee had gotten rid of the troublesome Meddler from Nazareth and lay down to his triumph sleep, he little thought that he had pulled down his own temple about his ears and turned the disgrace of the cross into the symbol of a world-conquering religion.

With eyes blinded by the flamboyance of ephemeral authority, and ears filled with the flattery of the fawning, it is not surprising that one should be unable to see things in their due proportion and "not being possessed of the trance-prophetic eyes fail to observe the consummation of the centuries."

The flippancy and ignorant assumption of superiority which has characterized the discussion of the pending bill by some of the Senators who favor the measure has produced in me mingled feelings of amusement and apprehension. There is nothing so dangerous to the Republic as the stupid man in authority who is obsessed with the idea of his own infallibility. A few of us, profoundly impressed with the magnitude of the enterprise upon which the Nation is embarking, who would move cautiously in this fatal hour of our Nation's life, are sneeringly referred to as "pacifists," "slackers," or some other equally opprobrious epithet. Some of the miserably mendacious and slanderous newspapers have held us up to scorn and charged in direct terms that we are disloyal to the Government. A more flagitious falsehood never marred the pages of a prostituted sheet or polluted the lips of a dishonest man. I spurn the suggestion with ineffable contempt, and despise the power or person who would resort to such pusillanimous methods to effect his purpose.

Discussing conditions which existed in the life of the Roman Republic similar to that through which America is now passing, the wise historian, Froude, has said:

> The popular leader of the hour sees some present difficulty or present opportunity of distinction. He deals with each question as it arises, leaving future consequences to those who are to come after him.

Mark the striking similarity, the deadly parallel to the bandwagon statesman of to-day, who finds it necessary, in order to make himself secure in his own judgment, to question the motive of others. But, continuing:

> The situations change from period to period, and tendencies are generated with an accelerated force which when once established can never be reversed. When the control of reason is once removed, catastrophe is no longer distant, and then nations, like all organized creations, all forms of life, from the meanest flower to the highest human institution, pass through the inevitable recurring stages of growth, transformation, and decay.

"A commonwealth," says Cicero, the greatest of ancient statesmen, "ought to be immortal and forever renew its youth." Yet commonwealths have proven as unenduring as any other natural object.

> Everything that grows
> Holds in perfection but a little moment,
> And this huge state presenteth naught but shows
> Whereon the stars in silent influence comment.

And he was right. Republics have proven to be less enduring, probably more short lived, than any other form of government. That is due, probably, to the fact that it is the most artificial form of government. It is the only form of government among men where eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. It is because republics derive all of their just power from the consent of the governed, and unless the people are wise, vigilant, patriotic, and insist upon the exercise of the citizens' rights unhindered, performing without restraint or proscription the functions of the real ruler, the republic will cease to exist. It may be preserved in name, and the outward form may be observed, but the soul, the living vital part, will be dead. This Government of ours draws its life, its mind, its wealth, and its morals from the individual citizen, and because of the inherent qualities of the individual citizen, given free and full liberty of action and the exercise of intelligent judgment, the Republic has grown from a narrow strip of territory on the Atlantic coast to the most gigantic colossal in strength and wealth that the world has ever known.

Can the advice and wisdom of the men who builded so wisely and so well be safely disregarded in this hour of extraordinary emergency? Can we with safety throw aside the lessons learned from those heroic lives?

The able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] a day or two ago rather sneeringly referred to the errors which the Government of the United States had made in 1812, 1847, 1861, and 1898 in not having prepared for war. He draws a gloomy picture, in which the patriots and wise men of those days are presented as groping in the darkness, devoid of the higher attributes of prescience and forward looking, which happily glorifies the brain of the statesman of 1917.

The contrast which the learned Senator draws would be amusing if it were not so downright sad. To my mind it is the quintessence of pathos. It is a singular fact, Mr. President, that after every one of the mistakes pointed out by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, when the war was over and peace restored, the armies were disbanded, the advice of Jefferson regarding the danger involved in a large standing army was followed. The soldiers returned to the farm, the workshop, the factory, the banker's desk, the pulpit, and the lawyer's office, and America continued to grow and expand, throwing the effulgence of her splendid example over the benighted minds of the king-cursed peoples of the Old World until she reached the present unparalleled proportions. Jackson, the hero of New Orleans, did not approve a large standing army. Grant, the victor in one of the bloodiest wars of modern times, thought the soldier could serve his country best as a private citizen. Theodore Roosevelt, even after the War with Spain, was content with a small army. Thank God for the difference between the statesmen of bygone days and the present war-daft expounders of the Constitution and autocratic reflectors of the public will.

I believe a large standing army is a menace to free government, and I hope the time will never come when the American people will permit the maintenance of a standing army that will absorb the products of human toil and dominate public sentiment in this country to the detriment of the men and women whose labor and sacrifice feed and clothe the world, and finally the utter overthrow of free government. I believe, with the able occupant of the White House, in December, 1914, who has unhappily changed front on this question, that—

> We have always found means to defend ourselves against attacks, and shall find them whenever it is necessary without calling our people away from their necessary tasks to render compulsory military service in time of peace.

If our forefathers had been as much imbued with the military spirit and had followed the lead of the present propaganda for "preparedness" as seems to obsess the minds of some modern statesmen, America to-day would not be a free government deriving all of its just powers from the consent of the governed, but, on the contrary, I believe it would be a military despotism.

But, Mr. President, we are in a state of war—it is necessary that the Government should make every preparation essential to a successful termination of this conflict. I am willing to vote for a call to arms of 1,000,000 men or 2,000,000 or 5,000,000 if it is necessary. But I would include in that call men as well as boys. I would let the able-bodied citizen, whose heart is aflame with patriotic desire to serve his country, have an opportunity to serve regardless of the age limit. I would make it a volunteer army filled with the zeal and eagerness of the patriot. I voted to give the Chief Executive all the money that can prudently be spent at this time by him in maintaining our allies in this war and to organize and equip our own forces. I expect to be called upon in the very near future to vote for another bond issue, with an increased rate of interest, and I shall respond to that call.

I trust I may be permitted to digress just a moment to say that while we are discussing the question of compelling men to render military service, to offer up their lives on the field of battle for their country, I submit that it would not be out of place to consider for a moment the question of compelling the dollars that have been coined of the blood and tears of women and children, and men sacrificed upon the field of battle to do some service without pay in this war. The man who takes advantage of his country's misfortune to extort money from the taxpayers for the hire of his hoarded gold is entitled to the same affectionate consideration that I have for the nasty bird that follows in the wake of war and preys upon the soldier slain upon the battle field. If you are going to compel men to serve let us conscript a little of the unholy increment acquired during this unfortunate war. Posterity will be mortgaged to the fourth or fifth generations to pay the expenses of this devastating struggle. But the means, the sinews of war, must be provided, however heavily it may press down upon the aching stoop of the toiler. I should like to do everything the President thinks necessary to be done, but I can not get my consent to offer a deliberate affront to the patriotism of the American citizen, the man whose wisdom writes the law, whose labor produces the wealth of this Nation in time of peace, and whose strong arm fights the country's battles in time of war. I can not afford to question that man's patriotism by voting for a law compelling him to perform his duty to his country.

This man has done his duty to his country in the past. He has never faltered or proven recreant. He is not disloyal in the present emergency, and I think that he can be relied upon without compulsion to make any sacrifice, render any service necessary to keep the Stars and Stripes unstained and triumphant in the air. Compulsion is not necessary to meet the present emergency. I think that it is an insult to the patriotism of freemen, not needed now, and I would not vote for such a law to be used in creating a great standing Army for the future. I believe the psychological effect of such legislation upon the citizen will be bad. No man, however patriotic he may be, will entertain that same affectionate regard for a Government that will needlessly put such a stigma upon his patriotism.

If from the people all the just powers of government are derived, can not the people be trusted to furnish the force necessary to uphold in honor the flag of their Nation? It is their country and not the private property of the few who are accidently in authority in Washington to-day. Must European autocracy be imitated in America in order that free institutions may live on the Western Hemisphere? Can we wage a successful war against European autocracy while at the same time we are laying the foundation for a European autocracy on American soil? Is it possible that all wisdom, all patriotic devotion to country, and loyalty to principle are reposed in the brains and hearts of the few men who are to-day temporarily residing in the District of Columbia? Are the lessons of the past to be thrown in the wastebasket while the untried, book-taught professional soldier writes the laws to govern a free people? The soldier who would rather serve a monarchy than a republic?

I am not going to vote for compulsory service until I am convinced that the majority of the American people are cravens and must be driven as dumb brutes to defend their country's cause. If the people are given a chance in this emergency, they will do their duty as they have always done it. But if the high ideals which led them in the past have been abandoned and they shall prove recreant and refuse to answer the call of the President to arms, then I shall vote to enact such autocratic laws as the present bill. Compulsory service has been tried in the past and has proven a failure. The conscript and convict have been held by patriotic brave men in equal contempt. The republic that must be defended by a conscripted soldiery has about run its course and ought to change its form of government.

I admit that conscription has been resorted to in England as a last resort in the present war, but I also assert with pride and gratification that the free governments under the English flag have declined to use the undemocratic method of compulsory service. Australia, with a population of about 5,000,000 white people, has contributed an army of over 300,000 brave and patriotic soldiers. Canada has given to the mother country from her limited population 400,000 dauntless heroes, many of whose lives have been sacrificed and whose blood has been shed as a glorious offering upon the altar of their country's cause. No, Mr. President, I shall not by my vote write upon the statute books an affront to the manhood of America. I shall not vote to put the shackles of the culprit upon the wrist of that brave American boy, the priceless jewel of a fond mother's heart and the inestimable asset of this Nation. I shall not even question their loyalty; but, on the contrary, I shall indulge the hope, and act upon the assumption, that the spirit of the glorious past still animates the lives of our men of the present day.

But it is maintained that certain men—men of certain vocations—could better serve their country on the farm, in the workshop, and other places where their talents are needed. I am willing to concede that, but the selective plan can be carried out quite as well by the volunteer system as by going out and taking the citizen by the collar with the strong arm of the law and forcing him to perform certain services to his Government without consulting him. The strength of this Republic, I repeat, Mr. President, consists not in its lines of transportation, its banks, broad acres, rich mines, and other material resources, but rather in the moral qualities and intellectual acquirements of the men and women who compose its citizenship.

> Not in hewn stones,
> Nor well-fashioned beams,
> Not in the noblest of the builder's dreams;
> But in courageous men of purpose great,
> There is the fortress, there is the living state.

The independence of the American citizen must not be abridged or limited. His marvelously fruitful initiative must not be hindered, crippled, or discouraged. Those qualities of mind and soul have made this country great. They can be relied upon in the future to preserve its institutions and promote its well-being.

It is the duty of the Government to assist the citizen in every way consistent with the principles underlying our system of government. But that help should be for the support rather than the direction of the citizen.

The pages of American history are illuminated with deeds of heroism, of wisdom, and the patriotic devotion of our people to the flag. In the halls of state, on the hustings, on the field of battle, in scientific research, in agriculture, and in all the industrial arts, America, notwithstanding her youth, has led the world. Can the Congress afford at this time to imitate the effete autocracies of Europe which have brought the world to the present sad plight and discredit and dishonor the qualities of mind and soul that have created a civilization which challenges the admiration of mankind and commands the emulation of the world? God forbid. Let us not forget American history and the salutory lessons it teaches.

Speaking of the volunteer and his great service to his country, one of America's greatest orators has said, "It is a sight worth the genius of our great Republic to behold at the country's call great armies leap forth in battle array, and when their services are no longer needed to return again to the communities whence they came. And thus the dark thunder cloud at nature's summons marshals its black battalions and lowers upon the horizon at length, its lightning spent, its dread artillery silenced, disbanding its frowning ranks, it melts into blue ether, and the next morning you will find it in the dewdrop, upon the flower, or assisting with its kindly moisture in the growth of the young and tender plant. Great and glorious country is this, where every citizen can be readily converted into an efficient soldier and forthwith after the war is over return to his home a peaceful, self-sustaining, self-governing, self-supporting, law-abiding, private citizen."

The safety of the Nation is with the people, and my faith in their loyalty and devotion to the flag bids me trust them absolutely.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator desire to conclude to-night?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to yield at any time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Quite a number of Senators are tired, having been here pretty steadily all day; and I will ask the Senator if it will be agreeable to him to resume his remarks in the morning?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be very glad to resume in the morning.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 2. (By Senator Ronan.)

To the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska in session assembled herewith extends to the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives its approval of the passage of the resolution "that a state of war exists" between the United States and the German Empire; and we, the people of Alaska, pledge our unfaltering support and signify our readiness to loyally and patriotically stand in line with the American people in maintaining the country's honor and defendng the principles of civilization.

The attitude of the people of Alaska is clearly expressed in the words of our governor, spoken upon the declaration of war.

"This is a time in the history of our country which calls for self-sacrifice and devotion to those democratic institutions and ideals that have been a beacon light to the 'oppressed of all nation'; and now, in obedience to those principles of right and truth and justice, in the struggle now being waged between the forces of democracy and autocracy, the citizens of this great Republic may be depended upon to act well their part. There should be no division of sentiment, but each and all, laying aside every consideration of partisanism, should remember that they are called upon to defend those great truths upon which this Republic was founded, and should uphold and strengthen the hands of the President and his administration in the international crisis that has been forced upon the country. The time for action is here, and I am sure that the peop'e of Alaska stand ready to do their part, and to do it well The fires of patriotism have been kindled anew, and Alaskans are ready to respond whenever duty calls."

GOVERNOR OF ALASKA.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss.

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of Alaska, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of senate joint resolution No. 2, of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, passed at the third session thereof.

Mr. JAMES. I present a resolution adopted by the Louisville (Ky.) Optimistics Club, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., April 24, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Be it resolved by the Optimistics Club of Louisville, That we strongly urge the passage of the selective-draft bill as prepared by the General Staff of the United States Army. The volunteer system is not only unreliable from the standpoint of raising an army, but it is unfair, and it takes out of the industries of the country the sort of men that are needed in these industries. The selective draft will take men from all classes, and largely a class of men who have not yet achieved such positions in industry as make it difficult to fill their places.

Passed by unanimous vote, April 24.

LOUISVILLE OPTIMISTICS CLUB.

Mr. KNOX presented resolutions adopted by the congregations of sundry churches in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented 57 telegrams from citizens and firms in the State of Michigan, praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Charlotte, Tarboro, and Statesville, all in the State of North Carolina, praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. I present a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 3. (By A. A. Allan.)

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska respectfully represents that—

Whereas the prime essential to the development of the vast resources of Alaska is transportation; and

Whereas railroad and steamship facilities are inadequate to such development unless supplemented by a system of wagon roads and trails, and Congress has recognized this fact by repeated appropriations for such purposes; and

Whereas the annual appropriation for the construction of roads and trails in Alaska was not made the last session of Congress, and the failure of Congress to make appropriation at this special session will not only paralyze the efforts of the road commission for future developments but, by preventing necessary repairs and maintenance, will result in the great deterioration of the roads already constructed, to the great loss of the Territory and of the United States; and

Whereas the construction of an adequate road system in Alaska will not only open for development immense areas of mineral, coal, and lands suitable for farming and cattle grazing, but will afford an invaluable asset to the United States in case of war; and

Whereas the Legislature of Alaska has created Territorial road commissions to supplement the work of the United States road commission and will appropriate moneys to this end to the extent of its financial ability; and

Whereas the Territorial road construction to be of any considerable value must be tributary to and an extension of Government construction; and

Whereas the discontinuation of governmental policy of road construction in Alaska would result in a loss to the Territory and to the United States far greater than the sum asked by the Secretary of War for maintenance and construction, and would be, under the circumstances, utter folly: Now, therefore:

We, your memorialists, urgently call your attention to the situation as above presented and respectfully but earnestly represent that the sum of $500,000, requested in Senate amendment, in lines 7 to 11, on page 55 of House of Representatives bill No. 20783, for appropriation for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails in Alaska, should be allowed.

We, your memorialists, will ever pray.

Passed the house March 30, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I present resolutions adopted by a number of patriotic societies of Baltimore, Md., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a large, enthusiastic meeting of a number of patriotic societies of Baltimore City, Md., including the Department of Maryland, Grand Army of the Republic, and Confederate Veterans, held under the auspices of the Frederick County Colony in Baltimore, at Odd Fellows Temple, Baltimore City, Md., on Thursday evening, April 19, 1917 (the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, April 19, 1775), the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas a state of war now exists between the United States of America and Germany, forced upon the Government and the people of the United States by reason of the murder of its defenseless men, women, and children and the destruction of their property, as well as an intriguing attempt to dismember its territory, and that it is the imperative duty of all loyal citizens to assist in the vindication of their lives and properties; and

"Whereas it is a wise policy to profit by the experience of existing as well as past events: Therefore be it

"Resolved—

"First. That it is the sense of this meeting that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to stand by the President of the United States, by enacting such laws as will immediately require a rigid conscription of its physically qualified citizens for military or naval service, as occasion may require, offering, at the same time, to its patriotic citizenship an opportunity to volunteer their services.

"Second. That copies of this resolution, properly attested, be sent to the President of the United States and the Senators and Members of Congress from Maryland."

We hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of preamble and resolution passed at the meeting as aforesaid.

GEO. W. F. VERNON, President.
JOHN E. H. RINE, Secretary.

Whereas the Hon. Emerson C. Harrington, governor of the State of Maryland, has heretofore appointed a committee known as the Preparedness and Survey Commission, and a committee known as the County Agents Advisory Committee; and

Whereas at a joint meeting of said committees held on the 19th day of April, 1917, in the city of Baltimore, the Hon. Emerson C. Harrington, governor of Maryland, addressed said joint committees; and

Whereas it is the sense of these committees that one of the greatest needs of the farmers and one of the most difficult problems for them to solve is the securing of sufficient amount of potash to produce even average crops; and

Whereas said committees are advised that there are deposits of potash rock in the United States which have not been developed commercially, and which probably could not be worked economically after the termination of the war in competition with Germany, and that therefore the manufacture of potash in the United States has not and is not likely to be entered into upon a sufficiently large scale by private capital to meet the necessary demands of agriculture: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of these joint committees that Congress be recommended to provide as an emergency and defense measure for the manufacture and sale by the United States Government to farmers at a reasonable price of potash for fertilizer; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress representing the State of Maryland.

CHAS. J. FOX,
Chairman joint committees.

Whereas the Hon. Emerson C. Harrington, governor of the State of Maryland, has heretofore appointed a committee known as the Preparedness and Survey Commission and a committee known as the County Agents Advisory Committee; and

Whereas at a joint meeting of said committees held on the 19th day of April, 1917, in the city of Baltimore, the Hon. Emerson C. Harrington, governor of Maryland, addressed said joint committees; and

Whereas it is the sense of said committees that in order effectively and fairly to raise armed forces and at the same time encourage the production of food products, in order that there may be no shortage in the food supply of this country, the selective-draft plan of raising such army as recommended by the President of the United States is the only effective and fair method of recruiting without depleting the farms of farm labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That these committees hereby urge the passage by Congress of the bill recommended by the President of the United States for the raising of an army by the selective-draft plan; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress representing the State of Maryland.

CHAS. J. FOX,
Chairman joint committees.

MOBILIZATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have received a cablegram from Mr. David Lubin, American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, and a statement as to world conditions regarding agriculture. It is a comparatively short statement, and, coming from the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, I should like to have the cablegram and the statement printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The cablegram and statement are as follows:

ROME, April 2, 1917.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

War situation bearing on economic condition and grave additional world cereal shortage render mobilization of agriculture imperative. Strongly advise you, with committee of Senate and House, to consult President on immediate passage of bill for national chamber of agriculture. Wire result of your action.

LUBIN.

THE MOBILIZATION OF AGRICULTURE—A WAR MEASURE.

WORLD CONDITIONS SHOWING THE NEED FOR THE PASSAGE OF SENATE BILL 5973 FOR A NATIONAL CHAMBER OF AGRICULTURE.

The institute's report on cereals shows that, bad as was the situation in October, 1916, it has grown even worse in March, 1917. Instead of a reserve there is now a deficit of cereals (wheat, rye, barley, oats, maize) for all the countries open to trade (exclusive, therefore, of Russia and Roumania). This deficit amounts to 35,000,000 quintals less than the normal requirements.

The following quotations are from the proof sheets of the institute's half-yearly statistical report on cereals for April, 1917, pages 20–23:

"Germany: A decree of October 28, 1914, forbids the use of wheat and rye for feeding live stock. In January, 1915, this interdiction was extended to oats, except in the case of horses, whose ration was fixed at 1½ kilograms per day.

"On January 25, 1915, a decree was issued requisitioning all stocks of wheat and rye and rye, barley, and oat meal.

"By a decree of June, 1916, the wheat and rye crops of 1916 and all supplies of flour were requisitioned, and on July 24 this measure was extended to barley and oats.

"On March 1, 1917, the Imperial Bureau of Cereals ordered that 94 pounds of flour were to be obtained from every 100 pounds of wheat and 84 pounds from every 100 pounds of rye.

"A decree of October 24, 1914, ordered that wheat bread was to contain at least 10 per cent of rye flour and rye bread at least 5 per cent of potato flour. On January 5, 1915, the order was to mix 30 per cent of rye flour in wheat bread and 10 to 30 per cent of potato flour in rye bread.

"The daily ration of bread has been fixed in January, 1916, at 200 grammes per head.

"A decree of June 26, 1916, requires all townships of more than 40,000 inhabitants to collect all the kitchen waste and remainders from meals, such as broken bread, relics of vegetables, fruit, meat, fish, soup, sauce, potatoes, including skins, and to keep them in special boxes. A penalty of 6 months imprisonment or 1,500 francs fine is provided for those who fail to collect such broken victuals or who steal them from the boxes provided for that purpose.

"Austria: A decree of January 30, 1915, provides that the flour used in making bread must consist half in wheat or rye flour and half of other farinaceous stuffs.

"A decree of February 21, 1915, requisitioned all stocks of cereals and flour; a decree of June 21, 1915, requisitioned all the 1915 crops; and a decree of June 11, 1916, requisitioned all the crops of 1916.

"A decree of March 26, 1915, fixes the ration of flour per inhabitant at 200 grams per day and introduced bread and flour cards.

"Hungary: A decree of September 8, 1916, requisitioned all stocks of wheat, rye, barley, and oats, and on the 29th of September, 1916, this measure was extended to include maize.

"A decree of February 16, 1915, ordered that 50 per cent of maize flour or 25 per cent of potato flour was to be used in bread making.

"France: A ministerial decree closed all confectioners' shops on Tuesdays and Wednesdays. A decree of February 9, 1917, forbids the sale of new bread.

"Great Britain and Ireland: A Government commission has the monopoly of importing and distributing in Great Britain and Ireland all foreign wheat, maize, and rice.

"Bread must be one day old before it can be sold. It is forbidden to use milk and sugar in baking bread. The food controller has fixed the ration of bread and flour at 4 pounds per inhabitant per week.

"Italy: A decree of February 21, 1917, orders that 90 pounds of flour shall be obtained from every 100 pounds of wheat.

"A decree of December 12, 1916, enacts restrictions on the consumption of food in hotels, pensions, restaurants, cafes, dairy shops, etc., and forbids certain foods on certain days, limits the number of dishes which may be served, etc. A decree of March 10, 1917, forbids the sale of all cakes and confectionery."

For the first time since the Crimean War the price of bread in this country is to be raised to a shilling for a 4-pound loaf. * * *

The country was led to concentrate its attention upon meatless days and potatoless days, and up till now has paid very insufficient attention to the even more pressing question of bread. * * * If it is necessary to prescribe the number of ounces of meat which may be consumed at a meal in a hotel, as undoubtedly it is, why not rigidly limit the bread also? * * * The teashop requires scrutiny just as much as the restaurant. * * * Three meals a day and nothing between, ought now to be the extreme limit for everybody in the land. We shall be lucky if we do not in the end get down to two meals a day.

Possibly domiciliary search for food hoards has become necessary. * * * The food controller's suggested order touches every householder in the land, and might easily become a cause of widespread irritation.

A further reduction of the sugar ration is about to be promulgated.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Eternal Spirit, we approach Thee in the faith and confidence inspired by the world's great religious teacher, that Thou art a God hearing and a God answering prayer. We need the inspiration of Thy presence moment by moment, hour by hour, as the years come and go. Guide us in the great problems which confront us in the present crisis, that we may fulfill our obligations to mankind and lead on to larger and nobler life. We thank Thee for the distinguished guests from our sister nations here to consult our leaders in this hour of trial, that we may be united in thought and purpose against a common foe. Hear us and thus guide them and us by Thy counsels. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Committee on Rules is not very active this session.

Mr. PARK. They are going to be very soon.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question if they will be pretty soon. I do not think there is need of an extra clerk, the Committee on Rules having no rules to present to the House.

Mr. MANN. Is that for the session or for the Congress?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 3545.

Mr. MANN. Pending that, by uanimous consent, may I ask the gentleman whether, under the agreement entered into last night, the understanding is that general debate closes to-day?

Mr. DENT. No, sir; that was not the understanding. We have not reached any agreement on that subject yet.

Mr. MANN. Well, there was a question. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to have the general debate run not later than 10 o'clock to-night. That was not intended to close debate, then?

Mr. DENT. No; that was not intended to close debate then, unless we can reach an agreement during the day to that effect and the matter is again submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3545, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the traditional method of raising American troops is by the volunteer system. We fought our Indian wars with Volunteers. We fought our colonial wars with Volunteers. Washington never commanded a conscript. The men who added glory to the American arms in 1812 were Volunteers. The Americans who broke the proud spirit of the veterans of the Spanish Peninsula at New Orleans were Tennessee and Kentucky Volunteers. The Mexican War was fought by men who had voluntarily given their service. They were not humble conscripts. They were not soldier-slaves, driven to the flag.

Is there any truthful man who will dare say that conscripts added anything to the undying glory that attaches to the flag of the Southern Confederacy, to the Stars and Bars? Is there a man so unmindful of our proud American traditions as that he would claim that in 1861 to 1865 any conscript contributed anything to the deeds of imperishable valor and courage that crowned the Union Armies with victory? There were no conscripts in 1898. Never down to this good day has it been proposed to place our flag in the hands of conscripts and to rest for the preservation of American honor upon men who are driven by compulsion into the ranks.

The men who propose at this time that we should commit an act are bound to give us some sound reasons for their position. It must be no mere matter of temporary convenience. It must be no mere whim. It must not be to satisfy anybody's selfish interest. It must not be for the purpose of perpetuating in this free land of a system of compulsory military service. It must have no ulterior motive. It must have for its object the winning of this war.

Men who take that position are bound at the outset to give us some good and satisfactory reasons for this radical change. Have Americans lost their courage? Is patriotism gone out of the land? Are we no longer free men, willing to fight for our institutions? Have we forgotten our glorious past? Have we come down at last to the worship of money and ease and selfishness?

I say it is not so. Any man who would take such a position is an unjust and libelous traducer of the fair name of our America. Any man who would impute to our people a lack of patriotism and devotion; who would say that we are less capable than the English to defend our institutions; who would say we are not as patriotic as our neighbors on the north, the Canadians; who would say that we are not able to hold up the memories and traditions that have honored this country in the past, would utter a libel on his country and his time. Surely there is none who will so befoul the time in which he lives.

We have been offered some reasons for this measure, and I want to discuss those reasons. We have been offered reasons for public consumption. We have been offered reasons to appeal to the mob with. We have been offered reasons with which corrupt newspapers may lash the unthinking into a fury. But have we been offered any reasons that should appeal to patriots and to thoughtful, sensible men? That is the question.

A PROBLEM FOR STATESMEN.

I am amazed to see men of intelligence and patriotism standing up and saying that we ought to leave all this question to the President's military advisers; that we ought to let Regular Army officers settle this matter for the American people. If it were a mere military matter, I should agree with that proposition. If it were merely a matter of how many men it takes to conduct a campaign when the campaign is laid out, if it were a matter of the best means to arm men and how they should be drilled and sent against the foe, then I would abide the opinion of some epauletted general on the subject.

But this is not a military problem. The military feature is the smallest aspect of it. It is a social question; it is an industrial question. In the big way it is not a question for soldiers. It is a question for statesmen. God grant that the American Congress can produce statesmen, enough real statesmen, to deal with a subject like this in a time like this! Are we men sent here with a commission by the people of the United States or are we contemptible cowards? Will we shift our responsibility to the shoulders of somebody else? Will we allow a lot of little editors from the back rooms of their publishing houses to dictate to us, who represent the majesty of the American people? If we are content to do that, then we may well say that some little whippersnapper of an Army officer should tell the American people what they are to do. But if we are men, and willing to meet our responsibilities as men, let us decide upon this question just as we do upon other questions, upon its merits. If we do our duty here we must deal with this matter not as one of mere military expediency but as one that touches the whole life and the vitals of the Nation. We should deal with it for ourselves like men. Let no man plead moral bankruptcy when he goes before his people.

This is much more of a social and industrial question than anything else. The people who want it—not you, gentlemen, but the people who have inspired this campaign; you know who they are—are concerned with it in its social and industrial aspects. The same ones are clamoring for conscription now that have been clamoring for it for the past two years.

Our country is now at war. We have our part to play in the terrible tragedy heretofore confined to the stage of the Old World. The vital question of the hour is how we may win the war as speedily as possible and at the least cost in blood, treasure, and American ideals.

The contest which has been going on in our country for the past two years between the conscriptionists and those who oppose that system has completely changed its aspect. The shallow arguments in favor of conscription in time of peace are no longer applicable. The pretexts that conscription is needed for its effect upon the public health, the discipline of youth, teaching respect for property, and docility to the people are now spent. Nothing that could be said on behalf of conscription in time of peace can now truthfully be said. On the other hand, every argument which has ever been made against conscription remains in effect and is stronger in the present crisis.

Although this is true, we find the same forces that originated the idea of conscription in time of peace solidly aligned in behalf of conscription in time of war. They have recruited their ranks from the frightened and thoughtless, but the commanders of the undemocratic array consist of the old guard of munitions makers, war contractors, captains of industry, Wall Street speculators, metropolitan financiers, reactionary and corrupt newspapers and all their crowd of underlings and liberty-hating parasites, snobs, and flatterers. This motley array, beating their tomtoms of fear, now are seeking to drive the Nation into the conscription trap. As was said publicly by the most prominent conscriptionist among them just before war was declared, "Now is our chance to get permanent compulsory military service. Let's make our big drive for it now while the people are excited over the war."

REASONS FOR CONSCRIPTION NOW.

In his recent letter to Representative HELVERING, of Kansas, President Wilson gave as the sole reason why conscription should be adopted at this time that those should be chosen as soldiers who could be most readily spared from other pursuits.

To say the least of it this is an inconclusive reason. The same rules may as well be applied in accepting volunteers as in selective conscription. The idea is that men occupied in necessary callings such as food and munitions production should be continued at their work, and that men who are engaged in producing luxuries and other unnecessary pursuits should be first taken for the Army. Clearly there is not the slightest reason why when a volunteer offers to enlist his occupation may not be ascertained, and if it should be one of the necessary occupations that he should be rejected. This was the course taken by the British in their enlistments and worked well; it is the method followed in Canada to-day. Surely we are not to abandon our traditional American voluntary system on such a flimsy pretext.

In shocking inconsistency with the President's argument, over 3,000 men daily are even now being recruited for the Army and Navy. More than 50,000 have been recruited since April 1. These recruits are taken indiscriminately from industry. No questions are asked as to their usefulness in their callings. They are being recruited in flat violation of the policy announced by the President.

The argument is inconsistent in itself since the plan is to conscript the least useful men between the ages of 19 and 25, so that all of the useless—call them slackers and cowards if you choose—between 25 and 45 go scot-free. Any sensible system of selective conscription would take the least useful of all ages fit for military service. What argument can there be for omitting loafers, slackers, and useless men between 25 and 45 and victimizing only the young. Is this to be a boys' war?

Another claim for conscription heard in some quarters, but not mentioned by the President, is that the voluntary system takes the best, bravest, and most patriotic and requires them to fight the battles of the country while the cowards, slackers, and useless are permitted to remain at home. This is a claim that is likely to be given some weight by the uninformed. In truth, however, it is not sustained by the facts and experience which show that very largely the same classes volunteer in time of war that enlist in the Regular Army in time of peace. There are, it is true, a small percentage of highly patriotic men who enlist in time of war, but usually these do not compose one-fourth of the total. The remainder who volunteer are adventurous spirits, men out of employment, the thoughtless, the ne'er-do-wells, the discontented, and other similar classes.

In a typical company of volunteers called during the Spanish War it was found that 18 were men who had left responsible positions and enlisted from a sense of patriotic duty; 22 were immature boys who had been overpersuaded by the recruiting officer, and who were in school or had no regular occupations; 23 for social reasons had previously served in the National Guard and felt obligated to volunteer; 24 were workmen out of jobs; 14 were idlers, transients, or nondescripts and could not be classified; 3 were freshly landed immigrants who had not become settled in the country. All of them were, no doubt, influenced to a large extent by curiosity, the spirit of adventure, and the persuasion of recruiters.

I would not, of course, leave the impression that in a war of the magnitude of the present volunteer regiments would be composed of identical material with those in the Spanish War. Also manifestly it must be impossible to learn with certainty a soldier's motive for enlisting. Again, perhaps, every volunteer has mixed motives. It is a fact, however, which will not be denied by anyone having a thorough first-hand knowledge of the subject that a majority of those who volunteer do not do so from high motives of pure patriotism, and that usually other factors than an unmixed sense of duty control. Those who have studied the subject will agree that men of the highest character and the keenest sense of duty may not as a rule be the first to volunteer. Such men have conflicting obligations which they weigh carefully. On the other hand the imprudent, the adventurous, the thoughtless, the shiftless, the homeless, these comprise a majority of those who are first attracted to the recruiting office. The voluntary system in chief drains away the surplus men, not the ones who are most useful. Men who are highly skilled in their trades or who have permanent positions and draw good wages are the ones who sacrifice most and hence are slow to enlist.

TROOPS RAISED MORE QUICKLY BY VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

One of the false arguments put forth by the conscriptionists is that we have need for great armies immediately, and that troops may be raised more quickly by conscription. The fact is, as experts from the War Department admit, our armies may be recruited more rapidly by the voluntary system. To put conscription in force the entire country must be organized, agencies established, and all men subject to service enumerated and registered. This is a much larger task than taking a mere population census and would require several months' time and cost a great deal of money. The lowest official estimate of time within which men of desired ages may be registered is three months. When this is finished the process of selection and examination may proceed. Regiments must be constituted and organized outright. Conservative expert opinion is that if conscription is used it will be not less than five months before any substantial number of soldiers can be put in training.

On the other hand, if volunteers are called for they will be raised in companies and regiments and turned over to the Government as complete units. Sixty days will be sufficient to bring them into the field. Many men who have served in the Regular Army or in the National Guard and are already trained will enlist. The training will be well underway in 60 days.

It is a fact, however, that there is no occasion for haste in getting the men assembled. Under the national-defense act of 1916 the Government is already authorized by law to raise 641,000 volunteers and to increase the Regular Army to 287,000, total troops now authorized being 928,000. No effort is being made to fill up the National Guard organizations. The fact is that the War Department has not got supplies for the men already authorized, neither uniforms, guns, nor other equipment. Notwithstanding the appropriation for the Army of $287,000,000 made a year ago, there are no arms and equipment on hand sufficient for even 500,000 men. It will take until July 1 next to accumulate equipment for 500,000 men, and even at that time there will be no heavy cannon for these men. Although the money for the purpose was appropriated last year and is still in hand, no heavy cannon will be available for seven months yet.

In a recent statement Mr. Secretary Baker said:

> We will have enough supplies and equipment of all kinds, except, of course, heavy ordnance and things of that sort, which require a long time in the making, for 500,000 men by the 1st of July, and we will have adequate supplies of all kinds, except, of course, these long time-consuming constructions of heavy ordnance and things of that kind, for 1,000,000 men inside of eight months.

The Army has at this time only 690,000, all told, of the regulation rifle now in use. This includes all rifles in the hands of the Regular Army and National Guard. These rifles can not be obtained by contract, and the supply has increased only about 13,000 during the past year. Our new armies will have to be equipped with the English Enfield rifle, not so good a gun as the one now in use; and even these rifles are yet to be manufactured, and months will be consumed in producing a sufficient number.

I do not mention these facts to call attention to the shocking inefficiency of the bureaus charged with accumulating supplies for the Army. It has been no fault of Congress, for Congress has made the necessary appropriations. Congress has done all that it was asked to do. I refer to the situation to show those who press for the immediate enlistment of large numbers of men that we have no use for the men at this time. We have for them neither arms, equipment, nor supplies. They could do nothing, not even be trained, if they were now brought into the field. The question of speed in recruiting is therefore not important. Even were haste required, armies could be raised more speedily by the voluntary system than by conscription.

"AVOID BRITISH BLUNDERS."

We hear the cry from the conscriptionists that we should "avoid British blunders." By this glittering generality the impression is sought to be made that Britain's failure of complete success in the war has been due to the failure to adopt conscription at the beginning. This is a grossly false impression. The British have blundered in handling troops in the field and in other military and political measures. They blundered in failing to furnish their troops with an adequate supply of heavy guns and ammunition, but it can not be honestly said that there has been a blunder in their method of raising men by the voluntary system. Britain entered the war with only 175,000 regular soldiers. To January, 1916, in the British Isles alone over 5,000,000 men had been raised as volunteers. A conscription law was then passed, and something like 1,000,000 additional have since been brought under arms. To-day five out of every six men in the British Army are volunteers.

Canada has raised 400,000 men, and yet has not adopted nor have her people even considered adopting conscription.

What a commentary! The great United States, with its 100,000,000 population, with no immediate need for men and no ability to equip them, with no chance to send them to the battle field, proposes to start the war with conscription when little Canada, with less than one-tenth of our population—our immediate neighbor on the north and much the same kind of people that we are—has not even proposed conscription to this time.

Australia has also raised about 400,000 volunteers. In October, 1916, a proposition for conscription was submitted to the people of Australia and was voted down by a decisive majority.

What a commentary! Are we less democratic than the British Islands? Are we less democratic than Canada and Australia? Are we more willing to surrender our liberties and submit to an odious system of forced military service than they?

The British at all times have had plenty of men. The men were brought to the colors faster than they could be equipped. For 12 months after certain regiments had been raised they marched to and fro on Salisbury Plain, without ever having had guns in their hands. Soldiers without arms! Britain has always had the men, but she went into the war unprepared in the sense that she did not have the supplies, equipment, and the munitions. Her factories had not been organized so as to produce these articles for war. It is only now when Britain's industrial activities are coordinated for the production of war supplies that she is able to put forth her full strength. A conscript in camp is worth nothing without equipment. You can not train him. He is useless, a mere idler.

The British blunder was not in failing to take adequate measures to raise the human material for war, but in failing to foresee the immense consumption of munitions and supplies on the battle field. We have already committed the British blunder in that our officers charged with the duty of spending the money that Congress appropriated have not accumulated sufficient arms and supplies for armies that we wish to raise, and these essentials will not be available for several months yet.

As a matter of fact, conscription was never necessary in Britain. As finally adopted it does not apply to Ireland. It was adopted as a political measure rather than a military necessity. Britain has her conscriptionists, her privileged and selfish classes who have been clamoring for conscription for years. It is from them that our conscriptionists have borrowed their methods. The British conscriptionists comprise a powerful political faction; through their newspapers they hammered the Government constantly. They criticized and bullied and finally the British Government gave in. Conscription in Britain was adopted to disarm the political opposition of the conscriptionists, not because it was necessary to carry on the war.

REASONS OF THE MILITARY SATRAPY.

The powers which are seeking to fix a system of conscription upon us have one set of reasons that they give to the public, another set which they privately entertain. One reason which influences military circles is the desire to increase the numbers of the Army so as to multiply opportunities for promotion and to give an excuse for larger pay and higher rank and honors. Their objection to the National Guard and to any system of volunteering is based on their opposition to men from civil life coming into the Army as officers. The average Regular Army officer cherishes an intense caste spirit. He hates Volunteer officers, for they are his rivals. They receive rank and position which he regards as his exclusive prerogative. According to the standard of the Regular Army officer, the Volunteer officer is too democratic, too much at home with his men—treats the enlisted men with entirely too much consideration and good fellowship. He is a source of irritation in a system of rigid caste and tends to disrupt the iron discipline which would create an impassible social gulf between officer and men.

The average Army officer lives in a rigid groove of caste prejudice and professional practices. The Volunteer officer tends to disrupt this system. He brings in new ideas. He has a free and easy way of overturning precedent and ripping red tape, cardinal sins in Army circles.

The iron determination of the Regular Army officers in favor of conscription at this time as opposed to the National Guard and all other voluntary systems is based on the desire to keep the National Guard officers out of the Army, especially officers of high rank. Necessarily many thousands of new officers must be admitted, but these in the main will be unformed boys of the upper classes, who may be easily shaped into the Army caste, and all new officers will be given only the most subordinate places. The vast increase in our troops furnishes a golden opportunity for officers of the Regular Army, opportunity for rapid promotion and wide influence. With 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 men in the field every Regular Army officer of the age of 30 or thereabouts will become in due course, and without effort or merit on his part, of rank as high as colonel. Already they propose to abolish the rank of brigadier general, so that from colonel hundreds will jump to the rank of major general, with its pay of $9,300 per year. Others still will be lieutenant generals, and perhaps will go forward until we vie with the military systems of Europe with field marshals of incredibly large pay, honors, and authority.

These are the prizes for which the Regular Army men are fighting. Personal prizes, not prizes of patriotism. Small wonder, then, that the Government's military advisers are unanimous for conscription.

Perhaps there may be hope for a slightly increased efficiency under the organization which the Regular Army proposes. There will be few politicians given opportunities to make names as Army officers, and for this let us be thankful. Men are to be enlisted in regiments without regard to the localities from which they come. They are to be fed into regiments wherever required. It will be less trouble to pick up a conscript and send him into a remote regiment to fill a vacancy than to regiment men from various States and localities together. This, so the Regular Army says, is in the interest of efficiency. There will be no Alabama troops, no Ohio troops, merely troops of the United States—conscripts all.

I believe that men will make better soldiers fighting alongside their friends. Boys will be desperately homesick, driven into strange regiments without friends, acquaintances, or anyone from home, and I do not believe the system proposed by the Regular Army will in this respect make for the highest efficiency. I do not believe that the fighting qualities of an army so organized will equal that of American troops organized under the old system, where friend stood along with friend and brother by brother's side.

MOTIVES OF CONSCRIPTIONISTS.

The civilian conscriptionist has even less creditable motives than his associate in military life. For the past two years an energetic and expensive propaganda has been carried on in this country in favor of compulsory military service. This propaganda has been through books and publications issued in its behalf and the parasite newspaper organs of the selfish interests which were advocating it, by paid lecturers sent over the country, by motion pictures, and in other ways. This propaganda had its origin and has been financially supported by small groups located in financial and industrial centers and whose identity is well known.

When it appeared that war with Germany would be declared these selfish groups redoubled their activities. As stated by one of their leaders, the war seemed to be the best chance they would ever have of putting their scheme through, so they sought to strike while the iron was hot. A special effort was made, their vicious newspapers redoubled their efforts, prominent lecturers were sent into various centers upon various pretexts to rouse the people, to frighten them, and to prepare the way for what was to follow.

On the day before war was declared there came to me through the mail a number of pamphlets, letters, and so forth, urging a declaration of war upon Germany. This propaganda came from certain conscriptionist sources and had a common purpose. I read it with interest. One leaflet was from the Yale Club, of New York, and recited pompously that "We men of Yale" demand war with Germany, and followed that by a demand for the immediate inauguration of a system of compulsory military service. Another leaflet was from the Tavern Club, of Boston; another from the Harvard Club; another from the American Rights League, signed by Joseph H. Choate, George De Haven Putman, Elihu Root, and others. Another pamphlet was from the Union League Club, of New York, and there were others from similar exclusive organizations. This propaganda came from the most reactionary sources in the United States, the most undemocratic sources, the least enlightened sources, from those who had constantly championed conscription in time of peace as a means to discipline youth, teach respect for law, order, and property, make society more stable, and to create a reservoir of reserves to be drawn upon in case of war. Not one of the arguments which had previously been used by these conscriptionists is now assigned by anyone connected with the Government in behalf of the proposed conscription legislation.

All of these pieces of propaganda were in substance the same. They first demanded war with Germany and, second, demanded conscription. In no instance were the reasons which are now given assigned for the latter demand.

I have before me the publication from the Union League Club, of New York. It contains the report of a special committee which, among others, included Robert Bacon, George F. Baker, Cornelius N. Bliss, jr., Joseph H. Choate, Henry P. Davison, Chauncey M. Depew, Samuel W. Fairchild, Clarence H. Mackay, Frank A. Munsey, Ogden Mills Reid, Elihu Root, Herbert L. Satterlee, Theodore N. Vail, and Cornelius Vanderbilt.

Anyone acquainted with American finance and big business will at once recognize these names. They are identified with all that is monopolistic, oppressive, and unjust in American business life. They and their associates are the men who practically run this country. They have monopolized our natural resources; they are exploiting the people, not only of America, but of a large part of the world; they control public opinion through their parasite newspapers. Indeed, they bestride the new world like colossi, and common men exist largely through their sufferance. These are they who are the champions of conscription. They are the natural enemies of democracy. There can be no democracy when these men rule. There will be none where their schemes are put through.

The interests behind conscription are largely big business and big finance. Its champions are dreamers, but they dream vicious dreams of world conquest and exploitation. Their dreams are of the American flag sent into the remote corners of the world to protect their operations and to guard the extension of the systems whereby they have brought America under their feet.

The champions of conscription, they who originated and have financed the scheme, need big armies and navies to protect their investments in foreign lands, to secure for them the safe return of dividends from concessions of mines, railroads, and so forth, and the exploitation of weak and undeveloped peoples. They cherish political schemes, for theirs is the "New Imperialism" which would place America alongside the plutocratic European nations in their conquest of the world. Under their baneful influence Dewey was sent into Manila Bay so that we might seize the Philippines as a base for expansion in China and the Orient. For them we raped Colombia of Panama, so that we might extend our operations throughout South America. For them we have sent our soldiers into Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Costa Rica and stand like a bloated bully with a drawn club over the petty States of Central America. What may be their further dreams I do not know, but I fear that they are fraught with the most evil consequences to American ideals.

The interests engaged in promoting conscription want big armies for home use. They say, "We have too much discontent, too many Socialists, too many I. W. W.'s, too many strikes, too much industrial disorder, too much freedom of speech, too many ranting demagogues and labor agitators." They would suppress all this with the iron hand of the military. They would take the youth of the land while it is yet impressionable, force it into their armies, rob it of its principles of democracy, teach it docility and respect for them and their property, so that the New World might be made over to resemble the Old, with its castes of prestige and privilege.

The financial and big business interests that are championing conscription as a permanent system see in this national crisis their golden opportunity. They have seized on the war crisis as the time to put through their scheme. It is not for the war that they wish conscription but for its effect when peace has come. With them it is now or never. They expect to commit the Nation to conscription at this time so that forced military service will be fixed on us as a permanent thing and we will never be able to shake it off again. This is the stake that they are playing for.

These forces seem to have wanted the war for the opportunity that it gives to fix their system on us. They did not want conscription for the war, but wanted the war hoping that they might get conscription out of it. They have roused themselves to their supremest activity. Every influence of which they can avail themselves is being brought to bear. They have sent out the word and their minions are lashed into a fury. Their newspapers belch out their noxious gases in the nostrils of the people, and all who may be deceived, frightened, or intimidated, all of the thoughtless, timid, or corrupt elements in the land are marshaled under their flag.

I fight these influences in defense of our national dignity and honor. I fight them as I would the foe across the sea to preserve American ideals and institutions. I will not surrender to them. I would rather die than to lose so cheaply the liberties for which our ancestors shed their blood.

CONSCRIPTION IS UNNECESSARY.

Conscription is unnecessary in two senses. In the first place, we can get all the troops we need by the voluntary system. It seems unlikely that 1,000,000 volunteers will enlist to go across the seas to shed their blood in foreign lands. If it is our purpose to send vast armies to take part in European battles, then forced service may be necessary. But if we intend to send only 500,000 men to France, enough hot-blooded Americans can be found to enlist for that adventure. Recruited to full strength, our Regular Army will comprise 287,000 and will alone furnish men for a European campaign.

Our people when they volunteer want to know what they are fighting for. If they are fighting for our national defense and honor, millions of volunteers will come forward. If the campaign is to settle quarrels between European dynasties, perhaps only the hardy and adventurous, those who will fight for the sheer love of it, will enlist.

Why not enlist two forces with a definite understanding as to what they are to do? Enlist one force for foreign service. If 500,000 will suffice, enough volunteers may be had. Enlist another force for the defense of our country with the understanding that they are not to be sent into foreign lands. No matter how many men may be desired for this force, they will readily come forward. Our people are not lacking in real patriotism. They will volunteer just as well as the British have done. Millions of Americans will rush to the flag if they are to be used only to defend our own shores.

To insist on conscription at the beginning of this war is an imputation against the courage and patriotism of our people. It is equal to a charge that they are selfish and unworthy. It is a confession upon the part of the conscriptionists that the war is not a popular war, that the heart of the people is not in the war. There may be some basis for the thought that America does not give herself whole-heartedly to this war. However that may be, our people are patriotic and there will be no lack of men to defend our country. Men will enlist whether they approve the war or the means by which it came on or not.

Conscription is unnecessary in another sense. Our Regular Army recruited to full strength is 287,000. The National Guard when recruited to war strength is 641,000, making a total of 928,000 already authorized under existing laws. No call for volunteers has been made. The President has issued no proclamation asking the people to enlist, yet they are enlisting at the rate of over 3,000 each day. This enlistment is going on although there is no equipment for the men and the States have been refused permission to muster in new regiments of National Guard or to bring the National Guard up to full war strength.

Let the President issue his proclamation asking for volunteers and authorizing the States to bring up the National Guard to full war strength. Within 60 days the entire quota of 928,000 men will be raised. We have not got guns and equipment for even these men. Surely our armies will be large enough for the present when such a vast number is brought to the colors. When these armies have been raised and equipped it will then be time to consider whether we should go further in our war preparations.

CONSCRIPTION IS UNAMERICAN.

The Revolutionary War was fought by volunteers as were our colonial wars. From the beginning of American history volunteers have been relied on in this country. Volunteer service is shrined in American tradition. It is the traditional American method of raising armies.

During the Civil War it was thought expedient in 1863 to pass a sort of conscription act to stimulate enlisting men in the Union armies. Out of 2,700,000 Union soldiers in the Civil War only about 60,000 were conscripts. The enforcement of the draft act caused riots, generally disorganized the country, and was of no real military value.

The Southern Confederacy raised a few soldiers by conscription. Most of the conscripts laid down or ran away the first battle. Many of them were Unionists and deserted to the Union Army. The attempt to conscript soldiers into the Confederate Army drove thousands of southerners who were loyal to the Union into the Federal Army. Over 30,000 Federal soldiers enlisted from Tennessee alone. Five entire Union regiments were enlisted among Confederate prisoners at Rock Island.

Desertions largely operated to break the back of the Confederacy. Many of the deserters were conscripts.

The average American likes to regard himself as a free moral agent. As a volunteer he fights heroically, cherishing the ideal that he is serving his country without compulsion. It will break the morale of our men to force them into service. Conscription is violative of American traditions. Our people may be led; they can not be driven. They are not of exactly the same stuff as the docile European conscript. It will serve to impair their fighting qualities when they look upon themselves as dumb animals driven to the trenches rather than as free Americans fighting voluntarily for their country.

It was well said in time of the Civil War that it took two good soldiers to keep one conscript in line. Under a system of conscription many will be forced to the ranks who have conscientious objections and who are dissatisfied for other reasons. A general spirit of discontent will be engendered; regiments will be honeycombed with unrest and dissatisfaction. The martial spirit of our people will be dulled. There will be many aliens in our ranks fighting against those of their own blood. I would rather have one-half the number in enthusiastic wholehearted soldiers than to infect the whole with the discontent and unrest of the unwilling minority.

If we are to expect our armies to acquit themselves in accordance with our glorious military traditions, they must fight on the same plane with the Americans of previous wars. They must have the same respect for themselves, the same ideals of freemen. They must cherish the same glorious memories. You can not get that kind of fighting out of servile conscripts.

I am able to understand the pride which a soldier may take in the name of "volunteer." I remember well the bright Sunday morning of the 1st of May, 1898, when I shouldered my rifle as a private soldier at the outbreak of the Spanish War. I remember the pride that I took in myself and in my comrades as volunteer soldiers. I was sustained throughout the trials of service by the thought that I was serving of my own accord. Always I have looked back upon my service as a soldier with a feeling of pride and added self-respect because I was a volunteer. I am unwilling to rob the men who must fight this war of the proud name of volunteer. I am unwilling to brand them as conscripts, as those who must be forced to serve their country.

CONSCRIPTION BREEDS FAVORITISM AND CORRUPTION.

All claims in behalf of the justice of conscription are based on the assumption that it will be fairly enforced, that the burden will rest upon all classes equally, and that it will be enforced impartially against all. Upon no other theory is the idea of conscription tolerable for an instant, but experience has shown that it opens wide the door for the gravest administrative abuses.

To bring men into the ranks under a system of conscription requires their registration, their division into classes, and so forth. Medical examinations are required, and there are many loopholes through which favored ones may escape on the way. The administration of the law will necessarily be left to a governmental bureau and its details in charge of officials, many of whom will be hastily selected petty officers. It is inevitable that there will be many instances of favoritism, perhaps even of corruption. Men will be omitted from registration, because there is no way to check the matter up. Men will be excused for falsely certified small defects, defective eyesight, hearing, or teeth, or flat feet, or rheumatism, or some minor disease. This is inevitable. It will impair the confidence of the people in the system and cause intense dissatisfaction.

It is already being planned that all the commissioned officers are to be taken from the better educated and upper social classes. Few indeed are the working men or their sons who will be allowed to wear swords. The masses will do the digging and the sweating. They will be shown the least favoritism and allowed the fewest exemptions.

The system whereby officers for the new armies will be chosen has already been exposed. They are to be taken from the idle rich men who have attended the Plattsburg camps, from college boys, and others of the upper classes. The lowest commissioned officers are to be appointed only after rigid educational tests. It will take at least a high-school graduate to stand the examinations. It is not proposed to appoint practical, every-day sort of men, used to dealing with men and affairs as officers. Rather it is intended to make commissions the prize of a sort of Chinese pedantry which will exclude all but the best educated. The truth is that there is more concern to select men who are "socially right" than those who are capable of dealing with the practical concerns of army life.

An enlisted man of the Regular Army or National Guard will have no chance for a commission based upon his record of honorable service and his capacity for performance of military duty. He must stand the test of examination in the sciences and mathematics to be admitted. Gen. Forrest, perhaps the most capable Cavalry commander that the world ever saw, would be unable to get a commission as second lieutenant in the American Army.

I am receiving hundreds of letters from men of the upper class seeking commissions in the Army; not one of these has expressed a willingness to enlist as a private. No workingman has asked for a commission. They know that there is no chance for them no matter how capable, generally speaking, they may be.

It is one thing to pass conscription laws; another to enforce them. Always it is easier to enforce the laws against the poor and humble. If any may escape their meshes, it is the classes having wealth and influence. Let no hard-handed workingman expect to find the son of the capitalist serving alongside his son on terms of equality. A way will be found to avoid that. As a last resort there are unmerited promotions and soft places to be found, perfunctory duties to be performed, easy clerkships, and such like. The toil and the drudgery, the digging and the sweating, will be reserved for the sons of the masses.

CONSCRIPTION IS DISCRIMINATORY.

Conscription is based on discrimination. It starts out with its exemptions and its methods of selection. It is not intended to rest equally upon all citizens. It culls out a few for military duty. These victims are subjected to rigid discipline and all the hardships of the campaign with the risk of their lives. The balance go free and continue to enjoy all their pleasures and privileges. Conscripts are not even chosen by lot out of the entire mass. Those above prescribed ages and following exempted callings are never under the hazard that they may be taken. Yet all these might render useful service for the State, even many of them do so now as officials and will continue to draw the salaries and enjoy all the privileges of peace.

Conscription can not be fair and democratic, unless all are taken, from the oldest down to even the youngest who is useful. If one citizen should be forced to serve the State all should be equally subject. The fact that a man can not render active service as a soldier is nothing. The civilian side of war's activity is much wider than the military side. The production of the necessaries of life for the people as well as supplies and equipment for the Army calls for vast numbers in civilian employments. If citizens may be taken for service in the trenches, why may they not also be taken for service in the fields and workshops? Why should unproductive bankers, agents, and professional men go scot-free merely because they are over a certain age or physically unsuited for trench duty? Why should not these parasite classes and social burdens be seized upon and put to doing something that is useful, something beneficial to the whole? Why should we not send them into the fields to harden their muscles and to improve their physical condition with fresh air and outdoor work?

Just conscription levies not on a few but upon all. It does not discriminate between the worker in a munition factory and a clerk behind the counter. It does not say to Jack, "You shall go to war because you are of this age," and to John, "You are free because you are a year older." It does not say to William, a clerk, "You are to go into the trenches; you are to sweat or shiver or starve and to lose your life or to come home maimed all for $15 per month," and to Henry, the munitions worker, "You are to continue on at your employment enjoying all the pleasures and privileges of peace at $5 per day."

Conscription is State slavery. It is involuntary servitude, not for crime. It is so harsh and violative of every principle of liberty that it should not be used except in time of actual necessity. It is a measure for an extremity not for ordinary times. To make it necessary the peril of the Nation should be so great as to require a supreme sacrifice from every citizen. If conscription is justified at all, then it is only when universal conscription is necessary. There should be no exemptions nor exceptions. Not that all may be needed as soldiers but that all may be needed for service for the Nation, for service for the public welfare. All should be put upon an equality without discrimination between married or single, rich or poor, educated or ignorant. Family and business ties should be ignored and every citizen regarded as merely a member of the community to serve the whole and to be cared for by the whole.

Property is not so sacred in its nature as life and liberty. The right of the individual to control his own actions is more important than his right to own property. Conscription is confiscation of men. It restrains their liberties, forces their actions, and drives them into danger, perhaps at the cost of their lives. If conscription of men be permissible conscription of property is also justified. If men's liberties and lives may be taken for the public welfare, then property may also be con- fiscated. Surely it will not be argued that property stands upon higher ground than man.

A system of conscription of men which leaves property free is inherently unjust. It is undemocratic. That a man who has nothing but his life to lose shall be forced to hazard it in service for the State and that a capitalist shall preserve his property intact is shocking to an enlightened conscience.

If it be said that the conscript man is used temporarily—borrowed, as it were, for the emergency—and that the hazard of his life is a mere incident, I answer by asking why, then, should property not be borrowed, used temporarily, and returned at the end of the war? How can it be just when human material for war is taken without compensation that war supplies and finances for war may not also be taken? What justice is there when men are being conscripted that property owners should be receiving incomes from their possessions?

CONSCRIPTION IS UNDEMOCRATIC.

Why is conscription undemocratic?

First. Even when laid equally upon all ages and classes it imposes the burden of public defense equally per capita upon the population, whereas the burdens of government should be borne in proportion to the benefits received. Since property enjoys the chief benefit of government and its protection occasions the chief governmental expense it should bear the chief part of the burden of public defense. Men should be required to respond to public duty in the same measure that they receive a benefit from the public. Conscription rests the burden of public defense upon the individual without regard to property interests or benefits derived from the Government.

Second. Conscription for military duty can not be equally borne by the whole people, for many are physically unfit, others are cowards and can not fight, many are too old, many are too young, many are women; all these escape, yet all share in the benefits of government.

Third. The burden of conscription is not laid equally on all, even of those taken for service. Some 3 per cent are commissioned officers enjoying position, honors, pay, and opportunities immeasurably above the remainder; 15 to 20 per cent are petty officers enjoying superior emoluments and comforts to a marked degree. The remainder are private soldiers who do all the work and most of the suffering and get nothing in return except the scantiest necessaries of life.

Fourth. Conscription is undemocratic because it develops bureaucracy, takes the control of affairs from the representatives of the people, places it in the hands of officials who are out of contact with them. Hence the administration of the system of conscription is subject to the discretion of unresponsible officials and the peculiar subject of the grossest abuses, oppression, corruption, and favoritism.

Fifth. It is undemocratic because it forces men into an autocratic system in which respect is given to authority, not to merit, in which the rewards go to place and not to capacity, in which servile obedience is the highest virtue and independence and individuality the most serious vice. Out of this system men may come humble, docile, and unimaginative but never virile, aggressive, and reasoning citizens. Its tendency is toward autocratic and not toward popular government.

THE CRUELEST INJUSTICE.

Selective conscription, so called, is the worst form of all. It consciously and intentionally lays its burden upon a select few. It is its purpose not to reach all alike, but to victimize certain classes and callings. Its administration is left to a bureau which is out of touch with the people; that it will be the means of the grossest oppression and tyranny can not for a moment be questioned.

The cruelest feature of selective conscription, its most vicious feature, is the plan to victimize the boys of the land. It proposes to seize on those under 21. It is not content to discriminate among those of mature age, but aims its vile purpose at helpless and inoffensive boys.

What a cruel injustice to deprive a boy of his chance, to rob him of the opportunity of his youth, to finish his education, to learn a trade, to get a fair and early start in life!

The conscription of men under 21 is grossly unjust. It is undemocratic and oppressive, because it levies upon nonvoters, those who have had no voice in bringing on the war, who were not consulted, who are helpless, who are not represented in Congress or official place, boys who have no votes with which to avenge themselves upon those who would force this system upon them, who are driven like dumb helpless sheep to slaughter. The shame of it to limit the age of those who are to be conscripted at below 25! Not a Member of Congress but is above that age, not a Government official but is above that age, not an agitator for conscription from one end of the land to the other but is above that age. We would vote that on others which neither we nor any of our age or class will have to endure. This in the name of democracy!

Conscription of boys is wrong. It is foolish to take boys out of the home circle before their characters are formed, innocent boys, and unaccustomed to temptation, unschooled in the ways of the world; to take uninformed boys and thrust them into the vicious moral atmosphere of the camp, where they will be subject to every vile temptation and moral pitfall that ever lay in wait for humanity.

Conscription of boys is economically unjust and foolish. The life of a soldier is one sometimes of hardship and privation, spasmodically laborious, but chiefly that of an idler. "Soldiering" is a word that has a well-defined meaning. Boys should have a chance to finish their education, to learn a trade, and get some little start in life, to make some plans for the future. But with a year or two taken out of their lives at the beginning of manhood, taken out of their lives and devoted to army life, they will come back stripped of ambition, schooled as idlers, with no inclination to learn a trade or to prepare themselves for life.

If we are to have conscription let us spare the boys, spare them for the sake of their health, for they are physically soft and unformed, are heedless and imprudent. They do not know how to care for themselves physically nor what to eat nor drink, and they will come back from the campaign broken and bent and diseased wrecks. They will come back rheumatic and malarious. In 1915 when our country was at peace, all our soldiers living comfortably in barracks, receiving the best of food, medical attention and care, and under the most favorable conditions for health we had an average of 93,262 enlisted men in the Army. During that year alone 69,442 were admitted to the hospital for disease or injury; there were 10,045 cases of venereal disease and 358 cases of insanity, 1,351 were discharged for physical disability, and 436 died. These were carefully chosen men of ages between 18 and 35. They were subjected to the most rigid medical examination before being admitted to service. They were not reenlisted if physically defective. Practically every case of disease originated in service. This is especially true of venereal diseases, from which one man in every nine suffered. No doubt many men were diseased when discharged, no record having been made of it, and will carry through their lives the marks of service.

Yet in the face of this terrible record conscriptionists persist that Army service will promote the health and physical well-being of young men.

MY VOTE.

I will not vote for conscription unless it shall appear necessary. I will not consider conscription necessary so long as sufficient armies to defend this country can be raised by the voluntary system. I will not vote to conscript men to send them across the sea to fight the battles of European monarchs. I will not force our boys into the raging hell of Europe in order to decide whether Italy shall have Trentino, whether Bosnia shall belong to Servia or to Austria, whether Russia may sit at the Dardanelles, and whether Poland as a kingdom shall be under the control of Germany or Russia.

I clearly foresee the fury that my political enemies will raise against me at home. Already in my ears there rises the roar of the torrent of abuse and misrepresentation. I am duly mindful that I am refusing to obey the dominant voices of my city, the newspaper voices, the voices of wealth, prestige, and influence. But I am undismayed by the prospect. I hear rather the still small voice of conscience than the thunder of opposition. I hear rather the pleading mothers and the plaintive voices of common men, of those who toil while others sleep.

I have been a private soldier, and if it should be necessary will enlist again. I am willing to fight with arms in my hands in defense of our institutions. Surely, I should be willing to speak and vote to defend them. I would be willing to shed my blood defending my country against a foreign invader. I am no less willing to defend American liberties with my life if need be when they are assailed by internal foes.

I have no word of criticism for those who hold to opinions which differ from mine. This is America, the land of the free. Freedom of opinion is one of the things that makes this country worth fighting for. I respect any man's conscientious and deliberate opinions. I crave for my own the same consideration and regard. I do my duty as I see it. Let others be guided by the same light of conscience.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alamana [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I must make the frank confession that up until the last few days I had reached the conclusion to vote against any bill embodying the essential features of a selective draft unless predicated upon the prior use and patent failure of a pure volunteer system. In fact, I had so stated my purpose to some of my colleagues here. I was impelled to that conviction by the very arguments used by those now supporting the majority report.

By now stating, that after more mature reflection, and after hearing the arguments urged I have reached a different conclusion and shall vote for a selective draft, or universal obligation to service, it is probable that I shall share the censure of those who are being criticized as mere rubber stamps and marionetts, to register only the will of the Executive. But I am comforted by the reflection that of all the personal autocracies known to man the most despicable and indefensible is that of intolerance of an honest conviction candidly expressed.

To take the side of voting against the selective draft would be imminently "the easiest way." It would require less explanation; it would invite no personal political disaster; but, Mr. Chairman, in an hour like this, under conditions unprecedented in our national history, in deliberating upon great questions of national policy involving even our national life, it seems to me that it is a time to subordinate every element of the personal equation and to forget the geographical confines of a congressional district, to merge these considerations into the larger necessities of a national emergency. [Applause.] Whatever of disaster or blundering our arms may suffer, the people of the tenth district of Alabama will measurably suffer with every other district in shame, in regret, in humiliations.

What is the thing we are here contriving to do? To raise a new army for national security and defense. How shall such an army be raised? From among the male citizens of the United States. And why should the Government expect them to serve as soldiers under its flag? Because of an implied and specific moral and civic obligation. If our flag has been insulted, our citizens murdered on the high seas in contravention of all law human, international, and divine; if our outraged national dignity and self-respect stands flouted before the world, are these accumulated grievances directed against us as a Nation, or only against that proportion of our people who would be gallant enough to volunteer to resent them? [Applause.] It is our national sovereignty that is defied, and not a capricious portion of our people. This Nation in its political autonomy is one fabric, indivisable and homogeneous. Whatever alien hand strikes at a single star in the flag strikes at them all, and all the peoples of the States they represent. [Applause.] Whoever would lay an impious stripe of shame upon those of honor and glory profanes at his peril a whole people. [Applause.]

So our burden and our duty in this crisis is joint, not several; it is universal, not fantastic. Who shall fill the ranks? Only those choice spirits whose first impulse of duty and honor calls them to the colors, while the slumberers and the callous share not their peril but only the fruits of their sacrifices?

It is one of the mudsills of our structure of freedom that all men are guaranteed equality of opportunity under the law, equality of protection in life, property, and the pursuit of happiness. Is it not fair, is it not just, is it not honest, that the Government should not only expect but require equality of burden under the law? What man among the slothful would be laggard in claiming the benefit of habeas corpus if improperly imprisoned or trial by jury if under indictment for felony? It is his to claim. His Government has given him that constitutional right. If his property is unlawfully seized, he invokes the writ of detinue. If his character is assailed, he can sue for defamation. But, sir, if his Government is assailed, which gives him all this protection; if the sacred traditions and inviolable rights of its citizens on the high seas are "plundered, profaned, prostituted, and disinherited," he says I will let my neighbor volunteer to look after that business; I am not personally involved. Gentlemen, is that democracy; is that even decent human conduct?

Universal obligations of service and burden are inextricably interwoven in all our political and civic relations to the State. Where is there a public treasury that would receive just consideration if the payment of taxes was voluntary? What court of justice could rely upon a single venire to try some desperate and disagreeable murder case if the jury boxes of the country only contained the names of those citizens who volunteered to perform that duty? The public highways of America in every township would soon resolve themselves into ruts and quagmires were it not for the law of compulsory road duty within certain arbitrary limitations. Every peaceful community in the country would be subject to the merciless brutality of a desperado save for the watch and ward of a posse comitatus of civilians drafted for emergency.

I can find no good reason or sound logic to urge that in the gravest of national, which really in its last analysis means personal, peril to our citizens, their wives and children and hearthstones, there should be an entirely different standard of duty for all men within the same arbitrary reasonable limitations.

It is argued that the main advantage of the majority bill is that it will give soldiers quicker than by waiting for the registration proposed by the minority plan. God knows that I am in no hurry to get them to the trenches. I still maintain that there does not now exist any justification to send an American army to Europe. I voted for the Britten amendment to the war resolution not to send our boys to the shambles except by consent of Congress, but if they are to go let us see to it by this legislation that they go thoroughly trained, equipped, experienced, and prepared for trench warfare in its abominable worst, and that they go each on equal terms of honor and self-respect and each with the consoling consciousness that if he dies on the field of honor or if he survives it was because his country called him on terms of equal dignity and justice with every comrade who shares his fate. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, these considerations I have suggested have been intended to touch upon the reason and justice and fairness of this proposal. There are other considerations of a practical nature that seem to me involved in this controversy.

I am a new Member of this body. I am not accustomed to the intricacies of government and government regulations, the same as you enjoy, but in my observation of human organizations I have always found it necessary to lodge and to fix the final arbitrary power with some head of some governing body.

We have as President of the United States a man chosen by popular majority of the people of this country to counsel with and admonish us upon the great questions of governmental concern; and for one I fully believe in my heart that I am speaking the sentiments of a majority of my native State of Alabama [applause], although some of my colleagues differ with me, and I recognize their right to a candid difference of opinion, when I express the belief that when the final judgment of our people is made up, that the great and overwhelming majority of the people of Alabama will say that we elected that man as Chief Executive, that we believe in him and stand behind the reasonable and logical policies of our Commander in Chief, the leader of our party, the Chief Executive of the Nation, Woodrow Wilson, and I am willing to share his judgment and to follow his leadership. [Applause.]

I believe that the moral and psychological effect of an army such as would be made up under this just and equal system would have a profound effect upon Hollweg, Von Tirpitz, Hindenburg, and the Kaiser, without firing a gun, and lead to peace; but a haphazard, half-hearted, discredited, discarded system of mobilization would tend to hearten them in the belief that a sluggish and halting policy possessed America, and that there was no real punch behind our brave words.

We have a great Council of National Defense chosen from all of the citizenship because of their expert knowledge, their experience, and their judgment, and their wisdom in broad lines of human endeavor. We have invested them with power to make suggestions to the President and Congress. We are relying in this emergency upon their wisdom; and I believe we should, without question, accept their advice and suggestions.

Why, by the same token and by the same reason, can we not afford to accept the advice of these experts who constitute the General Staff of the Army, especially when those views are concurred in by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. If a volunteer is all that is needed, it appeals to me, gentlemen of the House, that these great belligerent nations in Europe who have given it a fair and impartial trial would adhere to that system instead of all of them discrediting and discarding it. Now, Mr. Chairman, a great many of us voted for this resolution declaring a state of war to exist, and I want to read a portion of it for wour reminder:

Resolved, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed—to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Gentlemen, it seems to me that that comprehensive term embraces not only railroads, not only public utilities, not only manufacturing establishments, not only all these great enterprises the Government is mobilizing to meet this emergency, but it also involves in its largest and best analysis the mobilization upon these reasonable, fair, and just restrictions of the greatest power we possess—that is, the man power of the United States of America. [Applause.] Gentlemen, I have no desire to trespass upon the patience of the committee. A good deal has been said in the course of this debate about sending young men under the age of 21 to the war or drafting them. I agree with the proposition suggested, but that is not involved in the controversy now before the House. I am unalterably opposed to including in the selective draft young men under the age of 21 years [applause], because, my friends, I do not believe that it is just and proper; and I want to make the statement that I shall feel very much inclined to vote against the whole proposition if that amendment does not stand like it is reported by the minority to this House. A great deal has been said about womanhood and motherhood in this debate.

Gentlemen, that phase of the case has appealed to us all, no doubt; but I do not believe—and I believe I am authorized, although not personally, to make this assertion and this statement—that the motherhood of America, those glorious women who have given these sons to the Nation, that it is not their purpose and not their anxiety and not their wish in this hour, when so much is involved, to restrain and withhold their sons from equal service upon terms of equality in this great enterprise of defending the United States of America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will permit the completion of this very able and interesting address.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for a few minutes more if it is agreeable.

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield five minutes additional.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Ah, sir, I do not believe that the motherhood of America has forgotten what transpired in Belgium and northern France. I believe that behind this crusade of justice is a matter which will move the hearts of our soldiers and fill them with real courage to resent the indefensible outrages which have been perpetrated upon the motherhood and sisterhood of Belgium and France in this great and cruel struggle. Ah, I do not believe that they have forgotten Miss Cavill and those of her sort, and that they are now in this emergency, as they have always been in the trying hours of our Republic, eager and anxious to make equal sacrifice with the fathers of the country for the preservation of the institutions of liberty, equality, and justice which prevail in this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the indulgence of the committee. It is not my purpose in these remarks to say anything that might possibly, or that could possibly, wound the feeling of any of my colleagues, especially my colleagues from the State of Alabama. I regret we can not agree upon the fundamental question involved in this bill; but after, as I suggested in the beginning, mature, thoughtful, and dispassionate consideration I could not honestly reach any other conclusion except that in this emergency the bill proposed by the minority report is the wisest, fairest, most just, and democratic method to serve the interests of our people in this great national emergency. [Applause.]

The system of selection is the only way in which every man of military age, may secure a fair and square chance to serve upon terms of equality with his neighbor. The rich and poor are on the same simple level of responsibility and mutual liability to service.

This is the only way to keep this from being "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight."

It gives the President the right to say to the man on the farm, in the mine, in the cotton mill, "You are liable to service, but the country needs you more to stay where you are to produce food and fuel and clothes than in the Army, and I choose you to serve at home."

The people of my district, I know, are willing to serve their country if they know that they will be called to serve on equal terms with all and without favoritism or partiality, and in my judgment the President's plan guarantees this result.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have been at a loss to understand the processes of reasoning by which some of the Members of the House have during the last few days suddenly become converted to the righteousness and the wisdom of immediate conscription, but the gentleman who has just preceded me can leave us in no doubt as to the reason for the position he assumes. He says that he voted for the Britten resolution, which would have prevented the United States Government from sending a soldier to France to fight the battles of this country. He says to-day he is not so very much in favor of sending the boys to the trenches, and therefore it is natural for him to take the position that he is opposed to this selective volunteer plan and in favor of this conscription plan, which would delay the raising of an Army for six months more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman is not doing me justice. I am not accurately quoted.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not desire to do so. What did you say?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I said I voted for the Britten amendment to the war resolution not to send an army to Europe without the consent of Congress. The gentleman did not state that in his statement.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When did the gentleman expect Congress to send them there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will permit, does not the Britten resolution——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, the gentleman pictures the suffering of women in Belgium and says the women of this country have not lost their patriotism, and yet he forgot all about the suffering women of Belgium and joined the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] in his effort to prevent the President from sending an army of the United States Government over to Belgium. [Applause.]

He said, my friends, that he is unalterably opposed to drafting men under 21 years of age. He says that now; but he knows and I know the Senate is going to pass that 21-year provision, and it is going to conference and it is going to come back in the bill, and the same process of reasoning that induced him to turn turtle on the conscription business will induce him to turn turtle on the age limit. He says that the volunteer system, with its sluggish mobilization, would hearten Germany. What would he do? He would follow Mr. BRITTEN in a policy described by my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] as directing the Army to "Hang your clothes on a hickory limb, but don't go near the water." [Laughter.] Would not it hearten Germany to say we are going to have war, but will not send an army unless Congress hereafter shall meet and determine that it should be sent. It is in keeping with every other argument of every man who has favored this conscription bill.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] yesterday was in favor of conscription because, he said, he thought it would keep "the Kelleys and Burkes and Sheas" at home. He favors conscription because he wants to keep the Irish in Boston, and the gentlemen who represent mining districts believe it will keep the miners at home. They tell the men from manufacturing districts that conscription will keep the skilled workers at home, and then they go down into the agricultural sections of the South and say, "We are going to keep your farmers at home." Then, in God's name, who is going to fight?

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I can not. I have but 15 minutes, and I can talk an hour about this, the most infamous proposition ever submitted to this or any other American Congress.

Tell me who is going to be exempted. There is but one class of people whom they say will be drafted, and that is the pool-room sharks. I have not heard a conscriptionist discuss the subject yet who did not say, "We are going to keep all the workingmen at home, but we are going to draft the pool-room fellows." Are you going to defeat Germany with an army of pool-room sharks? [Applause and laughter.] Why, my friends, they tell me that this is no sentimental thing; this is a serious thing. You are going up against the greatest fighting organization in the world. And yet in this country they talk as though the war was to be fought with billiard balls instead of bullets. If they took all of the pool-room sharks in the United States of America they would not have an army. Under the lottery you provide for in this conscription bill 4,000,000 names are put in a box and 500,000 drawn out, and the pool-room loafer has seven chances to one that he will not be drawn.

In the vain effort to bolster up this bill, what does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] say? Now, if he can not make an argument for a proposition, nobody else here can. What did he say? He resorted to fancy and fiction instead of relying upon facts. He read here, with the evident approval of the House, figures purporting to show that one-half of the Army of the United States Government in the Civil War was 18 years old. Where did he get the figures? He said he got them from a speech made by Senator NELSON in the Senate last Saturday. I looked at them, and do you know what they show? They show that there were 1,183,130 men under 18. There were 1,158,438 men of 18. That makes 2,341,568 of 18 years and under, and as he said the total enrollment was only 2,606,000, he did not leave but 264,432 soldiers in the Union Army over 18 years of age. Who believes it? They show, further, that of those of 22 years of age there were 880,000. How could there be that many when he had left but 264,000 from 18 years up? Then I telephoned The Adjutant General's Office, and he said that there was absolutely no record in the War Department of the ages of the United States soldiers. He said that some time ago a newspaper published the statement concerning it, but it was a fake. I telephoned to Senator NELSON's office, and his secretary said he got those figures last year from the Kansas City Star. And possibly that accounts for the attitude of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. [Laughter.]

My friends, thus it has ever been. But I have an inquisitive mind, so I inquired of the Legislative Reference Bureau for what information they had, and their information, compiled from statements of men who ought to be in a position to know, was that the average age was 25, and the secretary to The Adjutant General says that a statement compiled by them, from the survivors of the veterans of the Civil War on the Union side, shows that the average age was 28. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said, "Do you think that the patriotism of the boys of 18 has departed and they will not volunteer?" I ask him if he thinks that the patriotism of the men over 25 has departed, and will they not volunteer if he will only give them a chance? [Applause.]

Oh, no. This is universal! The only thing universal about it is the universal support it receives from men over 25 who will save their skins. [Applause.] Universal? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who preceded me, said, "Equality of opportunity." Yes. Equality of opportunity to the boys between 19 and 25, and them alone. Would he levy taxes only on the boys from 19 to 25?

They say the volunteer system would delay things. And yet every man in this House knows that under conscription, according to the department officials, it would be six months before they could put men on the training grounds. If you allowed men to volunteer and get only 250,000 in six months, you would have 250,000 more than if you relied only on conscription and waited six months.

What other argument? My good friend from Wisconsin, who tried to bolster his argument up by figures about the Civil War, turned to us and said, "You men from the South, how can you oppose this thing when the Confederate States imposed a conscription bill in the second year of the war?"

But what did he know about the forces of the Confederacy? Did he tell you that when they did that, practically every man able to shoulder a gun had already volunteered, and that in all the period from April, 1862, to the close of the war we had in the Confederate armies only 81,993 men who had been conscripted into the army, and so great was the hatred of the word "conscript" that while men were being conscripted during these years, 76,206 volunteered and went into the armies of the Confederacy of their own accord? He says if it had not been for the conscript act the Union forces would have defeated the Confederate forces two years earlier. [Laughter.] But that statement is absolutely untrue. It was not until after we conscripted men that you ever succeeded in defeating the forces of the Confederacy. [Laughter.]

What did Preston Brooks, the military historian of the Confederacy, say on that subject? He was the best authority in the United States on the subject. He said:

> Acknowledging the estimate of 600,000 as affording the most favorable possible showing for conscription (a procedure which more than makes up for the manifest inaccuracies in the report of the number of conscripts), conscription appears to have put into the war not more than 25 per cent of the total. But it is unfair to credit conscription with having augmented the armies even to that extent, because the conscripted classes were confessedly almost worthless as fighting material, and no doubt the 100,000 deserters admitted by Gen. Preston to be at large were principally conscripts.
> Compulsory service was, furthermore, a weakening force in that it brought conflict with the States which led to half-hearted support in some instances and did much to make service in the army unpopular. Another untoward result may be laid to the door of the system as organized—the very lax laws of exemption provided an easy and more or less honorable avenue of evasion, thereby keeping out of the armies thousands who might otherwise have been forced by public opinion to volunteer.

That is also the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, who was an officer in the Union Army, and of every other man of like knowledge. When those conscripts were taken into the ranks of the Confederacy they lowered the morale of the army. Instead of their ranks being composed of men who fought for their homes and for their country, who fought for the ideals that they believed to be right, they had been driven into the ranks to fight as slaves, and to-day in many sections of the South the words "convict" and "conscript" are synonymous.

How about the forces of the Union? An eminent historian, Mr. Woodrow Wilson, in his history——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I regret I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That eminent historian, the President of the United States, in his "History of the American People," depicts the rioting and bloodshed throughout the country that followed the attempt on the part of the United States Government to enforce conscription. Do you think the spirit of the people has changed? It has not; and when conscription is attempted in this country, especially under this infamous and unequal lottery proposition that you have here, you are going to inspire more domestic insurrection and rioting and internal warfare than you can think of, so that it will be difficult to prosecute successfully a foreign war. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND rose.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I know what my friend from Missouri wants to ask me. He has asked but one question since this thing started. [Laughter.] He wants to ask, "Have men not had a chance to volunteer now? And if they have not volunteered, does it not prove they will not?" [Laughter.] That is what he wants to ask.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I refuse to yield. I told the gentleman so. I can not yield when I can ask his question quicker than he can do it, and answer it, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is wrong about that. I want to correct him.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The answer is this: "I do not want to join the Regular Army." Not a man in this House does, and his friends do not. For reasons satisfactory to them, they will not.

Then he says, "How about the National Guard?" If he does not know it, he ought to know it, that the War Department wants to abolish the National Guard. He knows that they construed the national-defense act as not allowing them to raise additional units. They did place that construction upon it. The members of the Committee on Military Affairs asked the Secretary of War for his authority, and when he had none he then notified the States that they could raise additional units, but he accompanied that statement with the statement that he hoped the governors of the States would not authorize the organization of additional units. Was that encouraging volunteers? Only a few thousand have volunteered in the Regular Army, but if you say that is a fair test of the willingness of this country to fight Germany, you say patriotism has departed from the country and the American people do not want this war, and you thereby reflect upon the American people and upon this administration. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman vote to repeal the war resolution?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I will not. But I can defend it, while you can not defend this infamous proposition that is presented here. I voted for the war declaration. I want to prosecute this war, but I want to prosecute it with free men and not with slaves. [Applause.] I am not going to be driven by a press-conducted propaganda, as extensive and as infamous as any other ever conducted in this Nation. [Applause.]

You can not tell me why people changed overnight. I know it is because the newspapers say, "You are not standing by the President; you are not standing by the War Department." That is what the press says. The War Department and the Department of Justice have sent a special bill down here to bridle the newspapers. The newspapers denounce it, and if you dare to vote with the administration the newspapers will charge you with voting against the freedom of speech and being but a rubber stamp. If you vote for this volunteer plan they will call you a traitor. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They say we have got to accept what the War Department wants in this thing, because they are experts in this military business and we are not. Yet every gentleman who gets up here says "the War Department wants the age of enlistment to be fixed at from 19 to 25; but I am unalterably opposed to that. I want it raised from 19 to 21." [Laughter.] Why do they not accept the expert advice of the War Department on that?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. The War Department also wants all brigadier generals to be made major generals?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; which would incidentally increase their compensation from $6,000 to $9,300 a year, at a time when your people are called upon to economize and pay more taxes.

Mr. BURNETT. Do they ask for increased pay for the private soldier?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; they are going to be conscripts, and they can not ask it for themselves.

Why, they say by this proposal you will divide this country into volunteers and slackers. You will do no such thing. You will divide this country into Congressmen and conscripts. [Laughter.] The Constitution of the United States says no man is eligible for Congress unless he is over 25. You say by this thing that every man under 25 is subject to conscription. [Laughter.] Yes; we can all laugh at it now, but, my friends, you have fixed it finely. You have fixed it from 19 to 25. If any of you suffer the misfortune to be defeated, as some of you ought to be for voting for this thing, you can go home and live in safety and comfort, and say, "I will go when my time comes," knowing your time will never come.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] pictures a man as walking forth from among his neighbors when he is summoned to go, and says his neighbors will look at him as he marches forth, and will say, "There goes a man selected for distinguished service. He goes to fight our battles." [Laughter.] They may do it, but if they do they ought to be ashamed of themselves. [Applause.] There are 20,000,000 men of military age in this country. Not more than 4,000,000 names of boys between 19 and 25 will be put in this lottery box, and the man over 25 is out of it. I see three homes by the side of the road. In one home is the only son of a woman who is trying to educate him. In the home to the right there are three boys between 19 and 25. In the home to the left there is one man 26 years of age. In this lottery that you provide, one out of every eight will be drawn, and it is quite possible that that only son will be called for this distinguished service. And when he goes forth the three sons in the next house may stand on the porch and say, "He goes to fight our battles," and the man of 26, who is entirely exempt from service, may point to him and say, "He goes to fight our battles," and the mother with the patriotism of the American woman may bravely smile as she bids him goodbye, but deep down in her heart she will curse the statesmanship that so framed a law as to leave all the men and take her boy to fight their battles and suffer and die in the trenches of Europe. [Applause.]

You say your proposition is efficient, that it is not sentimental. My God! you can not fight a war without sentiment. When the people's hearts are not in a war it can not be won. They say the Prussian Army is effective; that you must have an equally effective army; that you must fight them with their own methods. Is it true? Have we come to that? Must we Prussianize ourselves in order to win democracy for the people of the world? If so, what do we gain? Have you got to adopt the methods of the Kaiser in order to win democracy for the world? If so, then may you not paraphrase a question that was asked centuries ago: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" What shall it profit America if she democratizes the rest of the world and loses her own democracy? [Applause.]

The volunteer bill authorizes the President to immediately call for 500,000 volunteers. It provides that while these volunteers can select their company officers, that before an officer so selected can be commissioned he must stand the examination prescribed by the President. It provides that no man will be accepted as a volunteer if he is now engaged in any occupation that in the opinion of the President would make his service of greater value in maintaining the food supply or the industries of our country than serving his Nation as a soldier in the field. It provides further that while these volunteers are being raised the President must proceed to enroll the men of the country for the purpose of conscription, if necessary, and authorizes the President, whenever he decides that the volunteer system is ineffective, to enforce conscription. It provides further, both in the volunteer and conscriptive features of the bill, that the soldiers, so far as possible, shall be grouped into units from the States and the subdivisions of the States from which they come.

The conscription bill, fathered by the ranking Republican member, Mr. KAHN, which is the bill prepared by the War Department and which has the approval of the President, does not allow men a chance to volunteer, but provides for the raising of an army of men between the ages of 19 and 25 years by conscription, and it would give to the department the right to have a man from South Carolina assigned to a company with men from Massachusetts or Oklahoma.

It is admitted by those who favor the conscription bill that it will take at least three months to complete a census of all the boys in the United States between the ages of 19 and 25. These boys must then be examined and the physically disqualified must be eliminated from the census. They must next decide how many of the boys whose names are on this list are engaged in occupations so essential to the maintenance of the industries of the country as to justify their being exempted from Army service and eliminate their names from the list. The names that are left must be placed in a box, and in the gamble that follows the boy whose name is drawn must go to the front.

The friends of this bill assert that it will take five or six months to complete this procedure and have these conscripts sent to the training grounds. I am satisfied that it will take 10 or 12 months; but even if they are correct, and it takes but 6 months, I know of no reason why during these 6 months we should not proceed to raise an army of volunteers and place them at the training camps as quickly as they volunteer. No sane man can argue that the Dent bill means delay in raising an army. I do not believe that patriotism has yet departed from the American people, and I am confident that they will respond to the call of their country in this crisis just as quickly as they have responded to every previous call of the President of the United States. If they do, then thousands of them will be at the training grounds long before even the conscription census can be completed. But if the friends of conscription are right and patriotism has departed from the people, and this war is so unpopular as they would have us believe, and men will not volunteer, then just so soon as that is apparent, the President of the United States is authorized by the Dent bill to immediately order the enforcement of the conscription features, and as the census will then be under way, not one day or one hour will be lost by reason of the opportunity the Dent bill will give to the men of this Nation to volunteer and fight for their country.

Nor can it be said that it will be an ineffective army. Some men have suddenly discovered that the only effective army is an army of conscripts. The history of the world disproves this statement. Human nature itself revolts at the idea. No man can tell me that an army of brave men who volunteer to fight for their country and whose hearts are in the fight, who understand what they are fighting for and fight by the side of their neighbors, can ever be defeated by an equal number of conscripts who have been dragged like convicts into the fight, whose hearts are not in the fight and who fight not through love of country but because they have to do it. They claim that the history of the volunteer system of this Nation has proved it a failure, but the argument is false. The Armies of Washington, Lee, and Jackson were Volunteer Armies. Again we have never attempted to organize a volunteer army in accordance with the selective plan provided for in the Dent bill. You might just as well argue that conscription is a fraud because when resorted to by the United States Government during the Civil War it furnished an opportunity for all of the shrewd, slick cowards of the Nation to either pay their way out or swear their way out of the draft, while brave men fought for what they believed to be right.

It is proposed to give to the War Department the power to say what occupations are essential to the maintenance of the industries of the country. Every man of any influence who wants to secure an exemption for his son is going to try to have him exempted by the War Department. The poor people of this country without influence, without knowledge sufficient to enable them to frame an affidavit, and without information as to where the affidavit should be sent even if it is prepared, will have their sons conscripted while others are left at home.

In order to secure support for conscription, efforts have been made to lead the farmers of the South to believe the bill would exempt them from service. There is not one word in the bill exempting farmers from service. The Secretary of War told the Military Committee he would not say who he thought should be exempted until after the bill passed. But what his views are can be gathered from his testimony before the committee, when he said:

So far as the present year is concerned it seems unlikely that our arrangements could be perfected so as to begin the drafting of men until after the season of planting has passed and the season of cultivation is well advanced. The season of harvest would therefore seem to be this year the one we have most to consider. The Council of National Defense would undoubtedly be constantly in touch with that situation, through the Department of Agriculture and subordinate committees, and if it should turn out to be at all a necessary thing to do, some system of furloughing from the Army during the peak load of the harvest season might be adopted to relieve the situation.

Mr. KAHN. But if our troops were sent to the battle fronts of Europe, how would you furlough the men?

Secretary BAKER. Of course, it would be impossible under those circumstances.

Again, on page 105, the Secretary of War stated:

According to the law of chances, we would get one out of five on the farm, but we would get one out of four of those who left the farms for the city.

So, if any person is supporting conscription because he believes farm boys will be exempt, he knows that the Secretary of War, who will alone have the power of exemption, says he will get one out of five of those who stay on the farm and one out of four of those who go to the city.

Whenever a man contends that the volunteer system is a failure he refers to the Army raised by us during the Spanish-American War. He overlooks the fact that while that Army was officered by men without any military training, under our volunteer plan no man could secure a commission as an officer unless he could stand the examination prepared by the Regular Army officers of the War Department.

Some of them say that the volunteer system failed in England during this war. But Great Britain, governed by a King, and without claiming for its people the democracy we claim, did not resort to conscription until a very short time ago, and under the volunteer system it raised an army of 5,000,000 men. To me this does not look like a failure. The British victories to-day are being won by the volunteer army, not one conscript having yet reached the firing line. It is much fairer to refer to the army of Canada, the nation to the north of us, as many of our people during the years past have emigrated to the agricultural sections of Canada. When called upon to raise an army, they did not resort to conscription; they called for volunteers and raised an army of 500,000 men, sent them to the fields of Europe, and whenever you read to-day of the success of the British Army you will read of the bravery and effectiveness of the volunteer army of Canada. Great Britain has not even attempted to force conscription in Ireland, and the volunteer soldiers of Ireland, and the 245,000 volunteer soldiers of Australia, to-day compete with Canada in fighting the battles of Great Britain. Whenever conscription has been urged in either Canada or Australia, it has been rejected.

To gain some support for this draft or conscription measure the newspapers have called it the universal military training bill, when they know that the two propositions are as different as day is from night, and no universal military training bill is being considered by this Congress. But they are the wise men. In the days of the Confederacy when conscription was finally resorted to, the newspaper boys were seemingly as influential as they are now. The bill was passed in April, 1862, and in October of the same year it was amended, and it was provided that editors of newspapers should be exempted from conscription. I have no doubt they were for conscription thereafter. Now, this bill limiting the ages of service from 19 to 25 will exempt them in this war. Take, for instance, a newspaper editor of 30, physically qualified, who has been clamoring for war for two years and denouncing every man who does not agree with him in everything, he is exempt under this bill and can safely remain at home. He can not claim his occupation is essential to the maintenance of the Army. On the contrary, the Government will find it necessary to bridle them. But he is exempt. I think it unfair to them and believe they should be given an opportunity to serve instead of restricting it to boys under 25.

There is absolutely no excuse for the War Department not agreeing to the provisions of the volunteer bill providing that men shall serve, so far as possible, with other men from their own communities. The Regular Army officer can have no reason for opposition to it other than his desire to abolish State designations. He wants to have no South Carolina regiments and no Georgia regiments. He wants regiments "A" and "B," and wishes to have the right to assign men to serve where he pleases. Apparently they believe it wise to nationalize the Army. It is true that some of them say that if this bill is passed they may allow men to serve with their neighbors, but they strenuously object to any such restrictions being placed in the bill, and wish to have given to them the right to assign men wherever they please. Under the War Department's conscription bill they would have the right to assign a boy from South Carolina to serve in company "A," regiment "B," by the side of a negro from Indiana. If they did this they would not have to go to Europe for war. It is true that the Secretary of War states that in the past they have endeavored to segregate the races, and he states that he presumes that in the future it will be done, but yet there is in the bill nothing that would prevent it.

I care not what they say, my knowledge of human nature causes me to believe that if a man from South Carolina is allowed to serve by the side of his neighbors and friends from his own State, in a South Carolina regiment, he will make a better soldier than if he is assigned to regiment "A" as a conscript to fight by the side of a conscript from Massachusetts and a conscript from Wisconsin. When a man goes into danger it is natural for him to want to have his friends by his side, and if the boys from South Carolina have to go to the battle fields of Europe, if they can fight by the side of their neighbors and maintain the prestige of the State from which they came they can be depended upon to fight with the same spirit with which their fathers fought in the days gone by.

Mr. Speaker, I have given to this subject the best thought of which I am capable. I have but one object, and that is to promote the cause of my country. We are at war, and I want to successfully prosecute that war. I believe it can best be done through the selective volunteer plan. I think that 60 or 90 days should be fixed as the time in which men can volunteer, and during this time the conscription machinery should be perfected, and that it be resorted to only in case the volunteers fail to respond, and in no event until the expiration of the 90 days. But I want to cooperate with the President, and if the definite time limit can not be secured I will vote to give the President the absolute power to order conscription whenever he decides the volunteer system has failed. With this absolute power he certainly will not be embarrassed by the volunteer plan.

The way to embarrass the President and injure the country abroad is to depart from the traditional method of calling for volunteers and order immediate conscription, thus creating the impression abroad that the people are opposed to the war, would not volunteer, and had to be conscripted.

I know from my conversations with Members of this House that a considerable majority of them are at heart in favor of the selective volunteer plan; and if it shall be defeated, it will be due entirely to the belief entertained by some that the President demands the passage of the War Department bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." I do not believe he entertains any such view or makes any such demand. I have stood by him on every measure in his war program, and have done so because I believed he was right. But I know he respects manhood and reveres constitutional government, and I do not believe he would want Members of Congress, charged by the Constitution with the duty of legislating, to dodge their responsibility, sacrifice their conscientious convictions, and, in a matter where the lives of their people are at stake, pass a bill prepared by the War Department without any consideration. In this matter there is no principle at stake. It is a matter of policy only. I know the President would not say to us, "Yes; you give me the absolute power to order conscription whenever I decide that it should be done, but, in addition to that, I want you to say by your votes that you want me to exercise that power immediately, whether you really want me to do so or not." I have too high an opinion of him to believe he would make such a request of us. If you say, "Stand by the President," I say we are standing by him and are giving him even more than he asks for. We are giving him authority to conscript and, in addition, a volunteer army while he is getting ready to enforce conscription.

In connection with the President's views, it is fair to call attention to the statement contained in his letter to Secretary of War Garrison on February 10, 1916, with regard to the Continental Army. The President wrote:

As you know, I do not at all agree with you in favoring compulsory enlistment for training, and I fear that the advocacy of compulsion before the committee of the House on the part of representatives of the Department of War has greatly prejudiced the House against the proposal for a Continental Army, little necessary connection as there is between the plan and the opinion of the Chief of Staff of compulsory enlistment.

Again, on Memorial Day, May 30, 1916, in a speech at Arlington, he used the following words:

I have heard a great many people talk about universal training. Universal voluntary training with all my heart, if you wish it, but America does not wish anything but compulsion of the spirit of America.

I know that the President has approved of the bill drawn by the Secretary of War, but in view of the above statements I can not believe that in his heart he is very much in favor of it, and I do not believe that he will be offended at any man now giving utterance to sentiments he entertained and expressed less than a year ago.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] stated on yesterday that he was afraid some members of the Military Committee had been influenced by political considerations. This charge is unfair and unjust. I know that the members of that committee have given the most careful study to this question. They had the opportunity to hear the witnesses for and against the bill, and by a majority of 13 to 8 decided in favor of the selective volunteer plan. Three-fourths of the Democrats on the committee favored the volunteer plan and only one southern Democrat voted against it. It is supported by the Democratic Speaker of the House and the Democratic leader. I know that if a man desired to play politics the thing for him to do is to vote for the War Department bill which was approved by the President, for then he doesn't even have to think about it, but can simply make of himself a rubber stamp and say, "The War Department asked for it, the President approved it, and the press demanded it." But, Mr. Speaker, in a matter of this kind, affecting every home in the Nation and every man, woman and child in those homes, a man can not allow his action to be influenced by political fears. He can not transfer to newspaper editors, the Secretary of War, or anybody else the right to think for him. As an honest man, elected by his people to legislate, charged by the Constitution with the duty of legislating, he must vote his conscientious convictions, for only by so doing can he retain his own self-respect and the respect of the people who have honored him with their confidence.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, being in very bad voice this morning I shall ask not to be interrupted, since I may not be able to finish in the time allotted to me.

Mr. Chairman, when Congress accepted the President's interpretation of the German menace to American rights it committed itself to war. It committed itself to the support of the President for a vigorous prosecution of the war. There is no escape from that conclusion, and every thoughtful citizen must agree that if democracy and the independence and permanent peace of the United States depend upon this war it is best to wage it vigorously and to an early finish. No matter whom it affects nor how disastrously the war proclamation can not now be recalled. We are in the fight and must see it through. [Applause.]

Despite the feverish criticisms of Congress by ostentatious patriots who have thus far avoided the recruiting stations, Congress has already shown its confidence in the President, a larger and more sublime confidence in a financial sense, than has ever been reposed in any ruler of any nation. But that was only the first step in our tremendous undertaking. We must now proceed further, and from furnishing money to support the President's war policy must furnish men. It is right that Congress should deliberate upon so grave a question as the sending of American boys into the trenches, and it is right that every safeguard should be thrown around them so that the sacrifies they are to make for their country shall not be in vain. It is a solemn task which confronts Congress, this duty of contributing of its own flesh and blood to a European war, and Congress is right in not proceeding too hastily; but Congress must now do its duty and do it without flinching. It must do it speedily, but fairly and justly, with due regard to the rights and liberties of the American people first. To criticize Congress for moving thus cautiously is as gratuitous on the part of American critics as it would be ungracious on the part of foreign nations who are to be the beneficiaries of American assistance. [Applause.]

It is known to this House that our participation in this European war was not of my choosing. I had hoped the peace and happiness of the people of the United States might be preserved by other means than war. My reasons were stated in the discussions preceding the final appearance of the President to tell us officially of our peril as a nation. But all that is now behind us. We can not now dally with the past; we have decided upon war and war is here. There is no room for division upon questions which have hitherto aroused our passions or that have caused us to suspect the war was brought upon us by design. We must fight as a common people in a common cause, no matter what the burdens or the torments of war, until the permanent peace of the United States is again assured. Difficult as it may be for peace-loving and peace-deserving Americans to realize the gravity of this new situation, we must now meet the conditions that confront us with practical minds and a firm determination to win.

The pending bill is not acceptable to the President and his war experts, but discussion of it has done no harm. Throughout the debate no effort to thwart the main purpose of the President has developed. Discussion has hinged largely upon the question whether the President shall have authority to draft men for the service immediately or give them a limited time to volunteer. Ultimate conscription is generally conceded on both sides of the debate. If the young men of America are given 90 days to volunteer, then conscription is to follow, if they have not appeared in sufficient numbers to fill up the quotas of the Army and Navy and of the National Guard. It is chiefly a question of time. Conscription is to come, anyhow.

I have read the committee's bill with some care and have noted that the minority desires to strike from the bill the paragraph allowing time for volunteers. It is with some satisfaction I note that those who volunteer or those who are drafted are to serve only for "the present emergency." It is not obligatory upon them to make professional soldiers of themselves and thus forsake life's civic opportunities. If that provision is maintained, it seems to me there will be less trouble in recruiting the young men of America who are willing to fight for their country but who do not desire to become mere numbers in a military aristocracy. Since Congress must furnish men to support the President, I am glad they may be drawn into the service with the understanding that independent careers still await them after the war is over. That is an American principle that ought to be preserved. [Applause.]

Another feature of the bill relates to the "selective" draft. I am not sure that I understand the full significance of the word "selective." The President, however, wants the "selective" draft, and the Secretary of War, influenced somewhat by foreign information, has indicated his cordial support of it. What does "selective" mean? If it spells favoritism—the selection of one able-bodied man who has no influential friends and the exemption of another equally serviceable, who has influential friends, I would oppose it. By a process of elimination it would be possible under such a system to establish a military oligarchy which would not be tolerated by a free people. I am convinced that the President nor the military authorities of America have any such purpose in mind; and yet I would prefer that we should be as fair in matters of conscription which affects human life as we are expected to be in the matter of taxes which relate to property. I realize the war, as now proclaimed by the United States, will fasten its burdens directly or indirectly upon all the people, but, so far as we can do so by legislation, we should make these burdens uniform and in fair proportion. If I vote for selective conscription, it will be with the understanding that no favorites are to be played, whether high or low, rich or poor. The man who shouted for war or who profited by war should not be permitted through influence or station to lay the burdens of war unduly upon his fellow man.

Now, as to conscription itself. Shall we wait longer for volunteers to fill up the depleted quotas of our Army and Navy, or shall we permit the President to proceed at once to organize his machinery for the draft? If peace is to be the more speedily restored by quick action, the answer to this query would suggest conscription. It is contended by the minority that a blast from the President's bugle horn would produce 500,000 men in 90 days. If I am not mistaken, the President has already called for volunteers, backed up by every influential newspaper, without producing desired results. The metropolitan press has been filled with alarms of war, frequently devoid of truth, but so startling as to inflame the public mind; but that call for volunteers has not been complimentary to the power of the pen. Mass meetings have passed patriotic resolutions and thousands upon thousands have cheered and waved the flag, but few have enlisted. Civic associations, encouraged by ample publicity, have done their best to stir up the workers of America to the enlisting point, but they, too, have largely wasted their efforts. The amusement places have been thronged with able-bodied men who rise repeatedly and reverentially as the band plays the Star-Spangled Banner, but the recruiting offices continue to beg for recruits. War was virtually declared April 2, full three weeks ago, and every agency of the Army and Navy and of the National Guard has been busy "badgering" men for the service. They have failed to make good the depleted quotas. What, then, shall be done to put the country in fighting trim? It is evident we can not fight battles with patriotic resolutions; neither can we win against a highly efficient organization like that of Germany with cheering patriots in theaters and moving-picture shows. Harsh and surprising as it may be, it seems necessary to resort to the draft. I have resigned myself to that conclusion, believing now that time is the important factor in all our efforts and that the 90 days of grace for volunteers will hinder rather than advance the ultimate restoration of peace. The House bill provides that men shall be drawn whose ages range from 21 to 40 years. It is said there is no dispute in the committee as to the propriety of these age limits. I am glad there is not, because I would prefer not to vote into the service lads under 21 years of age who have had no opportunity to vote upon national questions and who would thus be taken, with or without their own consent or that of their parents. These minors, if not drafted, would have ample opportunity to volunteer if the bill passes as presented. I am not persuaded that any odium will attach to the man who is conscripted under the system proposed in this bill if its provisions are fairly administered. When all men between 21 and 40 years and capable of service are treated uniformly and without favor there can be no disgrace attached to the service. It is inequality and favoritism that justifies the criticism of conscription. If conscription is the law and one man thus drawn is not unduly preferred above another, the complaint against conscription falls to the ground. I shall vote to support conscription because it is necessary to prosecute the war. I shall support it because, as I understand it, the man who has been urging war will be required to do equal service with the man who has hoped the war might be avoided. I shall support it not because I am enamored of the principle, but because the war we have proclaimed must be fought quickly if the prestige, the peace, and the independence of the United States are to be upheld. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this is the best piece of military legislation that has ever been offered at the beginning of any war in which this country has been engaged. A study of its terms will demonstrate that the authors of this legislation have familiarized themselves with the lessons taught by American history and that they have carefully avoided the disastrous mistakes so common in other wars.

ENLISTMENTS FOR THE WAR.

To begin with, the term of enlistment is for the duration of the war or for the emergency, so that there is no danger that when the army which we are about to raise shall reach its maximum efficiency that its ranks will be depleted by the expiration of enlistments. No more severe arraignment of the evil of short enlistments was ever made than the following statement by George Washington in a letter to the President of the Continental Congress:

> Had we formed a permanent army in the beginning we should not have been the greatest part of the war inferior to the enemy, indebted for our safety to their inactivity, enduring frequently the mortification of seeing inviting opportunities to ruin them pass unimproved for want of a force which the country was completely able to afford, and of seeing the country ravaged, our towns burnt, the inhabitants plundered, abused, murdered, with impunity from the same cause.
> There is every reason to believe that the war has been protracted on this account. Our opposition being less, the successes of the enemy have been greater. The fluctuation of the army kept alive their hopes, and at every period of the dissolution of a considerable part of it they have flattered themselves with some decisive advantages. Had we kept a permanent army on foot the enemy could have had nothing to hope for, and would in all probability have listeped to terms long since.

SHORT ENLISTMENTS IN OTHER WARS.

Despite Washington's warning, the same mistake was repeated in the War of 1812 when of the 527,000 men called into the service of the United States but 63,000 were enlisted for a year or more, with the result that during the entire war enough trained and disciplined soldiers could not be assembled at any one time to conquer Canada, although the largest number of British regulars in the Dominion was but 16,500 men. At the outbreak of the Mexican War the enlistment period was fixed at one year, with the inevitable consequence that Gen. Scott was compelled to halt his victorious march to the city of Mexico. He was delayed for six months in the interior of the country until new volunteers arrived to take the places of the time-expired men.

The lesson, however, remained unlearned. The first call by President Lincoln for troops to "suppress the rebellion" specified that their services would be limited to three months. It has been estimated that if enlistments had been made for the duration of the war at the beginning of the conflict between the States that the war would have been shortened by at least a year and that the number of individuals employed in the military service could have been reduced by nearly one-half, with the consequent saving in lives and millions of money. Even to the present time we are directly paying for this lack of foresight, because the size of the pension roll, which still numbers over 350,000 veterans of the Civil War, would have been correspondingly reduced if the Union had been saved by a fewer number of trained men. Let us, therefore, take credit for the prudence and economy which impel us to declare in this bill that the term of enlistment shall be for the duration of the war.

RESERVE BATTALIONS.

Next in importance to enlistments for the war as a method for preventing the depletion of armies is the establishment of a system whereby the regiments at the front can always be kept at full war strength. This bill provides for the creation of a depot or reserve battalion where the recruits for each regiment can be assembled, equipped, and disciplined, so that as casualties occur at the front there will always be trained men to fill up the ranks. During the Civil War nothing of this kind was done. When a regiment was once raised by the State authorities and turned over to the Federal Government all interest in the organization ceased. The governors were more interested in granting new commissions to officers in new regiments than in providing privates to keep the old regiments at full war strength, with the result that untrained men continued to go out under untrained officers to die of camp diseases or to be slaughtered in battle through the incompetence of their commanders.

TERRITORIAL RECRUITMENT.

As a corollary to the establishment of depot battalions the bill provides for territorial recruitment, a plan for raising armies that has been adopted by every European nation, but the merits of which has never been recognized in securing enlistments for our Regular Army. It is but human nature for the soldier to prefer military service among his friends and neighbors. We instinctively dread the idea of dying alone or among strangers, and when one is asked to engage in an enterprise where the chances are that he will be required to lay down his life for his country that solemn prospect can be faced with greater fortitude if one knows that there will be some one near at hand who can at least send the word home that when the final hour came he was not a coward, but died like a man. There is nothing that promotes what the French call "esprit de corps" more than the organization of troops from the same locality, and the establishment of one or more depot battalions in every congressional district in the United States will do more to keep the army filled with willing soldiers than any other method that can be followed.

This bill for the first time at the outbreak of war recognizes the value of expanding the Regular Army and the National Guard to full war strength. Ample provision is made for filling up the ranks with recruits who, by associating with the soldiers who have seen service on the Mexican border, can more quickly be fitted for service in the field than in any other way. By following this plan we will get full value for the $160,000,000 that has been expended as the result of the mobilization of troops within the past year on our southern boundary.

BOUNTIES AND SUBSTITUTES.

In most of our wars bounties of either land or money have been offered in order to obtain enlistments. In this war we are starting out with the theory that the Government has a right to demand of each citizen that he serve his country without being paid a premium to do so. Therefore, there is no mention of bounties in this bill. For the same reason permission is not granted for drafted men to furnish substitutes. Personally I would prefer that both of these evil practices be specifically prohibited, and I shall offer an amendment to that effect when the proper time comes.

CONSCRIPTION THE ONLY ISSUE.

We are all agreed upon these most excellent features of the bill. The only disagreement is over the question of conscription. Gen. Upton, in his Military Policy of the United States, repeatedly declares that the proper way to raise armies in America in time of war is by voluntary enlistments coupled with conscription. This bill follows his advice to the letter, but that does not satisfy those who are seeking to use this legislation as a precedent for the adoption of a system of universal military training and service in time of peace. To the advocates of conscription any recognition of the voluntary principle is abhorrent, and they are therefore demanding that this bill shall provide for a draft forthwith, without waiting to see whether volunteers can be obtained or not.

THE DRAFT IN ARMY REORGANIZATION ACT.

A little over a year ago I had the honor to prepare an amendment to the Army reorganization bill, the adoption of which caused more comment and discussion than any other feature of that act. As finally perfected, my amendment provided for the organization of reserve battalions when the National Guard is in the service of the United States in time of war, and then said:

> If for any reason there shall not be enough voluntary enlistments to keep the reserve battalions at the prescribed strength, a sufficient number of the unorganized militia shall be drafted into the service of the United States to maintain each of such battalions at the proper strength.

That provision was the chief theme for Socialist orators in all parts of the United States during the last political campaign. Pacifists everywhere denounced it. I was even abused in my own State until I explained to my friends that I copied this language from the military code of Arizona, and that I believed that if such a law was good for the people of our State it would also be beneficial to the Nation.

Now, let us analyze the provision that I have just quoted. It can readily be divided into two parts: First, that if in time of war there are not enough voluntary enlistments, then, second, there shall be a draft. I was condemned as a militarist for laying down this proposition in 1916. I am supposed to be lacking in patriotism for defending this identical idea in 1917. The bill that is before the House, which I intend to support, is based upon this very principle.

VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENTS COUPLED WITH CONSCRIPTION.

The bill as favorably reported by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs provides that the President shall immediately call for volunteers to fill up the ranks of the Regular Army and the National Guard to full war strength, and then says that if and whenever the President decides that men can not be obtained by voluntary enlistment to maintain these organizations at the maximum legal strength, then recruits shall be obtained by selective draft. There is no dispute over this part of the bill; it is agreed to by gentlemen on all sides.

The same plan for raising an additional army in increments of 500,000 is also provided for in this bill. It is with respect to these new forces that the controversy over compulsion rages, because the conscriptionists are willing to compromise by allowing volunteers to be admitted to the Regular Army and the National Guard, but they insist that from then on all new organizations shall be raised and maintained by selective draft. For the life of me I can not see why, if volunteering is thought desirable for the Regulars and the National Guard, it should be so fervently condemned in other military units. The same kind of men are to be welcomed at one place if they will volunteer but will be turned away if they freely apply for enlistment at another.

COMPULSION WHEN NECESSARY.

I am no fanatical supporter of the volunteer system. Whenever necessity demands it, conscription is justified. I have but little patience with what is called the political principle that an American citizen can not be compelled either to defend his country or to fight for the democratic principles upon which this Government was founded. In discussing this question in Arizona during the last political campaign I was particular to state on all occasions that in time of war if for any reason volunteers can not be obtained conscription is not only authorized by the Constitution, but justified by necessity.

When this country goes to war it is not your war nor my war, but everybody's war, and America has the right to say that liability to bear the brunt and the burden and the agony of the struggle shall rest on all of her sons. When that time comes no man should be permitted to pick and choose whether or not he will serve in his country's cause. We are in a great war at this very moment, a war that we must win, for if the Imperial German Government be victorious and thereby obtain dominion over the world it will be but the beginning of other wars, because humanity could not long endure the yoke.

I am not here to say that the blow that we are preparing to strike against Germany should in any wise be weakened by the failure to get recruits into our Army. There should be behind that blow every ounce of the strength of this great Nation, because the sooner the victory is won the sooner can our soldiers return to their homes and to the pursuits of peace. It is by reason of my sincere conviction that volunteers who train and fight of their own free will can hit a prompter and harder blow than conscripts that I am pleading that the voluntary system be given a fair trial before it is condemned. An army composed of men who are the masters of their own souls, men who know what they are fighting for and why, is the most effective force that we can employ to bring this war to an early and a successful termination.

PRECEDENT FOR PERMANENT MILITARY POLICY.

In addition to my conviction that volunteers will make a better fighting machine than conscripts, I have a further objection to this hasty adoption of the draft. Much as I dislike to believe it, yet I am convinced that most of the propaganda in favor of selective conscription is founded not so much upon a desire to win the war as it is to accustom the people to this method of raising armies and thereby establish it as a permanent system in this country. Every Member of the House today received a circular letter from Mr. Joseph Leiter, president of the Army League of the United States, approving the General Staff bill in toto but ending with this significant statement:

> The only objections to the administration's bill, from the standpoint of the advocates of national defense, is that it does not give the country a permanent policy. There are no provisions in it by which in the future young men can be trained in peace for war.

I have never been in favor of universal military service in time of peace. I deny that it is possible to devise a complete, coherent, and defensible system of compulsion which will apply equally, honestly, and impartially between different individuals or different classes. In peace or war the time will never come when the entire manhood of this Nation will be summoned to the colors. Unless this is done there can be no equality of service. In every drafting device it is contemplated that many shall be called but that few shall be chosen.

The only justification for conscription is that it is a prompt and a certain way to raise armies when they are needed. Disguise it as you will by the high-sounding title of "universal liability to military training and service," or with other verbal changes, to gull the public, the fact remains that the essence of the thing is compulsion to serve. We hear the phrase "equality of sacrifice" repeatedly uttered, yet there can be no such thing. One who is willing to sacrifice himself does not stop to see whether everyone else will surely do likewise. Sacrifice scorns compulsion. It springs from man's free will, and therein lies the glory of it.

A WAR TO END WARS.

No one can tell what will be the outcome of this war, but it is the devout hope of every one of us that we are making war to the end that wars shall cease. If this hope is not realized, we can at least look forward to a victory which will make the limitation of armaments a reality. Let us trust that the world will be so sick and tired of blood when this war is over that compulsory service will be unnecessary in America.

If unfortunately there should be a barren and inconclusive peace, a mere breathing spell, wherein all the nations of the earth would immediately begin active preparations to spring at each other's throats in the next great war, there may be then good reasons for maintaining a large army in the United States. Should such an evil time arrive, I shall not be found standing in the way of my country's welfare by saying that the size of the Army shall be limited by the number who will voluntarily serve in it.

THE SWISS SYSTEM.

But if a large army is necessary in time of peace it certainly should not be modeled on the plan proposed in this bill. We should in the first place follow the good example of the Swiss Confederation and dethrone the cast that now rules our military establishment by abolishing the Regular Army. Article 13 of the Swiss constitution provides: The Confederation shall have no right to maintain a standing army.

We should deny to but a few army officers a life tenure in their positions, and then if we are going to have a democratic army we should recruit into the military service every able-bodied young man in the country as he comes of age for a comparatively brief period of training, exempting no one. That would be universal service.

The selective draft does not comprehend that principle. There is a great difference between actual service and liability to service. There is too much loose talk about universal liability to service. If 10 men are liable and 1 man goes, the 1 man may give up his life in battle and the other 9 suffer not at all. That is the essence and the unfairness of the selective draft. You can not have universal service unless everyone serves. If this is done, if the reforms that I have suggested are adopted, it might be possible to have universal military service in this country without endangering our democratic institutions.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if he believed that volunteering would not produce sufficient soldiers to win the war finally he would favor conscription from the beginning?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and I shall prove that such has always been the policy among every people and in every nation on earth in the crisis of a great war.

Mr. HARDY. Then, if I understand the gentleman, his opinion is that there will never be any need to resort to conscription?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; because for the size of the army that we are to raise for this war I believe that an ample number of volunteers can be obtained. At any rate we should at least try to get them before we surrender the voluntary principle.

But the kind of conscription in time of peace that I have proposed is the last thing that the militarists, who now urge compulsion, are seeking. What they want is the creation of a still larger body of military overlords, with no other profession but that of arms. They want to have the right to select and train but a comparatively small part of our citizenry who can be disciplined by years of drilling until, like the Germans, they will fight when told to do so, no matter how unholy the cause.

I pray that the result of this war will be a peace so just and so profound that the American people will not be called upon to endure even the most democratic form of conscription.

There is no virtue in military training for its own sake. Those who preach that false doctrine do so only with a view to making an objectionable dose more palatable. No one can make me believe that the barracks is a better place for a young man than his own home. I would rather trust the morals of a boy to his own father and mother than to any drill sergeant. Neither is there much virtue in the oft-repeated assertion that Army life teaches obedience and respect for authority. Men's characters are not made strong through system of discipline which breaks down as soon as the restraining force is removed.

The primary purpose of an army is to fight for the country. Let us not advance sham reasons and false purposes to explain the existence of armed forces. We resort to the draft when we can not get men for the Army. That is reason enough and we need not hunt for another. There is no need to deceive ourselves. Compulsory military service is not founded on confidence, but upon timidity; it is not founded on freedom, but upon the denial of liberty, and it should always be avoided except when there is no other way to find soldiers.

NOT A PERMANENT MILITARY POLICY.

I am very thankful that the President and the Secretary of War had the wisdom and the courage to resist the demands of their military advisers so that we are not asked to adopt a permanent system of conscription which will endure beyond the war. President Wilson, in a published statement, has said:

This legislation makes no attempt to solve the question of a permanent military policy for the country, chiefly for the reason that in these anxious and disordered times a clear view can not be had either of our permanent military necessities or of the best mode of organizing a proper military peace establishment.

We are assured by Secretary Baker that this bill is not the beginning of the practice of universal training or service and does not commit the Government to a present decision of that problem. This legislation therefore can not be considered as a precedent for future legislation which will be binding on Congress in time of peace. The bill itself clearly and repeatedly states that the armies raised in accordance with its terms, whether composed of volunteers or conscripts, shall be disbanded when the present emergency is over.

SIMILAR ASSURANCES IN ENGLAND.

It was necessary that similar assurances be given by the Government in England before the British Parliament would consent to the passage of the compulsory military service bill. I want to put into the RECORD the statements made by the members of their cabinet to refute any claim which may be made that England, whose example we are asked to follow in all military matters, adopted conscription during the war with a view to its continuance after peace is declared. If you will permit me, I would like to read a few extracts from the debates in the House of Commons.

Right Hon. Herbert H. Asquith, the then premier, said:

Although I am, I believe, as keen a supporter of the volunteer system as any man to be found in this House, I consider this bill to be necessary.

Later in the debate he said:

My right honorable friend fears, I am sure quite genuinely and honestly, that if this bill is carried it may be used as a precedent or as a starting point for the adoption of something in the nature of general compulsion. I have no such fear.

ARTHUR J. BALFOUR.

Mr. Chairman, we have with us in America as the head of a great commission to consider the joint conduct of the war a member of the British Cabinet, who was, at the time of the consideration of the military-service bill in the House of Commons, the first lord of the Admiralty, the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour. Many of us had the pleasure of meeting him last night. Let us hear what he said at the time that conscription was adopted in England:

Let me repeat that I have never been one of those who looked with favor upon compulsion in any form—conscription in any form. I have never thought, so far as my knowledge goes—differing in this respect from many of those with whom I agree on almost every other political subject—that the necessity of that position had been demonstrated, and until it could be demonstrated I have always held that it should not be undertaken.

Further along in that same speech he said:

There are those who say that this is the thin end of the wedge of a permanent system of conscription. As they object, like myself, of course, to a permanent system of conscription, they say, "Do not attempt the thin end of the wedge; do not admit this small drop of poison which will permeate the whole body politic."

I believe that they are laboring under a profound mistake. I do not believe this bill is the thin end or by any conceivable turn of the wheel of fortune can be made the thin end of the wedge of the universal system of conscription.

Another member of the cabinet, Herbert Samuel, the home secretary, makes this observation:

There are, no doubt, men in this country and in the house who regard universal military service, apart from military necessity, as a good thing itself—good for the physical training of the people, good for the development of certain moral qualities, good for the inculcation of discipline. For my own part, I emphatically do not belong to that school. Those arguments appear to me to be specious. Physical training can be given far better in other ways than by military service; moral education can also be inculcated in a different fashion with much greater efficiency; and, although discipline within measure is, no doubt, a very desirable thing in a people, independence of character is even more desirable. It has always been the strength of the British nation; and for my part I would rather run the risk of having too little discipline than of having too little independence.

Now, listen to this:

If there be any attempt to introduce compulsion for the sake of establishing a system of universal military service, I, for one, am not a party to that conspiracy, and I do not think I am its unconscious dupe.

A. Bonar Law, secretary of state for the colonies, made the following declaration in the course of the debate in the House of Commons:

NEW ACT OF PARLIAMENT NECESSARY.

The bill, as the prime minister has pointed out, takes these men for the duration of the war and no further; therefore, if what they consider conscription after the war is to come, it can only come by a new vote in a new house of commons.

Arthur Henderson, president of the board of education, one of the labor members in the coalition cabinet, clearly indicated that he supported the bill because it did not mean conscription after the war:

Let me give my reasons for supporting this bill: I do so, as I have already hinted, as a convinced and ardent supporter of the voluntary system. If, therefore, I come forward on behalf of compulsion to-night, I hope the house will believe that it is only because I am convinced that some measure of compulsion is a military necessity and because I see in it none of the insidious menaces to industrial freedom of which we have heard or read so much.

At a later date Mr. Henderson said:

Not only have the prime minister and the secretary of state for the colonies given the most definite assurance that this policy does not obtain after the war, so far as this bill is concerned, but the bill itself is so drafted that the policy it sets up can not be carried on through that same act of parliament.

HISTORY OF CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. Chairman, if the House will bear with me I want to indulge in a brief discussion of the history of conscription, because there is no better way of estimating the effect of the legislation proposed in this bill than to ascertain the reasons which impelled other nations to accept the draft as a mode of raising armies. We can only judge the future by the past, and all history teaches us that it is unwise to do anything by compulsion which can be accomplished voluntarily. I believe that I can conclusively prove that it is only when there was no other way to be found, and when the need was dire, that any nation has ever adopted compulsory military service.

We are told that Cromwell's new model army, with which he liberated England, was largely composed of conscripts; but let us see what it was that induced the great commoner to adopt the draft. By the time the war had lasted a year he found that the zeal of his supporters was insufficient to fill the ranks of the army of the Commonwealth. England must be made free from the power of an absolute monarch. As the only way to win the war which established constitutional government in England, Cromwell resorted to impressment.

THE JOURDAN LAW IN FRANCE.

The first universal military-service law ever adopted by any country was passed in 1798 by the Five Hundred, which was then the legislative body in France. The newly established Republic was threatened by a coalition of kings, and greater armies were needed to meet their onslaught. On September 23, 1798, the conscription law was voted, upon Gen. Jean Baptiste Jourdan's recommendation. It declared that every Frenchman was born with the obligation of serving his country. Young men from 20 to 25 years old were divided into five classes designed to supply the necessary conscripts, beginning with the youngest. The Government was first to call the class of 20 years, then all the others in succession, according to its needs. In time of peace the conscript was to be released at the end of five years. In time of war he might be held to the colors for an indefinite period. This law, designed to meet a great emergency, fastened universal military service onto the people of France.

THE "KRÜMPER SYSTEM" IN PRUSSIA.

Prussia, defeated by Napoleon and in fear of his power, was the next great country to adopt conscription. Scharnhorst's "Memoir on the Defense of the Country and on a National Militia," which bears date of July 31, 1807, is the earliest document which sets forth the idea of universal service. The plan he proposed, afterwards known as Krümper system, was systematically put into action so that the Prussian Army came to be boastfully called "the union of all the moral and physical energies of the nation."

By a secret article of the treaty made after the peace of Tilsit, it was agreed that Prussia should limit her army to 42,000 men and should not form a militia or civic guard. Prussia had lost more than one-half of her territory and the most valuable fortresses remained in the hands of the French. In this hour of sore distress Scharnhorst devised his plan of universal military service to regenerate the Prussian Army. By this plan the whole male population would in time pass through the army, because as the recruits became drilled they were granted furloughs and fresh men were called to take their places. Within five years Prussia had 150,000 trained men ready for the war of 1813, and they greatly contributed to the defeat of Napoleon. But by the adoption of this system the foundation of Prussian militarism was laid. This plan of universal military service, which was afterwards extended to all of Germany, is the root and source of all of the misery and ruin which has been wrought by this world-wide war.

CONSCRIPTION IN THE CIVIL WAR.

There were no pressed men in the American armies by act of Congress during the Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, or the War with Spain. It was only in the War between the States, when all recognized that the life of the Nation was at stake, that the people of this country consented to the draft. The first experiment of conscription on this continent was undertaken by the Confederate Congress in April, 1862.

It has been said that in all human history no deliberative body ever dared to push its authority so far as did the Confederate Congress in the adoption of conscription. Let us see what it was that drove the members of that body to such drastic action. In the West Fort Donelson had fallen, with the loss of 9,000 prisoners. The Confederates had been defeated in the desperate Battle of Shiloh. In the East the Army of the Potomac, large and well disciplined, was ready to advance on Richmond. The one-year enlistments of the Confederate soldiers were about to expire, so that their armies were hastening to dissolution. Upton, in his Military Policy, thus describes the situation:

A monta more, or two months at the furthest, and the gigantic Rebellion, organized to establish the sovereignty and independence of the States, would be a thing of the past, its leaders fleeing from the wrath of a loyal and outraged people. The situation was desperate; the crisis had arrived; the triumph of the Union was at hand.

At this juncture it was reserved for a Confederate Congress to explain for all time the meaning and extent of the power to raise and support armies. Appalled, but not unmanned, it rose to the occasion and setting an example that was followed a year later by the National Congress, resolved to meet the emergency by declaring every man between the ages of 18 and 35 a soldier. Had it been the object of the law to force reluctant citizens into the ranks, the experiment might not have seemed hazardous, but going far beyond, to conscript armies numbering more than 100,000 soldiers who had faithfully fulfilled their engagements and were already turning their affections homeward, the temerity of this legislation finds no parallel in the history of the world. But the end justified the means; the reorganization which was languishing was immediately completed; the ranks were filled up and given the strength of increasing numbers; the Confederate armies again took the field to baffle and resist the onset of the Union hosts until, dwindling to the former shadows of themselves, they were finally compelled to lay down their arms at Appomattox Court House.

LINCOLN AND THE DRAFT.

Within a year after the Confederacy adopted conscription the Federal Government was likewise forced to resort to the draft. We are told that Abraham Lincoln approved this legislation, but let us see what it was that drove him to do so. Lincoln said:

The republican institutions and territorial integrity of our country can not be maintained without the further raising and supporting of armies. There can be no army without men. Men can be had only voluntarily or involuntarily. We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily, and to obtain them involuntarily is to draft, the conscription. If you dispute this fact and declare that men can still be had voluntarily in sufficient numbers, prove the assertion by yourselves volunteering in such numbers, and I shall gladly give up the draft. Or if not a sufficient number but any one of you will volunteer he for his single self will escape all the horrors of the draft and will thereby do only what each one of at least a million of his manly brethren have already done. Their toil and blood have been given as much for you as for themselves. Shall it all be lost rather than that you, too, will bear your part?

No one can read these words of Abraham Lincoln and then say that he favored conscription for its own sake.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield me more time?

Mr. DENT. Before I yield additional time I would like to make an announcement which I think would be of some interest to Members of the House. I had an agreement with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that in view of the large number of requests made of him and of me to speak on this bill that we will continue general debate all day to-morrow, and that I will ask the House when it adjourns, to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning for that purpose, so that everybody can be accommodated who desires to speak. I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is universally admitted that the limited number of conscripts actually obtained in both the North and the South were almost worthless as fighting material. Many of them deserted at the first opportunity and but few showed that they had any heart in the work of the war. The chief result of the draft on both sides was that this plan kept thousands of veterans in the armies who would have otherwise been discharged and other thousands voluntarily enlisted to avoid the odium of compulsion. The laws for the draft indirectly supplied the need for soldiers, which caused its passage, but I have yet to hear of anyone who has pointed with pride to the fact that such legislation was necessary.

CONSCRIPTION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

In Great Britain we have the latest example of a free people who have been driven by military necessity to adopt conscription. After raising over 5,000,000 soldiers by voluntary enlistments the British Parliament reached the conclusion that the failure to bring every available man into the army meant the triumph of Germany with all that that implies. The issues at stake were so vital and the successful conclusion of the war so essential to the future welfare of the English people that they broke with the greatest of their traditions and accepted universal compulsory military service during the present war. David Lloyd-George, the then minister of munitions, gives all the reasons in a few words:

Those who are responsible for the conduct of this war, the most serious war in which we have ever been engaged, a war in which there are greater issues involved to this country and for humanity than any other war that has ever been waged, are advised by the military authorities that it makes a difference possibly between defeat and victory for us to secure these men. We can not find other means of getting them; we must get them immediately. * * * I would rather be driven from public life than have on my conscience the refusal of such a demand.

The sum and the substance of all of these references to history is that the citizens of no country have been willing to yield up their personal liberty and to sacrifice their individual freedom except where it was brought home to them that there was no other way to save their country. When such necessity has been proven the burden is accepted, rights are waived, and every available man is called up and made ready to go into the field to fight, and if need be to die, that the Nation may live.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have but 10 minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. I will make a very short question.

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is in favor of the draft if it is necessary to win the war?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; if absolutely necessary.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that the British arms would have been more effectual and probably have shortened the war if they had resorted to draft at first instead of at last? I would like to have the gentleman discuss that proposition.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the British Government had done as we are proposing to do by this bill, they would have promptly accomplished every military purpose. That is to say, called for volunteers with the draft ready for action instead of getting soldiers after months and months of waiting.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman thinks this prolonged the war on the part of the British Government?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is the universal testimony.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. The mistake of the British Government was not in the amount of men they got but because they had no safeguards around the volunteer system, and therefore they enlisted men whose services were indispensable in the industries upon which the success of the army must depend.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and I want to compliment the members of the Committee on Military Affairs for the safeguards which they have placed in this bill which do so much to perfect the volunteer system.

Mr. FIELDS. We have put those safeguards in our bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. The volunteer system, with proper safeguards, should have a fair trial in this country. Until it has been tried we should, at least, preserve the voluntary principle and we should not be hasty in doing away with it.

Mr. MASON. If the gentleman will yield, I understand they are enlisting now, under present conditions, at the rate of 4,000 a day, and the Secretary of the Navy makes the statement he was enlisting more rapidly——

Mr. HAYDEN. That may be true in the Navy, but it is hardly true in the Army. I desire to state in conclusion that the question before this House to-day is, has such a compelling military necessity been proven that we should abandon the traditional plan of raising armies by voluntary enlistments and secure our soldiers by conscription? No one is more anxious than I to see all those who fight for democracy emerge victorious from this war, and if I believed that nothing but an army composed of millions of Americans could bring about the destruction of Prussian militarism, which threatens to involve the world, I would not hesitate to vote to draft all the men that are needed to complete the work so nobly begun by our fellow democrats who are fighting in France. But, as I view the situation, it is not more soldiers that the allies need in order to bring the Teutons to terms. The fighting forces of the entente powers now outnumber our enemies by over 4 to 1. It is not men, but munitions and rations, that are needed to win this war. The least service that the United States can render is to add to the already overwhelming numbers at the front.

FOOD, CLOTHING, AND AMMUNITION NEEDED.

Our chief part in this conflict, and for it we are well prepared, is to see that the veterans who have learned through two bitter years of struggle the way to drive the Germans back shall not suffer for food or clothing or for an abundance of all forms of the arms and ammunition which are required in such great quantities in modern warfare. Our people are not trained to arms, and the year that must be spent before any large number of our soldiers can be fitted for service on the battle fields of Europe might better be spent in using these same men in the production of the things that the allies most sorely need. It follows logically that if our greatest contribution to the war is to be in the form of the products of our fields and mines and factories, then but a limited number of men should be permitted to cease from work of national importance in order to become soldiers. To send such men out of the country would be not only an economic but a military waste.

MILITARY NECESSITY NOT PROVEN.

Lincoln said:

> We must somehow obtain more men or relinquish the original object of the contest, together with all the blood and treasure expended in the effort to secure it. * * * We have ceased to obtain them voluntarily.

Lloyd-George said:

> We can find no other means of getting men; we must get them immediately.

Can anyone favoring conscription advance like reasons at this time? No; for the voluntary system has not been even tried. No call has been issued asking for willing soldiers for this war, and if the officers of the Regular Army have their way, no such call will even be made. It is their desire that a vast horde of men shall be forced to present themselves for inspection and that out of this great number the best shall be taken to serve in the Army. This bill, temporarily at least, denies these officers that privilege by saying that those who freely offer their services shall be first enlisted and that if enough come forward of their own free will there shall be no draft. The American volunteer, under trained officers, can more quickly learn the art of war than any other man on earth. Why waste time teaching unwilling conscripts when better material can be had for the asking? Who knows how many Americans will volunteer? Nobody. The only way to find out is to try, and I want to see every proud-spirited man given a chance to volunteer before any man is drafted.

OBJECT OF THE WAR.

What are we fighting against in this war? Autocracy and militarism. We want to see the German people delivered from a system of government which lodges the war-making power in the hands of the Kaiser. But however much the Emperor of Germany might have the will to make war, he would not do it if he did not have a conscript army ready to obey his commands. Therefore to have permanent peace in the world we must not only destroy kaiserism but we must take away the facile weapon of tyranny which enables him to terrorize the world. Let us not pay Prussian militarism, which we are seeking to destroy, the compliment of adopting the most hateful and the most baneful of its institutions.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there has been much confusion in the public mind as to the purpose and purport of this proposed legislation. Many of the members, I am sure, have received letters and messages from people throughout the country urging them to stand by the President's plan of universal military training and universal military service. Some of them have said that they believed in the principle of universal obligation to military duty. There has been a propaganda throughout the country for conscription under the disguise of universal military service [applause] and universal military training. Of course no Member of this House is deceived by that disguise. We all know there is nothing in the House bill, nor the Senate bill, nor in any amendment that has been proposed, so far as I know, that relates in any way to universal military training or universal military service. The only proposition before this Congress that in any way relates to the principle of universal obligation to perform military duty is the provision providing for conscription which denies the principle of universal obligation to military service. [Applause.]

It is proposed by this plan of conscription to compel 2,000,000 men to fulfill their obligation to the Government and deny to 20,000,000 men of serviceable age the right to fulfill their obligation to the country to do military service. You strike a blow at the most fundamental principle of government and at the most sacred duty of the citizen. [Applause.] Yet it has been sent out broadcast throughout the country that some of us are opposed to the principle of universal obligation to do military service. If there are any here who do not recognize the principle of universal obligation, it must be those of you who would force the burden of defending their country on the few and deny to the many the privilege of fulfilling their obligation—that same obligation to defend their country. This obligation is admitted by all. The proposition is not susceptible of argument. It is the very fundamental truth on which human government is founded. The solemn oath to defend is born with every native and subscribed by every naturalized citizen. Nobody but an anarchist would deny the principle of universal obligation to defend his country in the hour of need. There is no issue of that kind before us and these propagandists have sought to deceive the people.

What is the issue before the House? We are at war and all agree that we must raise an army. How shall we raise it is the sole question. You gentlemen who favor conscription have the burden to show to the country that conscription is better than the system that we have followed from the beginning of the Republic. You are seeking to substitute a military plan that has never been tried by this Government at the beginning of any war for one that has given us the best armies in the world, and has been the glory of our soldiery and the pride of the American people. It was the spirit of the volunteer that has conquered every foe with whom we have contended. Yet men have charged that is a failure. Where has it failed? Not a man on this floor has pointed to a single instance where the American Volunteer Army has failed. [Applause.] I defy any man who has spoken or who is to speak, to show us where such failure is recorded in history. The only instance that I know where conscripts fought on American soil were the Hessian mercenaries, which surrendered without firing a shot, and those Hessian conscripts were made prisoners by a little band of Volunteers who crossed the Delaware on the ice in the night time. [Applause.] Where in the history of our Republic will you go to find proof for conscription? He who charges failure of the volunteer plan does not know or is not true to the history of his country.

I am in favor of universal military training. Next to these important, these immediate war measures now before Congress, the most important thing we could do would be to adopt a system of universal military training. And I am in favor, too, of universal military service to the utmost limit of the country's need. But you gentlemen who profess to stand for these things would nullify the very principle of universal obligation by limiting the opportunity to service to a very few.

Gentlemen have produced some strange arguments here in favor of conscription. One gentleman said yesterday that if we adopted the volunteer system and it failed, and we had to resort to conscription, it would be an indication to the world that the spirit of America was not in this war. If we adopt conscription now, will not our enemy have the same reason to say, right at the very inception of the war, that the spirit of the American people is not in favor of the war?

My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] eloquently portrayed to this House the horrors of raising an army by a volunteer system. He said the politicians would appeal to the passions of men; that by impassioned speech they would create hard feelings in the minds of the soldiers against our enemy, and inspire bitterness and hatred in their hearts. It is that very spirit that rules nations at war and is a splendid spirit for a soldier to have who goes out to fight. What will you do with these conscripts? Will you teach them "peace on earth, good will to men," and send them across the ocean to be shot by the guns of the Kaiser, or will you have them shoot back? They say they will not enlist, that the young men of America will not volunteer. How do you know that? They have always volunteered. Never in the history of our country has the country needed volunteers but that it got them. Point to a single instance where we did not have enough volunteer soldiers to fight our battles and to win our victories.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What about 1863?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman cite the Civil War as a failure of the volunteer system? [Applause.] Did it not succeed then? Does any gentleman still think that war a failure? Did not the volunteer soldiers of the North come forward as fast as the Government could use them? Two and one-half million men volunteered and only 61,000 were drafted. Do you conscriptionists point with pride to any great victories won in the Civil War by the conscripts? Not one regiment of them was at the front in a single battle.

Mr. TILSON. Why did they pass a draft act at all?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I suppose they passed it to get some of the skulkers that would not volunteer. If they passed it to get soldiers, they were disappointed. The gentleman from Wisconsin on yesterday cited the draft riots of the Civil War as an argument in favor of the draft system. Now, just think of it! The conscript law of 1863 when enforced caused riots; therefore we should have another conscript law. What a pitiable spectacle this great Republic would present to the nations if we, by some unwise step now, in adopting a conscript system, would cause draft riots in the United States at the very inception of this war. Let those volunteer who will, and then public sentiment will sustain the draft of those who will not.

It was the volunteers who fought the battles in the War of 1812. Whatever degree of failure we suffered in that war, it is not chargeable to the volunteer army. It was due to the fact that a little band of miserable pacifists concluded a treaty of peace before Jackson could get his volunteers into action. And then those volunteers were so determined to whip somebody that they whipped an army of twice their size in a period of profound peace. It is true they did not know that peace had been declared, but they knew that an armed force had invaded American territory, and to the volunteer that is sufficient. I remember so distinctly the account of the casualties as given in the old school history which I studied when a boy. It was like this: "British killed, 2,600; Americans killed, 8; wounded, 13."

Another reason for conscription, urged by those who favor it, is that it takes all the men into the service on an equality. That suggestion is abhorrent to me. You take away from the man who stands ready and willing to defend his country the glory that he is entitled to. On account of that splendid spirit you have no right by legislation to deprive him of that glory. By the very law of good and evil he is entitled to it. It proves his appreciation of his obligation, and society, by its decree, has crowned that man with the glory which he has earned. Why should you seek to put the sluggard on the same plane? He has earned no such place in the public favor. It is not in the heart of him to realize his obligation to his country, and he is not entitled to be placed by law in the same class with the man who will cheerfully offer his sacrifice on the altar of his country. The volunteer is entitled to the distinction, and the conscript deserves the stigma. The decree of society in this is inexorable, and you can not change it by legislation. It is in the very nature of human government for citizens to do homage to the man who willingly defends it. Away with this false doctrine that he who is willing and he who is unwilling should by legislation be placed on the same dead level. Would you take away from the soldier his greatest inspiration and kill the very spirit of patriotism on which our Republic must depend for its defense in the hour of trial?

Let me answer those who urge conscription on the ground that the American youth will not volunteer to fight his country's battles. You gentlemen get that from the War Department. I submit that it does not take a military expert to tell Members of Congress whether or not the young men of the country will enlist in their country's cause. We ought to know better the feeling of the people than the military man who stands aloof. I am willing to defer to military authority in matters pertaining to an army, but I am not willing to defer to them as to the best means of raising one. The Constitution devolved that duty on us, and the man who votes for conscription because the President wants it is shirking his responsibility. Even though the President is willing to assume the responsibility, we have no right to evade it, and we ought to be willing to perform our duties in accordance with our convictions. I have heard Members of this House say that they much prefer the volunteer system, but they defer to the President in the matter and will vote for conscription.

I believe that men will volunteer in the Army for the war. They will come faster than the War Department is prepared to train and equip them. I believe that we should give the President the best army the country will produce, and my judgment is guided by the experience of the past when I resolve that the volunteer plan is the surest way to get it. I am guided by history, and I know of no reasons why the teachings of the past should be ignored. The Army men tell us that they know they will not volunteer for the war, because they have not volunteered in the Regular Army. It has been some years, it is true, since the regular organizations were filled to the limit, and it is true that some special effort has been made within the last year to recruit the Regular Army, but I do not wonder that young Americans do not volunteer for the Regular Army. A life of idleness around an army post is distasteful to most of them. The young manhood of this country has some aim in life; they have hopes and ambitions, and they hesitate to mortgage their seven best years to military life in time of peace. The very fact that they will not enlist in the Regular Army in time of peace is the best evidence that they have that mettle which will volunteer in time of war. I know that some will volunteer, and I appeal to you that it is our duty to give those who are willing the chance to distinguish themselves by voluntarily offering their services to their country. We owe that to them whether few or many, and if it fails to bring to the flag the required number, then will be time enough to pass conscription, and we will have on our side the only justifiable reasons for conscripting a man to military service—the fact that he will not volunteer.

How can one who knows the histories of wars contend for conscripts? They have been pronounced by the wisest military men of the world as inferior soldiers. I say to you that you can not point out a single instance in all history where a conscript army defeated a volunteer army of equal or greater size. [Applause.] The pages of history are illumined by the recital of great battles where volunteer armies have beaten conscript armies of equal or greater size.

Look at the Battle of Marathon, where Greek volunteers defeated the Persian hosts of conscripts. Eleven tribes fighting separately each under his own chief and all under Miltiades. Neighbor fought by the side of neighbor, kin fought side by side, 10,000 men in all met and vanquished 100,000 conscripts from Persia on the plains of Marathon. [Applause.] At the battle of Valmy, Kellermann, with his little army of volunteers, made up of artisans, mechanics, laborers, and lowly peasants, met the king's conscripts and won, and from that day France dates the beginning of free government. [Applause.]

Ah, you say, this volunteer system sacrifices the best men of the country. You say that only the brave, only the very flower of young manhood, goes into a volunteer army. And that is true. You do sacrifice the best men of the country, and that has been the price that every nation and every people has paid for liberty throughout the history of the world. It is the only price at which it may be bought. If we would continue to enjoy it we must, when assailed by autocracy, be prepared to make the most costly sacrifice, that of our bravest, most loyal men.

It is true if we pass conscription at this time before a call for volunteers is made, many brave and loyal men will be taken. Men who with their fine sense of obligation to their country will serve as valiantly as if permitted to volunteer, but it is for them that I plead. I want them to have the distinction to which they are entitled. Let us not class them with the men who would not have volunteered. Let us give the young men of the country a chance to divide, so that those who come forward will be known as the real patriots and those who lag behind until the conscriptor comes may be known for what they are. Let us make it so that the patriot who falls may be duly glorified, and that those who survive may feel a pride in the distinction which they earned.

The volunteer system is the logical system of republics. Every autocracy that ever existed has maintained itself by conscription. It is the weapon which autocrats have always used to enforce tyranny. Every free government when assailed has called for volunteers. The cause of this awful war is a military autocracy, and if it can be destroyed the world will have some compensation for its cost. But let us beware that we fasten no military autocracy on this Republic. If we do, it is the beginning of the end of free government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I have been instructed by the chairman of the committee to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that in some respects I am differently situated from any other Member of the House, so far as this bill is concerned. In my canvass last fall, in the beginning of the canvass, the Republican nominee was suffering from a slight indisposition and declined to agree to a joint canvass. I went ahead and canvassed a number of my counties before he got well enough to begin his speeches, or at least until he did begin them. He began his canvass on the 25th day of October, and his first speech was printed by him in pamphlet form and sent out, and I hold a copy of it in my hand. There you will see his picture. It is good-looking, and he is a strong and popular man.

This is no hatched-up, post-election promise or decision that I have taken. Now let me read to you what he said in that first speech. Under the head of "Preparedness," he says:

I am not a "peace-at-any-price" pacifist. I am in favor of enough military preparation to properly police the country, but to say that we are immune from militarism is absurd. I am unalterably opposed to that part of the national-defense act which Mr. SIMS voted for, which provides that the President of the United States can conscript or have conscripted, in time of war, any citizen of the United States subject to military duty between the age of 18 and 45 years. He can under this act go to your home, force your boy before he is old enough to vote to join the Army, and if one of these conscripted soldiers shall make any show of violence against any superior officer he shall suffer death, no matter what the provocation may have been. That is militarism with a vengeance, and is wholly at variance with American ideals of liberty. It tends to reduce us to the standard of European customs in subjecting us to the rule of a military despotism. If I had been in Congress and had allowed this extreme militaristic influence to clutch the American people by the throat in this way without strenuous objection and emphatic protest, and had sanctioned it with my vote, I would not only retire from Congress but would never ask a free people for another position of trust.

In a newspaper published in his town a week later, a newspaper which was championing his canvass since his campaign began, this statement was made:

Mr. SIMS lined up against the masses and voted for the conscription of our boys in the service and the penalty of death if they refuse to go to become gunfodder, as provided in the national-defense act. Do you call a vote compelling the sons of American freemen and the husbands of American women to go to war against their will, to be drafted into the service and forced to face death regardless of their wishes and will in the matter, voting for the masses?

When making a speech at Big Sandy on the 25th of October I was informed by telephone that my opponent had made the above-quoted statement, and I was informed that it would absolutely destroy my prospects of election if it was not contradicted and was generally believed. I stated that the statement was not correct—that I had not voted for conscription. I stated that if I had it had been sneaked into the bill in some way without my knowledge. I said not only that I had not voted for it but that I never would vote for conscription unless it was a last resort, and that there was no other means by which an army could be raised wherewith our institutions might be saved and perpetuated.

Now, how could I, in view of that preelection promise, take any other position than the one I am taking? It took all I could do by telephone, telegraph, and by personal letters, and by my own speeches to overtake that incorrect and untrue statement sufficiently early to prevent my defeat by it. And in spite of it all it came near defeating me. I was elected by only 221 majority. I think my opponent had been imposed on by some newspaper statement as to what was in the national-defense act.

Now, my friends, I do not use this fact as an excuse for my vote, but, aside from this incident, I could not vote any other way than against conscription as a system for raising our armies [applause] without being untrue to my pledged word and promise made many times prior to the above charge. If I should do so, no man would ever believe that I made that promise for any other purpose than to be elected, with the mental reservation to repudiate it when elected. I hope I have moral courage. I care nothing for brute courage only when I am dealing with a brute. But moral courage is the foundation of our institutions, of our integrity, of our judicial system, of our moral standards, and is the bulwark of human society. I will not vote in violation of my pledge if I lose the seat I hold by refusing to do so. I could not in honor do any other way than to vote against conscription in any form.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I have very little time.

Mr. BORLAND. I know the gentleman well enough to believe that he certainly reserves the right to follow his best judgment at any crisis of danger, regardless of previous convictions or previous statements.

Mr. SIMS. Well, then, you do not know the facts; that is all.

Mr. BORLAND. Do not I? Then the gentleman ought not to represent a district in this House.

Mr. SIMS. I stated in my speech——

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman is not willing to meet the danger of the moment by the exercise of his judgment, he ought not to hold a seat in this House.

Mr. SIMS. Do not make my speech for me unless you are going to change again. I said I would never vote for conscription under any circumstances, except as a last resort. This is the first war legislation presented. Would that come within the terms of my pledge and promise? We have not fought a battle; we have not fired a gun; we have not enlisted a soldier under this act, because it is not yet a law. The implication of the gentleman's question is that because somebody else, the General Staff or somebody professing to have greater knowledge of military affairs that I have, says it is necessary to win the war, the gentleman wants me to violate my plighted faith and to follow some technical expert. If the gentleman expects me to do that, he is very much mistaken. If I did not know that the gentleman is my warm personal friend, I would regard his last statement as offensive and insulting.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Surely; if the gentleman will be quick about it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The bill presented by the majority of the committee has conscription in it after a certain time.

Mr. SIMS. And I am absolutely opposed, in initial legislation, to providing for alternative conscription.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then the gentleman is opposed to both propositions?

Mr. SIMS. I am against that part of the House bill absolutely and unconditionally. If I vote for a proposition for two systems, and leaving it to those who are to execute it to accept either, I think that it would not be a compliance with my promise and my position in opposition to adopting conscription as a system for raising armies.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the gentleman going to offer an amendment to strike out that provision?

Mr. SIMS. I am willing to offer it and vote for it and do everything I can to knock it out of the House bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then if it is defeated, will the gentleman vote for the bill offered by the majority of the committee?

Mr. SIMS. Just like it is in the Senate?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; like it is offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. As between it and the Chamberlain bill, which I consider to be worse; yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am asking the gentleman, if his amendment is defeated, will he vote for the bill?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is taking up my time. I know he does not want to do it. If he will get me the time, I will be glad to yield to him. I say that to provide for conscription in initial legislation is to say to the world that we ourselves have not confidence in getting volunteers enough to fight for and save the institutions of free government and democracy to the world. That is what it means. But as between two propositions that I do not like, I will take the lesser of the two evils.

Now, my friends, we are being bombarded with letters and telegrams asking us to stand by the President. Some of those telegrams and letters come from sources that utterly condemned and repudiated the policy of the administration and its conduct of our affairs with Mexico, who charged the administration with being weak and vacillating, and with being the cause of the loss of the lives and property of American citizens in Mexico. Some of these gentlemen have charged that the Lusitania would not have been sunk if it had not been for the weak and vacillating note-writing policies of the administration. What did some other very distinguished men who now want me to violate an honorable pledge in order to vote for what they want—what did some of them say about the President's acts and words? What did one distinguished man say? How did he characterize the words and acts of the President of the United States? He characterized them as "weasel words and weasel deeds" that deserved the contempt and repudiation of the American people. My friends, the time does not permit me to discuss all these things, but I suppose some people would not accept salvation under the voluntary plan as being too undemocratic and too unequal. The future life, the souls of men and women must be saved, if saved at all, by the voluntary sacrifice of the Son of God Himself. He came to this world and died on the cross that others might live in eternal bliss and happiness. No soldier of the cross is a drafted man. At one fell swoop in the only war that they ever had in heaven the volunteers turned out the conscripted forces and sent them to where they have been ever since. [Applause and laughter.]

But let me tell you, my friends, you must look at this thing from a practical standpoint. Now, do not mistake me. I am talking offhand. I say it takes ballots as well as bullets to win a war. Two general elections have been held for Congressmen and Senators since this war began. If it takes as long to prepare an army under either plan, as the War Department says it will, not less than 8 or 10 months, will any soldier recruited in this country except under the volunteer plan be confronting an actual German phalanx before the next election? If this war is going to be won, as some men claim it will be, in six or eight months, we will never get a man to the firing line in France, especially under the conscript system; and if the Germans are to be vanquished in that short time it will have to be done by the soldiers of the allies who are now there doing the fighting. In one year from now there will be primaries to nominate Members of the House and Senate, and nothing could happen which would be more unfortunate than for a Congress to be elected in opposition to the war policies of the administration. When you go out with a new-born courage and seek reelection after you have reversed the whole American policy, the policy of free choice and free service for the European continental compulsory service systems, how many do you think will get back here?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The majority of them.

Mr. SIMS. That is a matter of judgment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman from Tennessee expects to be a candidate for reelection?

Mr. SIMS. I never become a candidate this far ahead.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I thought the gentleman was going to be a candidate.

Mr. SIMS. I never begin a race so far ahead.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield.

Mr. FOCHT. A high-class Member of this House said the other day that it did not matter which side you took on this question, we were all going to be licked anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. That may be true, but I do not want it to be made absolutely certain by following the advice of men who have sought to discredit the administration ever since it came into power. What was one of the first things that happened after this administration came in? It was the celebrated Carabou dinner in Washington, in which the song "We will give them the Kraag" was featured in the dinner. It was regarded as so offensive to the administration and the President that the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War reprimanded the officers of the Army and the Navy that took part in it. That was the very first thing. What did a very distinguished general in the Regular Army do? What happened to him? He was called down for making a speech at Plattsburg and stopped from making more speeches like it.

The fact is that the military classes of this country have not been in accord with the administration. What happened a few days ago? A retired rear admiral was refused an opportunity to accept an invitation in which it was generally believed that a speech criticizing the administration would be delivered.

Now, you prate about standing by the President. I voted in every instance and under all circumstances for the general policies of the administration. This conscription idea was not born in the brain of the President. He has been told, as we have been told, that the volunteer system is a failure, and that the only way to win a war is by conscription, and, believing it, has accepted the advice of military experts. It was not born in his brain. He never initiated the policy of compulsory service. That policy is as old as despotism.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman had a horse to shoe, would he take it to a lawyer or a blacksmith?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I have known a man who is both a lawyer and a blacksmith.

Mr. HOWARD. If you were President and wanted advice as to military matters, would you go to the military advisers?

Mr. SIMS. Why, as a matter of course. I said the President never originated the idea of abandoning the volunter system on his own initiative, but by reason of the advice of the military experts, the General Staff, who have never been in sympathy with the volunteer system.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; briefly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman recall that the President is something of a historian himself and knows a few things?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I have read some of the historical writings of the President.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Did not this bill originate with the President?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think so. I understand it originated in, or is the product of, the brains of the General Staff and of the War College.

Mr. McCORMICK. At the instance of the President.

Mr. SIMS. Here is the gentleman from Nebraska, on the Military Committee; he can tell you.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The Secretary of War stated that he drafted the bill himself, with the advice of the war experts.

Mr. McCORMICK. Did not the Secretary of War draw it at the instance of the President?

Mr. SIMS. Have not I already said that the President accepted the advice of those upon whom he must rely in time of war?

Mr. McCORMICK. Was not the President the first person to refer to the selective draft and recommend its adoption?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know; I know that the gentleman from Illinois was not the first man that ever defended this administration.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; nor to attack it either.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. MEEKER. Has not the gentleman during his past career literally taken the hide off from the fellows that did not stand by the President?

Mr. SIMS. I have; and I expect to take some more the same way. [Laughter.] But those were propositions that came from the President, were advocated by the President on his own initiative, and not depending upon the advice of experts.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. It has been stated upon the floor of the House by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that Congress in this emergency is a mere rubber stamp. Is not the gentleman placing the President in the same class?

Mr. SIMS. No; not at all; because it is apparent that as the military experts have got to fight the war, that their advice should not be too lightly disregarded, and that it would be more logical to follow their plan in providing for the means with which to fight the war. I have only said that, in my opinion, this compulsory service plan did not originate with the President.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman advised us to stand by the President up to the time that we got into the war, but when we get into the war he advises us all to desert him.

Mr. SIMS. No; that is not at all correct. I do not advise anyone to desert him. I am going to vote as I said I would before election, and without which declaration I could not have been elected. [Laughter and applause.] You can all repudiate your preelection pledges if you want to, but I can not do so. I, without expert knowledge, do not believe that we can fight a successful war with the mightiest military power on earth by abandoning the old-established well-known volunteer system and adopting the European systems of conscription. I want us to win this war, and, therefore, I want the next House and the Senate to be prowar, proadministration, and I do not want us to do anything that may bring about a different result.

Mr. DYER. Is not this the time to stand by him—when we are at war?

Mr. SIMS. I am standing by the President. I voted for the declaration of war; I fought and voted against the McLemore resolution, and I thought and said at the time that a 30-day ultimatum ought to have been given to Germany as soon as the Lusitania was sunk. I have been as much in favor of standing by the rights of humanity and the international law of the world as any man in this House, and I believe a great and sufficient body of men of military age in this country are ready to volunteer in order to preserve and maintain the institutions of this country and its ideals, and that they do not have to be drafted, selected, or secured in any other new and untried way other than of their own volition and willingness to sacrifice their lives in order to save the institutions of our country, for which our forefathers have always fought, and for the eternal perpetuity of which we always will be willing to fight and die, if need be. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have never had military training and service, and this may cause my words to be lightly regarded when weighed in the balance with the words of the General Staff, as they are all military experts. Therefore I am going to read in my time the words of a man who has served as a soldier in the Regular Army of the United States, and therefore entitled to the weight that such service and experience gives them. The article is an editorial from the Chattanooga News, of Chattanooga, Tenn., and whose editor spent several days recently in Washington and has had this question presented to him in its every phase. Mr. Milton says:

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM OR THE DRAFT.

"Senator McKELLAR is a new Member of the Upper House, but has immediately come to the front because of his long service in the Lower House on the Military Affairs Committee. He was assigned to a similar committee of the Senate and has been taking a leading part in the discussion of the legislation so fraught with importance to the country which is now before the Congress.

"He has introduced an amendment to the Chamberlain bill as reported, his amendment providing that an army of 500,000 volunteers shall be asked for by the President before conscription is resorted to.

"Senator McKELLAR is anxious to know the views of Tennesseans on the three propositions now before Congress. He writes:

"'There are three plans of organizing an additional army before the Congress.

"'The first plan is the General Staff plan, which provides for selective conscription between the years of 19 and 25, giving the War Department the right to select by conscription 500,000 young men at a time and train them as fast as they can be trained.

"'The second plan is for Congress to authorize the President to call out 500,000 volunteers at once, and such others as he may deem necessary under the present law.

"'The third plan is to give the President the right immediately to call out 500,000 volunteers and supplement this with the right of conscripting as many as he sees fit to secure an army. The idea being to give those who desire to volunteer an opportunity to do so, and make it absolutely certain that an army may be organized at once by giving the President the right to conscript.

"'I would appreciate hearing from the people of Tennessee as to which one of these three plans they think should be adopted.'

"It is a time for frank discussion of these plans, and such should be indulged in without any bitterness or rancor or the attributing of improper or unpatriotic motives to those of other views. All the Members of Congress have shown that they would support the Government in the carrying out of any plan agreed on. The voting of $7,000,000,000 in money to carry on the war was notice to Germany that the American Nation was united. The only question at issue is how best to raise an efficient army.

"Now, let us examine briefly what is said pro and con as between the volunteer and the draft principles.

"All of our previous wars have been fought largely by volunteers. Let us see as to our own State. In the time of the Revolution the only conscription resorted to in this region was the conscription to stay at home. Before the Battle of King's Mountain twice as many men gathered at Sycamore Shoals on the Watauga River as Sevier, Shelby, and Campbell could take across the mountains, and many were forced to remain. So it was in Jackson's campaigns in the Horseshoe and at New Orleans in the War of 1812, and in the Mexican War the Tennessee volunteers were so numerous that the sobriquet "Volunteer State" was finally fixed.

"In the Civil War not only did Tennessee furnish next to North Carolina more men to the Confederacy than any other southern State—a total of 110,000—but it sent 30,000 soldiers to the Union Army, too.

"In the Spanish-American War the State furnished more troops in proportion to its quota than any other State in the Union, again sustaining its reputation.

"So it will be seen that volunteering is not a slow method of raising troops—certainly not in Tennessee—and as much may be said all through the South. But in the past volunteers from this and other States have entered the service of their country in units. Young men of the same communities and known to each other have, as a rule, formed together their organizations, which were offered to the Government. Their officers have been chosen from their ranks, often by their own selection, and the military forces thus organized have been democratic, much as is the army of France to-day. Our men resent the caste system in vogue in the Regular Army. They submit to discipline obediently, but they are not willing to be treated as underlings and to suffer indignities, such as too often are inflicted on the private soldier, causing desertions, etc.

"That they make the best soldiers in the world is attested on the pages of history covering all the wars of the United States. Of such volunteers were Pickett's men at Gettysburg, Zollicoffer's at Mill Springs, Bates's at Chickamauga, and too many others to mention. On a thousand battle fields in Tennessee alone their courage was shown. When such armies met under Grant and Lee in the campaign in Virginia, the world looked on in amazement. We may never hope for better armies.

"It is true that both North and South in the later years of the war resorted to the draft for men; but it is a notorious fact, attested by all historians, that the drafted men were not as good soldiers as volunteers, nor were the proportions of conscripts in the armies of the North and South large as compared with the volunteers. The draft was not a success in either region. It met with resistance in the North, notably in the large cities, and in the mountains of the South it led to revolt and guerrilla warfare.

"In the camps of Southern Confederate Veterans of to-day the conscripts of the sixties are not admitted.

"The proposition for conscription is put forward under the term 'universal service.' But this is a misnomer. The words are deceptive. The service proposed is not universal. It is proposed that it shall apply only to men between certain ages—19 to 25. It does not apply even to all men of those ages. It has been announced that very few farmers would be taken. Thus at one sweep nearly three-fifths of the country's population is given exemption. They are to be permitted to show their patriotism by raising food supplies, most valuable and honorable work, it is true; but it is quite a different matter from going into the trenches. Then it is said that all munition workers and kindred industries, railroad men, miners, and others are to be exempt. Thus a very large element of working population is to be removed from any danger. Where the army is to come from so far has not been made clear.

"Neither the words 'selected' nor 'conscription' sound democratic. It should not be left to any recruiting officer to show his favoritism or yield to influence in granting exemptions. 'Conscription' depends on the principle of force. Democracy is founded on the principle of free will or consent. The draft is undemocratic, and in former days only resorted to in cases of dire need, when the national danger made it imperative. If resorted to now, some plan should be adopted by which the service is not at the option of some official, but the liability should be universal in the true sense. Otherwise we set up the tyranny of a small military class over the citizen.

"If most of the agricultural workers of the country and most of the industrial workers are exempted, we shall be bereft of the best material for an army. These classes of men make our best soldiers. The farmer is steady and inured to toil. The industrial worker is needed for the machines of modern war. It is true, as stated, that an army may be impressed from pool rooms and on the street corners of cities, but what kind of an army? The personnel of our American forces is as important as its size.

"Are we going to exempt farmers, miners, organized labor, merchants, and many other most desirable classes for recruits and recruit an army of loafers? If so, we may have to blush in shame for the showing made by the men marching under Old Glory on the battle field. No army training will change a man's character.

"And how about State pride?

"Every boy who has read American history knows how troops from different States of the Union marched together in our wars and the local pride is kindled again by knowledge of their deeds. Shall we lose sight entirely of the proud Commonwealths of the American Union? In song and story the deeds of State troops have been told. Virginia and Tennessee marched side by side in high tide at Gettysburg.

"As a method of allowing free expression of the patriotism in the American heart to-day we believe the volunteer system will be much more effective. If the States of the Union were permitted, under Senator McKELLAR's amendment, to offer 500,000 men in units of their own formation, officered by appointment of their governors, as in times past, we believe the volunteers would be forthcoming much more rapidly than the Federal Government could receive, equip, and train them.

"No matter what plan is adopted, the men are likely to be received much more rapidly than they can be made ready for the service. It will take at least six months for the organization of an expeditionary force. It should be done carefully and well.

"The United States has entered the war and ought to do its full part. We do not think we should content ourselves with mere naval and economic participation. We have made the cause of the allies our cause, and we should be willing to offer our blood on the battle field in justification of our convictions. How shall American patriotism best express itself, is the issue. Looking over the experience of the past, we must not too hastily abandon the method which has made that history possible.

"To resort to conscription right at the start in this war will be taken by Germany as an evidence of the unwillingness of the United States to furnish an army of free-will, but that force was at once resorted to, and it will be charged that our hearts are not in the war. No greater encouragement could be given for prolonged Teutonic resistance. On the other hand, if volunteers were called for and promptly furnished, the enemies of the Nation would have before their eyes additional evidence that Uncle Sam intended to do his full share in bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

"The President has very strong influence with Congress and a wonderful power over the Nation. He has been led to take his position by the advice of the military advisers about him. They are honest and sincere in their convictions, of course, and he is patriotic to the utmost degree. But, on the other hand, those at Washington are not always best qualified to advise in a matter of this kind. The American people are unaccustomed to drafts or conscription, however sugar-coated they may be. The words repel. They come of dire need and are out of the system of autocracies. An immediate draft would frighten the Nation as to what might be the future. Would the next step be martial law, suspensions of constitutional rights of various kind, rights of free speech, free press and petition? The President should realize that the eastern press is not a safe guide. It has always fought him. Now, its advice may be dangerous.

"Expressions through telegrams, letters, and mass meetings may not always be safe guides, either. The greater number of people rarely declare themselves in such a way.

"Many of these telegrams and letters are written by persons of the classes exempted by age or occupation. Some of these possibly would volunteer in case that plan is adopted, but at least they might so signify before urging legislation which will keep themselves at home and send others out into the places of danger at the front.

"In many other cases due consideration has not been given to the question.

"Congress has become so sensitive to these surface manifestations of sentiment, so frightened at possible disapproval, that it no longer frankly voices the convictions of its Members. When the administration takes a position in opposition to Congress it is able to set a great back fire among the constituents of Members, and they usually yield. Congress, therefore, frequently of late has been dubbed a 'rubber stamp.' This is not as was intended by the fathers of the Constitution. The Members of Congress ought to vote their honest convictions. When they fail to do so we may well consider some other form of our Government. The legislative is equally clothed with authority along with the executive. Either branch may be in error. It was because of the disposition of human beings to err that a system of checks and balances was devised by the founders of our Government. If it is broken down, then free institutions may perish.

"The volunteer plan is not aimed to prevent promotion of Regular Army officers. Since it is proposed in any event to increase both the Regular Army and the National Guard to the full strength, there will be need of many additional officers of high rank and promotions naturally will follow. But there are now not enough trained officers in the United States to command the first army. For the second army of 500,000 officers must be appointed from civilian life, and most of these will have to be trained. It will not affect matters at all whether they are raised by volunteering or by the draft. The only difference will be in the manner of appointing officers.

"As a last objection to conscription or universal military training we may mention with regret that the South particularly has a peculiar race situation. All is quiet now, but we live over a volcano. The relations of the races are most friendly. We wish them so to remain. Perhaps it would not be dangerous to the South to give military training to millions of colored citizens. We are not blind to the fact that they are patriotic and have made good soldiers in the past. But we must not overlook all possibilities. The day would come when they would return to their homes. In many regions of the South they are in the majority. They might be unwilling to live under conditions now quietly accepted. An apple of discord might thus be thrown in our midst, and scenes like those during reconstruction days follow. Also, if universal service is applied, how may the fourteenth amendment be ignored? Under that blacks would go into ranks alongside whites. Congress should very gravely discuss this phase of a question which seems to have escaped attention.

"For the above, as well as many other reasons, it is sincerely to be trusted that Congress will be very cautious as to this legislation."

It is claimed that the General Staff plan is democratic. If so, it is the democracy of servitude. Many slaveholders have been democratic in the treatment of their slaves. They have treated them all alike, have not discriminated between them; but were they any less slaves on that account?

In order to win this war in the quickest possible time I am opposed to experimenting with European compulsory military systems. We know what we have done and what we have accomplished in the past by the volunteer system of raising and maintaining armies, and our experience gives us confidence as to what we can do if we stand by our time-tried war-tested American volunteer system.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have so far taken no time in the discussion of the great questions coming before Congress at this session. However, I feel it now to be my duty to say a few words as to my position upon the questions now at issue. This Congress has voted, in both Houses, by an overwhelming majority, for a resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States. I was one of the minority who voted against that resolution; not because I did not think there was ample cause why we might declare war, but because I had been hoping against hope that this country might be spared the terrible scourge of war, and because I did not wish to be held responsible in any degree for bringing about that great catastrophe. My conscience upon that question and on that vote is clear. I hate war and hoped it might be avoided. I have no apologies to make for my vote upon that resolution and no regrets. I represented, as I believed then and as I believe now, the great majority sentiment of the people of the district I represent. But conditions have changed. We are at war, and every Member of this House who voted for that resolution and every Member who voted against it, for that matter, knew at the time that if that resolution was adopted it would be necessary for us, in common prudence, to provide a great Army; and I think he knew that under existing conditions and the feeling of the people, it would be impossible to provide such an Army as we ought immediately in common prudence to have under the old volunteer system or without some provision for compulsory service. I believe that every American citizen, especially in times of war, owes to his government whatever service may be required and which he may be able to render. I do not like the word "conscription," and that seems to be generally objectionable; but every citizen is liable to conscription for civil duty. No court in the land that has a jury calls for volunteers. It has a system of selective conscription, and men are compelled to serve. They may be excused, perhaps, for cause, but if there is no cause they are compelled to serve in civil life, and they should be compelled also in times of stress and in times of war to render any service the Government may need. I think this is the hardest question I have ever been required to vote upon.

Under existing conditions I am in favor of and shall vote for the selective-draft plan, as proposed by the President and the War Department. I do not believe it will be possible at the present time to raise such an army as we ought to have, in order to protect our coasts alone, and our insular possessions, by the old volunteer system. Oh, I know, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has said, what a great army we raised during the Civil War by the volunteer system. It was a great, a wonderful, a patriotic host of brave and loyal men.

I also know that North and South, after those armies had become trained and hardened and used to the service, no better or more efficient armies ever fought a battle or ever trod the earth. However, thousands of lives were needlessly lost before they reached that condition of efficiency and before the men were fit for service. However, those volunteers, especially in the later years of the war, did not always volunteer so disinterestedly as a great many seem to think. I am old enough to remember those days of the Civil War, and know something of how the armies were raised. They did not all volunteer from purely patriotic motives. In the little county where I lived at that time, and where I live now, the people of the entire county almost bankrupted themselves in raising money to pay bounties to induce men to enlist, and ofttimes, especially in the early days of the war, the men who volunteered to go were those who could least be spared. In one little country township 6 miles square, where I then lived on a farm—and there was not a village in the entire township—123 boys went into the war, and the old men and the women and the children were left to cultivate the soil and to raise the food that was necessary. I believe now that it is the duty of every American citizen to stand by the administration in this war, whether we were for a declaration of war or against it. A great many people do not yet seem to realize that we are actually at war and what it may mean. The Almighty alone knows what the end will be, how we may come out, and when and where. I have voted for the past two years for every measure for adequate preparedness that came before this body, because I thought it better to be prepared than to be sorry, and I only regret that we are not now more and better prepared. If we had been, I think Germany would have thought twice or thrice before she brazenly defied us. If we had had a great Army and a great Navy and were prepared for war, as we should have been, I do not believe we would have had any war. Many think that this war will not amount to much anyway; that it will only be the expenditure on our part of a few billions of dollars and a little more taxation for everyone, and that we shall not suffer any of the actual hardships of war. That reminds me that at the beginning of the late unpleasantness between the North and the South it was said that Gen. Bob Toombs, of Georgia, remarked that the South could whip the North with popguns. After the war was over he was reminded of that remark. Some one said to him, "General, I thought you said that we could whip the North with popguns," and the old general blurted out, "We could, we could, but the damned Yankees wouldn't fight with popguns." [Laughter.]

And it has been pretty well demonstrated that the Germans are not at present fighting with popguns or golf sticks. We do not know what we may have to meet, but we do know that we ought to be prepared, and I say now that I believe we ought in the shortest possible time to raise a great army, at least sufficient to protect our shores from invasion and our insular possessions. We can not, in my judgment, do that by the volunteer system, and therefore I am decidedly in favor of the system recommended by the President and the War Department, and I believe now that it is the duty of all American citizens to stand by the administration and render every service possible and give every aid possible in the prosecution of the war. We have but one country, the United States, and but one flag, the glorious Stars and Stripes; and to them every man owes allegiance and the best service that he can possibly render. When we go into a war, like the present war, the greatest, the most terrible, ever before known since the world was created, we should, like our heroic ancestors in the days of the war for independence, each and every one, be willing to "pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." [Applause.]

We have given to the President, in the resolution adopted by such an overwhelming vote, a pledge of all the resources of this country, and we have not only authorized him but we have directed him to use the entire Army and Navy of the United States and the resources of the Government in prosecuting the war against Germany. Now, having done that, I insist that we should back up the resolution and furnish him with all the means and with all the men necessary to prosecute that war to a speedy and successful termination. I believe it is a duty we owe to our Government, and I can not understand how any man who voted for that resolution for war can now justify himself in hampering the administration and in refusing to give every aid possible in the prosecution of that war, which will be won, if it is won, by American resources and American arms. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, from the remarks of some gentlemen on this floor it would seem that in the minds of some men there is more importance attaching to the election of Members to Congress than to the necessary preparation for taking part in the greatest war in the world's history. Personally that matter may be of some importance to individual Members, but how it pales into insignificance when compared with the great world-wide question which we are considering. How paltry are such considerations in the presence of such a task. What matter our political or personal fortunes? They ought to fade from our minds and disappear from our consideration. [Applause.]

War is no pink-tea performance. As a matter of fact, it is the most damnable business in which mankind can possibly engage. Gen. Sherman was mild and conservative in his choice of language when he described war in his most famous utterance, and we have entered into that hell. I hate war with all the fervor of my being and am grieved beyond the power of expression that this country is in war. Yet with all my hatred for war, on the only two occasions in my life when it was possible for me to have served under the flag of my country in a war or a near war I accepted the duty and volunteered. [Applause.] I did not do it because I am fond of war, nor because I sought the hardships of the camp or the march. In both instances there was present the compulsion of duty. I scarcely need to add that if my services shall be needed in this present war, although I have passed beyond the limit of the age suggested in this bill, or in any bill for compulsion, of course, it goes without saying that my services are again at the disposal of my country. [Applause.]

I am very much in favor of universal military training and am genuinely sorry that this bill does not carry in it provisions to that effect. If it carried such provisions, it would show to the world, and especially to our enemies, that hereafter we mean business; that whatever may have been our past mistakes, from this time forward we are going to prepare ourselves to protect ourselves and our rights in the best possible way. However, the President and Secretary of War have thought that this is not the proper time to ask for that legislation and so it is left out of this bill. We all realize that nothing can be done in this emergency along that line unless it has the approval of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

This is an emergency measure. It is so stated in the bill. It provides that it shall not remain in effect after the emergency is over. It is a great emergency, the greatest in our history, and we all wish to adopt the very best means possible to meet that emergency. The only question between us is which is the best plan? I agree that gentlemen who favor the volunteer system are just as patriotic as I; that they desire the welfare of the country just as much as I. We differ only as to methods. The volunteer system, they say, should have a trial, and yet in the bill which the majority has brought in the draft provision is coupled with the volunteer system in such a way that volunteering does not have a fair chance. On the part of the majority of the committee there was a commendable disposition to compromise, as is usually necessary in matters of legislation. With the best intentions in the world the proponents of this bill have compromised themselves out of court, practically, because there is no sound foundation upon which the bill as written can rest. If a purely volunteer bill had been brought in, manifesting full confidence in the American people that they would fight this war to a finish by volunteering, that would have been one thing. At any rate, that would have been meeting the issue fairly and, to my mind, far more wisely than to say we will have volunteering only while the President is getting his lists ready to have a draft. [Applause.] Is that a fair trial of the volunteer system with a draft feature already enacted and in the hands of the President hanging over them? That is not a trial of the volunteer system at all.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield for one interruption?

Mr. TILSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does not the present bill of which the minority approve hold that same threat of conscription over men that you propose to take in the Regular Army and National Guard? Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. TILSON. That is entirely a different matter, for this reason: Let no one try to deceive himself into the belief that we are trying a volunteer system in the Regular Army or National Guard at all. That is a different matter altogether because those organizations are already formed and in existence. The officers are all appointed and the noncommissioned officers. All that is necessary is to fill them up to the proper strength and this is going to be done in the same way it has been done before.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You criticize the majority of the committee because we brought in a bill that does not stand absolutely for volunteering. If you believe in conscription, why did not you stand for absolute conscription at once instead of for volunteering while you were getting ready your conscription?

Mr. TILSON. I think there is a good enough reason for that. There are going to be some boys below the age of 21, provided in this bill, who will wish to volunteer, and it may be perfectly proper that they should volunteer. They will make good soldiers. This will give them a chance to come into the Regular Army or National Guard. Then, as I said to the gentleman before, these are organizations of which the units are already in existence. They only need to be filled up, and having been filled, as they have been, by the volunteer system up to this point, it is thought by our military advisers better that those particular organizations should be filled up by volunteering. At any rate, we are spared one great fault of the volunteer system, the acceptance of untrained officers in new organizations.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman how many eligibles will be in the class of 21 to 40 if conscription is in force?

Mr. TILSON. There will be a great many millions. I have not the exact figures in mind, but something like 15,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman approve of the conscript class extending between the ages of 21 and 40 when there will be so many more eligible for conscript than what is conceived as being necessary at the present time for service?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; because I think that is the fairest and most efficient way to make the selection.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there were 20,000,000 eligible between the ages of 21 and 40 he would still believe they should be drafted, even though 20,000,000 would be in the lottery class?

Mr. TILSON. We do not know but we may need every man of the 20,000,000 before it is over. What is going to be the situation if we start with a volunteer system, asking for 500,000, and, as soon as this 500,000 have been enrolled, then the President decides under the provisions of the majority bill to enforce the conscript provision? By doing this we are placed in the position of having 500,000 volunteers and 19,500,000 slackers, if they shall be needed and shall later be conscripted under the bill as it now stands. I do not believe in making that distinction. I believe in starting right at the beginning and selecting the men that the Government thinks should serve, leaving the others subject to call, of course, up to the limit of the 20,000,000 that the gentleman refers to. That would be my plan.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has stated that under the plan of the General Staff it is proposed to fill up the Regular Establishment and also the National Guard by voluntary enlistment. Can the gentleman give the committee the number that it is proposed to increase, in both the Regular Army and the National Guard in that way?

Mr. TILSON. It will be substantially a million in the two. The Regular Army will be close up to 300,000, and the National Guard will be something over 600,000.

Mr. GOOD. Not a million in addition to those that are already in the National Guard?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no; all told.

Mr. GOOD. My question was, How many additional volunteers for each branch of the service will be called?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, there are now, roughly speaking, 135,000 Regulars, all told, and a little more than that of the National Guard. So there will be about 600,000 more to raise.

Now I desire to pass for a moment to the experience of the Civil War. That has been discussed back and forth so fully that I enter upon it with some little hesitation. In my judgment we do not study history aright if we conclude, because those men who volunteered for service made good soldiers on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line, that therefore the volunteer system was right or effective. We should draw a distinction between the volunteer and the volunteer system. It is not the volunteer that I condemn, because he was always a good soldier—of course he was and always will be—but it was the inefficient system which did not wisely utilize the man power we had. That is why I object to the system.

What happened in the Civil War? Mr. Lincoln called for troops. Men from all over the country rushed into the first quota upon a short enlistment. How were those regiments formed, and how were the volunteer regiments formed all through the war? They were formed by prominent men of the community. Politicians, somebody has said—although I have nothing against the politicians—rushed in to raise regiments. The big politician was made colonel, the lesser lights majors, the still smaller captains, and so down to the small fry in the lower offices and noncommissioned offices. That is the way the regiments were raised all over the country. That was the system. I do not condemn anybody for raising a regiment that way. If that is the way it must be done such men are to be highly commended. If the majority bill should go through I may possibly ask to raise a regiment myself, much as I oppose the system which will permit that to be done. That was the way it was done in the Civil War. It is the only way it can be done under a volunteer system. What happened? Men without knowledge of the soldier's duties, men who had no training whatever, went out as officers in those regiments. Most of them did not know the first principles of being officers. They did not know how to take care of themselves, much less their men, and although they were good and capable men and finally did learn the business of soldiering, it was at great sacrifice of blood and treasure that they learned the lesson. While they were learning it the personnel of their regiments dwindled by camp diseases and by casualties in battle until by the time the regiments were throughly trained they were mere skeletons of regiments—often only 200 or 300 men. Read your war records and you will see that I am not painting a black picture at all, but stating actual facts. Would new volunteers come in to fill up those skeleton regiments? Not at all.

The only way that they would come in was by other politicians or somebody else going out and raising new regiments, with new officers. Could anything be more unwise or more nearly suicidal than what actually happened? The old regiments, with their trained officers and veteran soldiers, had to be disbanded. Many of the officers who by long service and at fearful cost had learned the business of war were retired to private life or given less important duties while new and untrained officers were in command of organizations. These in their turn, and at the same fearful cost, would proceed to learn the duties of command. So it went on from the beginning of the war until 1863, when it became impossible to raise the volunteers even in that way, and the draft followed. In the southern Confederacy it was used a whole year earlier, but not until the mischief had been done.

Ah, gentlemen of the House, that is the history of the Civil War when stripped of rhetoric and Memorial Day persiflage. The same thing happened in the Spanish-American War, although the consequences were not so fearful on account of the smallness of that war. I was a volunteer in the Spanish-American War. That is the way my regiment was formed. They were as fine a lot of men as ever served their country who became officers in that regiment. There were a few of them who had had a little military experience. I myself got into the regiment as a second lieutenant because I had had one year's experience as a private in the ranks of a National Guard regiment. The colonel was so eager to have an additional officer who had had some prior experience that he saw to it that one second lieutenant was not accepted in order to give me a chance to get in. He wanted at least one officer in that battalion who had had a little military experience.

Mr. LITTLE. Is that the military experience you had, with the militia?

Mr. TILSON. That was the extent of my military experience prior to the Spanish-American War.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you call that "military experience"?

Mr. TILSON. I do not care what you call it. That is what I had. [Laughter.] That was more than the others had, so that it made me the best available drillmaster, because I had been a private for one year. That is the way that regiment was formed, and that is the way the others were formed. That is just the way regiments will be formed if the majority bill becomes a law. It is provided in it that they shall be raised by organizations. You can not raise volunteers in any other way, so that if you vote for this bill as it is drawn, this mongrel, hybrid bill, which is neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring, that is just what you will have. [Applause.] It is the only way you can get your men, and then you will start in with a fearful experience, like the Civil War and just as we had it in the Spanish-American War.

Do you want to do that? I do not. Whether my seat in this body is at stake or not, that makes no difference to me. I do not believe that is the best way to fight this war, and whatever the sacrifice may be, I shall not support any such measure as that. Instead of "conscript" being a term of reproach as we have heard so often, I do not believe that there will be any such opprobrium attached to the men who are selected under the selective-draft system. I believe that instead of calling it a "conscript army," we should give it a new name. We should take the word that is most prominent in this bill, "selective" draft, and call these men who are selected and called out from among their fellows a "selected army," for that is just what it would be—a selected army. These men are selected, and the others are kept in reserve to be called if needed when their turn comes.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] this morning painted a very gruesome picture of the conscripting officer coming into a community where there was one man 27 years of age and three boys of one family between the ages of 19 and 25—which is not in our bill, by the way—and one son, the only son of a dependent mother. The names of the four eligibles are put into the wheel and the lone son, of course, comes out first and he is chosen. Then the gentleman pictures the pain of that mother as she is giving up this lone son while the man of 27 goes free and while the three sons all remain at home.

I suppose if the volunteer system were in vogue the chances would be ninety-nine out of one hundred that the lone son would be one of the first men to volunteer, and then it would be put up to that poor mother to decide whether she would permit him to go or refuse, and thus stand in her country's way. By the system of selective draft we provide for just such cases as that. Where there are dependents there are to be exemptions, and so under our plan this lone son with a dependent mother would be exempted by law. Then he could look his companions in the face and say that he had not been chosen at all, but had been exempted by the law itself. After all, what difference does it make to the mother whether her son is selected for duty or whether he volunteers and goes? What is the difference? He is gone from her in either case. A selective draft properly administered would require him to stay at home. Here is the practical situation, and here is just what the gentlemen who are favoring this volunteer plan are standing up for: Let us assume, first, that all men of military age are willing to serve their country, just as they should be. If we select a part of them to go out and serve, what harm have we done to anybody? [Applause.] They are all willing to go. We have selected only a part of them to go out for the time being because that is all we can use. The rest may have to follow later.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. In a moment. But supposing a part of them are willing to go and a part of them are not willing to go, as might be the fact. Then to whom do we do the harm? Certainly not to those who are willing to go, because if they are chosen by selection they go just as they would go if they were volunteers. Then who are left to object? Only those men who are eligible, who are of proper military age, who have no one dependent upon them, and yet who are unwilling to go. Are those the men we wish to agitate about? [Applause.] When we reduce it to cold facts, gentlemen, those are the only men you are exercising yourselves about. [Applause.] The word "volunteer" sounds grand. It really sounds fine to say that in 48 hours enough men will spring to arms—if we happen to have the arms to spring to—to defend the country. It sounds so grand that we like to repeat it, but it is more rhetorical than practical. What we are dealing with in this bill is a cold, practical proposition of the best way to go about an immense task. It has been proven by our own history and the history of other countries that the volunteer system when thoroughly tried out has never produced the best results. The Civil War, instead of proving that the system under which it was fought is a wise one, only shows what brave and patriotic men can do in spite of a bad system. If the selective plan had been used from the very beginning, in my judgment the war would have been finished with half the sacrifice of blood and treasure, and possibly in half the time.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield for a single question.

Mr. LITTLE. Is not the fact exactly the contrary, that every war this country has ever won was won by volunteers, and that no army of conscripts ever won a victory for this country or any other?

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman calls the soldiers of France and Germany conscripts, and I suppose he does, they have been winning some victories on both sides.

Mr. LITTLE. Have their conscripts won the war for either of them in less time than the Civil War was won by volunteers?

Mr. TILSON. Not yet; but probably, there being conscripts on both sides, the conscripts on one side or the other are going to win.

Mr. LITTLE. That may depend on the Americans. You say both armies in Europe are conscripts. Have they got any better results than the volunteers got for this country in 1861–1865?

Mr. TILSON. It makes my heart bleed when I think of the unnecessary losses in 1861–1865. When I think how those brave young men were sacrificed and slaughtered, while their equally brave but untrained officers were learning how to lead them, I pray that we may never repeat the error. Then think of this country, drenched in blood for four years, when much of it might have been saved. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. And the conscript systems of Europe have sacrificed ten times as many men in half the time.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, I differ with the gentleman. I am very sorry that the conscripts or anybody else are fighting in Europe. I began my remarks with stating how sorry I was that there was any war, and especially that we were in it. But we are in it, and we are facing a practical question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman claims that the volunteers of the Civil War were sacrificed. Were they not sacrificed by officers of the Regular Army, and is it not a fact that the successful issue of the Civil War came as a result of the skill of volunteer officers, such as Grant?

Mr. TILSON. Many volunteers became fine officers, but the gentleman is unfortunate in his reference to Gen. Grant, who was a Regular Army officer.

Mr. STAFFORD. And was it not Regular Army officers like McClellan who sacrificed the volunteers?

Mr. TILSON. Unfortunately great battles can not be fought without sacrificing men. That is one of the things I dislike about war.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Grant was a graduate of West Point.

Mr. STAFFORD. Gen. Logan was not a West Pointer. He was a volunteer, and Oglesby was another volunteer.

Mr. FESS. And Gen. Grant left the Regular Army service.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must not interrupt except by the consent of the Member who has the floor.

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] for just one question.

Mr. FESS. Gen. Grant was a volunteer, having left the Regular Army six years before the war broke out, and he got his commission from Gov. Yates, of Illinois.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, Gen. Grant was a West Pointer.

Mr. FESS. Certainly he was.

Mr. TILSON. He had been in the Army for a number of years.

Mr. FESS. But he had left it, and he was a volunteer.

Mr. TILSON. I have not said anything against the volunteers. I have been singing their praises and the brave deeds they accomplished under a wasteful, ineffective system.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was not this volunteer, Gen. Grant, not only educated at West Point, but was he not a veteran of the Mexican War?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. There can be no question about our volunteers fighting bravely and making the greatest of soldiers. A number of them rendered distinguished service as officers of high rank, but, unfortunately, not a very large proportion of them became great generals in the Civil War. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER].

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to state very briefly my position as to the two systems for raising an army now under discussion. I am going to vote for the selective draft system which carries with it the recommendation of the President of the United States. [Applause.] It is the most democratic, applying to the rich and the poor. It is the most efficient, because with it is carried the well-defined policy of the President to keep going those activities in our country which are essential to its very life.

In my district there is now being waged a magnificent campaign for food preparedness. My people are thoroughly aroused. The business man, the banker, and the farmer realize the field for patriotic service in increasing the food supply. Vacant lots have been turned into gardens; over 10,000 children in the city of Memphis are daily working gardens; manufacturers have cleared away acres of rubbish and planted potatoes; on the farms, where heretofore every acre has been given to cotton, many hundreds of acres have now been planted in foodstuffs. Everywhere there is aroused a patriotic demand to increase the food supply, and the finger of scorn is pointed to those who do not join in the fight. We all admit that to win in this war we must also win in the fight to raise more meat, more food, as well as men and ammunition.

Under the volunteer system havoc would trail in the path of the Nation's farm and food campaign. The men working away in the fields, hearing the call of their country, with hearts swelling with patriotism, would enlist and stop the very necessary work that they are doing.

Under the selective plan the Government would say:

> You are doing an equally patriotic service. Some of you must keep at work, increasing the food supply, for hungry men can not fight.

I believe the people of the United States have implicit confidence in the President, and they are looking to his able and clear-headed leadership to guide this country through the dark, trying days ahead. I know full well my people are solidly supporting him and his policies. They are now impatient when any obstruction is placed in the path of his policies being put into force. They trust him absolutely and they expect of me that which I am eager to give him, my whole-hearted and unqualified support. [Applause.]

It seems the natural and reasonable course to pursue, with an able commander in chief of the Army, who has carefully considered the two systems, has reached a conclusion, and has made a specific recommendation, that we should follow him. There can be no doubt that he wants the selective conscription system, because in his matchless address at the opening of Congress, when speaking of how serious a step a declaration of war would be, he said:

> It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training.

And again only a few days ago in a published letter he made this statement:

> The process of the draft is, I think, very clearly set forth in the bill drafted by the War Department and which I so earnestly hope that Congress will adopt; but it is worth while to state the idea which underlies the bill a little more fully.

Can it be said that we are standing back of him and supporting him when he specifically says he "earnestly hopes" Congress will adopt the selective draft system, and it is not given him? It will be a very difficult proposition to explain back home that you stood by and backed him up when you spent hours fighting the measures he recommended and "earnestly hoped" you would vote for.

About 17 years ago, as a student under the then professor of Princeton University and now our President, I found out that he had a very great capacity for reaching correct conclusions. I have watched his career very closely since then, and I have now the same belief in his capacity, and in that belief I am joined by my constituents. [Applause.] I firmly believe that the President is the greatest man living to-day. He has given very careful thought and study to these two systems. His conclusions are backed up by the Secretary of War and all the military experts of our Army. He believes "the supreme test of the Nation has come." He asks us "to speak, act, and serve together." There may be some of you who will desert him in these trying hours, but the path of duty for me is clear. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, our country is now engaged in war with a foreign foe. I was one of that small minority of this House who voted against entering this conflict. But since the result of that vote was announced I have never allowed myself to entertain even a doubt as to the righteousness of our position.

We as a Nation have passed from the sphere of propriety into that of necessity.

The former permits of divergent views on each and every question; it permits of endless discussion and debate; it even tolerates friendly jest and criticism of the proponents of any proposition.

But in times like the present I believe we should, at least in great measure, subserve our ideas to the recommendations and suggestions of those who are intrusted with the responsibility of prosecuting this war.

They have before them, or at their disposal, information and data which the average Member of Congress does not possess, and much of which he could not, even if he so desired, acquire.

The President, as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States, has notified Congress that in order to be successful in this war we must place all our resources at the country's service.

Congress was prompt in providing the necessary funds; it has given tacit consent to the mobilization of our industrial and commercial forces; it has interposed no objection to the mobilization of our battleships; and why should we not display the same degree of patriotism and place no obstacle in the way of the immediate mobilization of men.

We all agree that we must have men if we are to prosecute this war. They are necessary to man our battleships; they are essential on the firing line. Therefore, why not subserve our ideas regarding the methods required for such mobilization to those of the President and our military and naval experts.

They tell us that prompt action is necessary. They declare the volunteer system to be haphazard and unsafe. They have no criticism of the volunteer; in fact his unselfish devotion to his country and his willingness to die in defense of the flag would prevent criticism. But they tell us, and we all know, that quantity as well as quality is needed.

I am not one of those who assume that the majority of our young men, simply because they are slow in enlisting, are disloyal. I am not fastening upon them the stigma of "slacker."

Many entertain scruples, religious or otherwise, against war; others give way to parental objections; others hesitate at the thought of the possible grief that may come to their parents, brothers, and sisters by their enlistment.

These boys are doing their duty as they see it. We should not brand them as cowards. But if we refuse to order them to the colors and fail to say to them that they must set aside their scruples and respond to the Nation's call, we are officially classifying them as "slackers" and disloyal.

The responsibility of defending the flag of our country must not rest upon a few. It is a responsibility all must bear. And Congress should not say that all are not ready to do their duty.

I am not an advocate of an immense army of professional fighters—of men trained in the arts of slaughter—but I am a believer in the practicality of universal military training. I believe it will be a means for increasing the efficiency and the health and character of our young manhood, and I also believe it will serve as a guaranty for the safety of democracy.

As our President has ably pointed out, this is a time when every man, woman, and child should cheerfully bear his or her part of the burden. This is a nation's war; it is not the war of any one section or any one party. Therefore there is a universal liability. And it is unfair to those brave young men who rush to the recruiting station at the Nation's first call to say that they must bear the burden alone.

I have heard many of my colleagues voice their opposition to conscription. They contend it savors too much of autocracy. I have heard others denounce the selective-draft system as one open to abuse and which will pave the way for discrimination.

But, after giving these matters careful consideration, I have accepted the President's recommendation, because I feel it will not only be the means of conserving our commercial and industrial strength but will at the same time provide the necessary men for our naval and military forces.

We must not wreck our industrial, our commercial, or our agricultural forces, for these are as essential as the military and naval units. And in my estimation the only safeguard against such a calamity is the select draft.

Each individual should be called upon to render the service he can, some in one capacity and some in another. There is a duty for each citizen, either in the fighting ranks or with that vast army which will be needed at home to make our military and naval operations successful.

Then, too, there is another phase to be considered at this time: We must wipe out the bitter feeling that is prevalent in some sections between capital and labor, between the rich and the poor, between the native-born and the naturalized citizen.

We must instill into the hearts of those immigrants who have taken up residence in this country a lesson in loyalty to American institutions which was instilled into the hearts of our fathers by war and privation. They should be taught that they have responsibilities as well as privileges. And, in my opinion, this can only be done by compelling each and every citizen to do his or her duty, irrespective of place of birth, of position and wealth. For we are all Americans, and as such must stand united against the foe. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. DENT. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, for more than half a century our country has been at peace with itself and all the world, save a misunderstanding with the Spanish Government, which was of short duration.

Our people had come to be lovers of peace; friendship, fellowship, brotherhood, and good will dwelt among them and had become a controlling factor in their national life.

The bitterness, sectional hatred, and partisan strife growing out of the late War between the States had become a matter of history; the surviving veterans of that titanic struggle had long since met in joint reunion, shaken hands across the bloody chasm, and as brother men now sit in the evening of life calmly and peacefully beholding the setting sun casting his golden rays over a reunited people, with one hope, one country, and one flag. And, sirs, while our people thus reunited in domestic peace and tranquillity, rejoicing in the hope and belief that our country would know war no more forever, there suddenly came, as it were, a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, and the war gods of the Orient were crying aloud and all America stood breathless, for the world seemed on fire. Millions of people were rushing to war in the Old World. Our people began immediately to ask themselves the question, Will our country be drawn into this awful catastrophe? Will this terrible war fire spread to our shores and consume our people?

Our Christian people offered up their prayers daily to the God of our fathers that our country might be saved from the vortex of this awful, cruel war. But the face of Jehovah seemed turned from them. How strange are Thy ways, O Lord! Yea; they are beyond our understanding.

President Wilson set himself about to save our country from this world-wide conflagration—to protect the rights of America and her people, at home and abroad, upon land and sea—and to maintain neutrality and peace before the world with honor. The President of the United States did all in his power to avert war with the Imperial German Government. He was exceedingly patient and long-suffering.

Finally when it became perfectly apparent that the German Government had determined upon a course which absolutely ignored all rights guaranteed to our people as a neutral country upon the high seas, and had offered to conspire with friendly nations to destroy our Government and dismember our Union, the President came before Congress and delivered a message in which, concerning the conduct of the German Government toward the United States, he said:

Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any Government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapon which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants—men, women, and children—engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people can not be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

Mr. Chairman, immediately upon receiving this message, a resolution was introduced in the Congress declaring that a state of war now exists between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany.

I supported this resolution without hesitation or mental reservation. While I regretted to the very bottom of my soul that our country was forced into this war, it is now no longer a question of peace or war.

Our country had already been drawn into the war against its wish by reason of the outrages committed against its people by the German Government, as set forth in the President's message.

We must now either submit to these outrages or fight.

Our national honor demanded that we fight and fight we will. [Applause.]

And I want to say here and now, Mr. Chairman, that from the day I took the oath of office as a Member of the Sixty-third Congress until this hour, I have stood steadfastly by President Wilson without hesitation or halting; I have walked by his side all the way, holding up his hands at every turn of the road; I am standing by him just as steadfastly now.

I have voted on the floor of this House and in the committee to give the President all the money and men to carry on this war that has been asked for, but because I do not agree with every provision of an Army bill prepared in the Department of War should not and will not by my friends be construed as an act of infidelity, either to the President or my country.

The discussion on the floor of the House and in the press of the country attempts to place those who are advocating the committee report of this bill in the attitude of being against the President. To me that is a personal affront. If there is a man on the floor of this House, if there was a man in the House of the Sixty-third Congress, who stood more steadfastly day by day and week by week by President Wilson than myself I would like to hear his name called. I was one of the Members in 1914 who stayed on the floor of this House through that long summer, when my own political fortunes were in the balance at home, and I never deserted the President for one moment then, although it cost me my seat in this House. [Applause.]

I am receiving, as I guess many of you gentlemen are, telegrams from my home people. I received one something like this, as shown by a newspaper publication in my State:

Maj. George W. Littlefield, of this city, member of the American Defense Society of New York, has received a telegram from that organization in which it is alleged that D. E. GARRETT, of Houston, one of the two Congressmen at Large from Texas, is not giving wholehearted support to the President in his war program, and requesting that mass meetings be held in Texas to show Congressman GARRETT that Americans who sent him to Congress demand that he support universal military training and the President.

The society asked Maj. Littlefield to please wire of his willingness to fight for a united Nation now.

Maj. Littlefield wired assurance to the American Defense Society that he and representative citizens of Texas are standing behind the President in his war policy, and that Congressman GARRETT had been so advised.

The following telegram was sent to Congressman GARRETT:

You are reported as opposing the President's policy for raising an army. If true, you do not represent the great majority sentiment of the State, who are heartily with the President. We urge you to give his policy your open and actual support.

Now, mark that telegram. In the first place, it raises the question of universal military training, which is not before the House of Representatives, and has not been during this Congress. [Applause.]

The American Defense Society is trying to foist on the people the idea that I want to oppose the President, which is wholly untrue, and that I am opposed to a policy, military training, not now being considered by the House.

Here is a society in New York attempting to make people in my State believe that I am not standing by the President of the United States, and not true to my country, simply because I do not take without equivocation a bill from the War Department and agree to support it without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." I am more than anxious to receive instructions from my home people, and would welcome the personal opinion of Maj. Littlefield, but I must protest against the New York society bringing in question my loyalty to the President, my people, or my country.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, because of criticism appearing in some of the papers in my State, of my action in the Committee on Military Affairs in voting with the majority of the committee in reporting out this bill. It is well known to the committee that this bill does not fully reflect my views, but it was the best we could get under prevailing conditions in the committee.

Mr. Chairman, coming now to the provisions of the bill. There can be no difference of opinion among Americans that we should have, at the earliest practical moment, an efficient and effective Army to help crush that Government that would, if it could, destroy our own. But I am fully persuaded that there is ground for honest difference of opinion as to the method and manner of raising the men and money. This is a legislative duty devolving upon Congress and for which the Congress will be held responsible by the country, and, as one Member of Congress, I have tried to do my duty as I have been given wisdom. And I shall stand ready to be judged by my people for my action at this time. They may doubt my judgment, but I do not believe they will question my sincerity of purpose.

The bill as reported by a majority of the committee differs from the bill drawn by the War Department in two or three particulars only; all other parts of the bill are substantially the same.

The committee bill and that of the War Department authorizes the increase of the Regular Army and the raising of the National Guard to war strength, first by voluntary enlistment, and afterwards, if necessary, by draft.

There is no difference in the War Department bill and the committee bill in this respect. Both recognize and retain the volunteer system. When the Regular Army and National Guard have been recruited to full war strength, either by the voluntary system or draft, in the discretion of the President, then the War Department bill provides that the additional force of 500,000 men, and if, in the discretion of the President, a second call for 500,000 men be needed, that such force shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively of all male citizens between the ages of 19 and 25.

The difference, in the main, between the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs and the War Department is upon this feature of the bill. We have not been able, after most careful and conscientious study of the question, to reach an agreement whereby we are willing to say that a great war like the one in which our country is now engaged, contending, as we are, against the greatest military nation on earth, shall be fought by the boys and young men of America between the ages of 19 and 25, while all other citizens capable of bearing arms shall be relieved of military service in such a crisis. I believe this to be a man's war, in which the men of the country between proper military ages should respond to the call to arms, based upon liability to military service, according to their ability to render. I am unwilling for the boys so young in years to be conscripted into the Army of the country while the loafers around pool halls and billiard rooms and the street-corner gazers shall be exempted because they happen to be over 25 years old, as most of that crowd are.

Can it be said that a boy should be conscripted into the Army to fight for his country before his country has given him a voice in the management of its affairs, or before he is old enough to vote or to execute a will?

I desire, gentlemen, to call your attention to the following table, compiled by Mr. MORIN, of the Committee on Military Affairs, which is taken from the constitutions of the countries, showing the ages at which universal compulsory and voluntary services begin:

Norway, universal compulsory service begins at	23
Brazil, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Greece, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Chile, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Austria, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Hungary, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Roumania, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Serbia, universal compulsory service begins at	21
Sweden, universal and volunteer service begins at	21
Denmark, universal service begins at	21
Germany, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Turkey, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Bulgaria, universal compulsory service begins at	20
France, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Russia, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Italy, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Japan, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Portugal, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Switzerland, universal compulsory service begins at	20
Argentina, universal compulsory service begins at	20
England, volunteer.
Belgium, volunteer and compulsory; 49 per cent conscription, no definite age.

It will be observed that not one of these foreign countries force their boys into military service at the age of 19, the age proposed by the War Department for conscripting American boys.

The committee bill simply authorizes the President to issue a call for a volunteer army of 500,000 in the first instance, and an additional force of 500,000 if he deems it necessary; but does not attempt, in any manner to direct the President what action he shall take in the premises, whether he will or will not issue the call for volunteers is left entirely in his hands.

All the machinery for putting into effect, the draft system, as provided in the War Department's bill, is retained in the committee bill. Secretary of War Baker stated to our committee that it would take from three to four months to make registrations and to put the draft system into operation.

So that if the President should issue a call for volunteers immediately upon the passage of the act it would give all citizens of military age about four months in which to volunteer their services, should they desire to do so. And I do not see how there can be any reasonable objection to this. However, should the machinery for the draft system be put in operation sooner than anticipated by the Secretary of War, and in the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised under the call for volunteers, the President is fully authorized to raise said force or forces by draft, the same as provided in the War Department bill. Except under the committee bill the draft, based upon liability to military service, applies to all male citizens, or male persons who have declared their intentions to become citizens, except alien enemies, between the ages of 21 and 40 years, both inclusive; and not between the ages of 19 and 25 years, as provided in the War Department bill; so that the main differences between the committee bill and War Department bill is:

First. During the time between the passage of the act and the completion of registration as provided under the draft system all persons of military age should be given an opportunity to volunteer, if they desire to do so, which, I believe, would greatly facilitate the raising of an adequate Army at once.

Second. The ages for military service under the draft system is changed from 19 and 25 to 21 and 40 years, inclusive.

The only other change of any consequence is: The committee bill provides that all forces other than the Regular Army shall be composed of men who come from and officers who are appointed from the same State and locality, as far as practicable; to the end that the soldier boys may be of whatever comfort they may to each other in dispelling that homesickness incident to Army life. The bill prepared by the War Department contained no such provision, which, for the social comfort and happiness of our soldiers, is very important and desirable.

The bill provides that all officers, whether in the National Guard or Regular Army, shall be appointed by the President, which makes the bill absolutely void of all political entanglements. The bill appropriates $3,000,000,000 for the use of the Army, as recommended by the War Department.

That the voluntary system has been successful in our country in times past is a matter of history.

The committee bill in no way attempts to dictate to the President whether or not he will issue a call for volunteers or say whether or not this Army shall be raised by volunteer enlistment or whether he will put in force immediately upon the completion of the registration, the draft system. Can there be any possible complaint about that? You may read this bill from one end to the other, and you will find nowhere in it where there is one single obstacle thrown in the way of the President or the War Department to prevent them from raising an efficient Army and raising it now. But are we ready to depart from the volunteer system altogether? I was somewhat amused yesterday afternoon to observe in one of the newspapers that a British officer, now in this country on an important mission, had given out an interview wherein he criticized the volunteer system of England in this war and in which he refers to the fact that the volunteer system has given his country a great deal of trouble. That distinguished officer, however, did not say that in this great conflict England had called to her colors by voluntary enlistment more than 5,000,000 men and that there are less than 1,000,000 who have been raised by conscription.

Who is it to-day on the northern front of France that is battering down the breastworks and driving back inch by inch and foot by foot the indomitable army of the Kaiser? Who is it that is taking the big guns away from his men? Who is it that is capturing prisoners and driving the German Army back to their own soil? It is the brave, fearless volunteer soldiers of England and France. [Applause.] I wondered when that distinguished gentleman was speaking concerning the failure of the volunteer system in England if he could not recall that in this country at the time when Washington and Lafayette lived and moved among men, that this country had considerable to do with the volunteer system in this country. It was quite successful then and entirely satisfactory to the American people. Are we to abolish it not? Throw it aside like a worn-out garment and forget that it was through the volunteer army that our Republic was established, its Constitution written, and its life preserved until this very hour? If we are to abandon the volunteer system altogether at the beginning of this war, and men are not to be permitted to respond to the call of their country as volunteers, then I ask your most serious consideration of the question of whether or not the boys of America between the ages of 19 and 25 shall be made to fight this war against the most powerful military nation on this earth, while all men above the age of 25 shall be exempt? To my mind such a proposition is so unjust, unfair, undemocratic, and unpatriotic that it should receive the just condemnation of every Member of this House. As far as I am concerned, I want this war to be fought by the men of the country and not the schoolboys. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would like to know for my personal information where the limit of 19 to 25 appears in the bill that is under consideration?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The limit of 19 to 25, I will answer the gentleman, appears in the bill sent down to our committee by the War Department, which has been recommended for passage in the Senate, and will be over here in a few days, and I want this House to be ready for it when it gets here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is not, then, in the bill that is before the House?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It is not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, that provides 21 to 40.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Yes; and I say, to the credit of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I do not know a single one of them who is in favor of putting the limits 19 to 25 in this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. Does he know whether or not the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs are proposing to offer what is known as the Chamberlain bill as a substitute for the majority committee bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I do not.

Mr. COX. I wish some one would discuss that question.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I could not give the gentleman that information.

My friends, this is a question that we must settle for ourselves; and do not forget this fact, that we are going some day to be called to judgment for the way we cast our votes here upon this question. I am willing that the boys of the country, even down to the age of 18, as provided in our national-defense act, if they so desire, may volunteer; but I can not believe that this Congress, representing a Government of over 100,000,000 people, with more than 20,000,000 men of military age, will write upon the statutes of the country a law saying to the boys of the country of the ages of 19 and 20, "You have not reached such years of discretion and have not that judgment of mind that would entitle you to cast a ballot for the election of Members of Congress, but you possess ample ability to shoulder a rifle and go out to be shot down for your Government." [Applause.] No, gentlemen, I can not believe this Congress will ever do that. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is willing to have the boys shot down under the volunteer system?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I answer the gentleman unhesitatingly, no. Wars are sometimes thrust upon people without their making, just as this one has come upon us. We can not always choose whether we shall live or die when our country is invaded, for then it becomes the duty of every man capable of bearing arms to come to his country's defense.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman think when this boy volunteers to fight for his country that he has the right to expect that every other boy of equal capacity and of equal age shall stand in line by him and protect his rights?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Unquestionably, but for the life of me I can not see how a man can reach the conclusion that a law, under the guise of universal service, that limits the age of those who shall do the fighting from 19 to 25 years is producing universal service.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is there any proposal to do that by anybody in the House that the gentleman knows?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I am trying to prepare the House against that hour that doth soon appear. [Laughter.] I know it is coming, and I know that when it gets here the same reason will be given to push it through this House and adopt it that is now being given to abandon the time-honored principle of volunteering. [Applause.] I am only trying to warn you that when that hour does come that the House of Representatives may stand by and say, "You may abandon the volunteer system if you will, but you can not put over us a universal service of only 19 to 25 years." Not only that, my friends, but may I ask this, Why should not this volunteer system remain upon the statute books, to be used in the discretion of the President if it in no manner impedes or hinders the progress of raising an army at this time? I will say further to the gentlemen: If the President or the Secretary of War should come to the Congress and say that we need an army, we need it now, we can not raise it under this system in this emergency, and asked me if I was willing to set aside the volunteer system under those conditions, I would unhesitatingly say "Yes." But they have never done that. It will take four months, the Secretary of War said, before he can get his machinery in operation and be ready to enter upon the draft system. Is there any reason why, pending the time the War Department is making ready for the installation of the draft system, that the President could not issue a call for a million volunteers. My candid opinion is that if the President should issue such a call, they would never need a list of conscripts, because the men would be standing at the doors waiting. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Is there any provision of law to-day by which any man can enlist in the Regular Army or the National Guard for a period of less than seven years—three in the active and four in the reserve?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I think not. I think the gentleman is correct, and that is the law, and that is one reason——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In one moment. That is another reason why those people who want to be on the honor roll to fight our country's battles, but who do not wish to be in the Regular Army and who do not wish to be in the National Guard, but are willing to volunteer in this war, ought to, in my opinion, be given an opportunity to do so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is true under existing law that permissions to enlist in the Regular Army are as stated; but is it not provided in this bill that the term of enlistments in these organizations are for this emergency and shall be only for this emergency?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. This bill we are discussing has not become a law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is discussing his bill, and his bill is the bill which he expects us to pass.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I would say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Missouri, the Speaker of this House [Mr. CLARK]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I desire to announce before I begin that I do not want to be interrupted until I get through, and then I will answer any reasonable and pertinent question that any gentleman wants to ask. I know what I want to say and I want to say it in a connected way. Two things are true beyond the shadow of a doubt:

First. For a Member of the House or Senate to differ with the President of the Republic—any President—is not pleasant. On the contrary, it is painful, especially when the President is one whom you have helped elect. I have made it a rule to always support the President—any President—when I believe he is right, and on doubtful questions give him the benefit of the doubt. Further than that I will not go, so help me Almighty God! Further than that I can not go and make good the oath that I took when I was sworn into this House. Further than that I can not go and be true to the principles of representative government. [Applause.] The President of the United States is the most powerful personage in the wide, wide world—more powerful than the Kaiser, Emperor, or King, any other variety of potentate. It is because he is the head of 100,000,000 free people. [Applause.] That is the reason he is powerful. He has his functions to perform and, as far as I have been able to observe, he is not bashful about performing them. [Laughter.] The House and Senate have their functions to perform, and if we are men we will perform them. [Applause.]

When a Member of the House or Senate has thoroughly and conscientiously studied a question with open mind and with all the lights available and has formed a conclusion, he should vote that conclusion, even though it runs counter to the desire of the President. If he does not do that, he is unfit to sit in House or Senate. He should resolutely and courageously do that, be the consequences to him personally what they may. Believing these things, I am about to express my opinion on the pending bill in language as temperate, kindly, and courteous as possible—an opinion arrived at after much investigation and more thought. I regret exceedingly that I can not agree with the President and his advisers on everything in this bill. But this is still a free country, and free speech has not yet been prohibited in the House of Representatives. For many years I have served the people in various positions of trust, always with perfect fidelity and with whatever capacity God has blessed me. I shall continue to do so to the end, whether that be near or far.

Second. We have entered into a great war—upon a stupendous undertaking. That being the case, this House will vote every man and every dollar needed to press it to a speedy and successful conclusion. On that we are all agreed, and anybody anywhere who disputes that pregnant fact grossly misrepresents a large number of men in House and Senate who are honestly endeavoring to discharge their duties. The only thing about which we debate is how best to accomplish the desired end; how most efficaciously to serve our country and our kind. The principal difference betwixt the contending forces here is this: One side wants a conscription and conscription only; nothing else will satisfy them. The other desires to give patriotic men of military age a chance to demonstrate their courage and their patriotism by volunteering within a reasonable time before the conscription mill is started grinding. Why any man should be denounced by all the vile names found in the dictionaries and by some not admitted to any dictionary and heard only in the stews for supporting either one of the two propositions is utterly beyond my comprehension. Those in favor of giving the traditional volunteer system a chance have never abused or denounced those in favor of conscription. All the foul abuse and malicious slanders are directed against the men who advocate giving a fair, reasonable trial of the old volunteer system which gained us victory in all our wars. [Applause.] It is astounding, and it is a safe and cowardly performance at a distance—much safer than to attempt it at a space of 3 feet. [Applause.] I am unreservedly in favor of the volunteer amendment to the Army bill. [Applause.] Mr.

DENT and the majority of his committee deserve great credit for reporting it, notwithstanding the pressure and blandishments used to induce them not to do so. I do not in any way impeach the integrity or the patriotism of the minority who want conscription, notwithstanding they fly squarely in the face not only of our own history but of the history of all English-speaking peoples; but why should Chairman DENT and the majority of the Military Committee be assailed with inhuman rancor because they stand for the American doctrine of giving an opportunity for the brave, the patriotic, to volunteer to fight for their country?

Of all men, Missourians should be the foremost to defend the volunteer system, for Missouri is the only State in the Union to send more than her full quota—without a draft, mark you—into both the Union and Confederate Armies. [Applause.] That is a record to which there is no parallel in all history. In 1860 her total vote was only 165,518; yet she sent 111,000 volunteers into the Union Army and, as nearly as can be ascertained, 50,000 volunteers into the Confederate Army, a grand total of 161,000 volunteers [applause], and there can be no question that she will do her full share in this emergency if only given a chance. [Applause.]

Now, when some of these high conscriptionists undertake to give the records of their State let them give one that will approach that. For a chance for that imperial Commonwealth to have the glorious privilege of raising her full quota of her brave and gallant sons by the volunteer system instead of being dragged into the Army by the scruff of their necks, I humbly pray the American Congress. [Applause.] I protest with all my heart and mind and soul against having the slur of being a conscript placed upon the men of Missouri. In the estimation of Missourians there is precious little difference between a conscript and a convict. [Applause.] Missourians wish to serve shoulder to shoulder, elbow to elbow, heart to heart with their neighbors, friends, and kindred and do not desire to be broken up into small squads and distributed among strangers from distant localities. Wounded, their neighbors would render first aid. Sick, their friends would minister unto them. Dead, their friends and neighbors would bury them. Homesick and discouraged, their comrades would cheer them up. All history teaches that men fight better under such circumstances. There can not be any question about it. You can not produce any single great military name that will deny it. Some of these carpet knights may do so. [Laughter.] They want the folks back home to know that they discharged the duties of a soldier bravely, faithfully, and well, even unto death. Whatever else may be said of the Germans, nobody save an incorrigible and congenital idiot will deny that they fight well and know something about warfare. Pick up any newspaper, and what do you see? "The Bavarian Troops"; "The Saxon Troops"; "The Brandenburg Division"; "The Potsdam Guards"; "The Wurttemberg Infantry"; and so on through all the 26 States comprising the Empire and their subdivisions. Fighting thus, a pride of home is cultivated, thereby increasing their gallantry and their efficiency. So in the British Army troops have local designations such as "The Scotch Greys," which twice in their experience have been almost absolutely destroyed; "Princess Pat's Regiment," which has been nearly wiped out in Europe.

Why not have Missouri troops at least in companies, regiments, and brigades; Illinois troops; Kentucky troops; and so on through all the States?

It is asserted, however, that such arranging of units, such as I have suggested, into Missourians, Kentuckians, Kansans, Mississippians, and so forth, will be made. My friends, be not deceived by such talk. It is a tub to the whale—a sop to Cerberus, a blind for your eyes, a snare for your feet, a trap for the unwary—merely that, and nothing more. [Applause.] Why do I say that? Because the Senate is this very moment considering the War Department bill without the volunteer feature and without local units. The newspapers say that it will pass the Senate in the precise shape in which it was sent to the Senate by the War Department. What they hope is that we will turn down the majority of the House Committee on Military Affairs and swallow the War Department bill hook, line, and sinker. Failing to ram it down our throats in open fight here on the floor of the House, they hope to induce the conferees to give them what they want. If they have their way, there is no more chance for the organization of troops by State units than there is for us to be translated in chariots of fire after the manner of the prophet Elijah. [Applause.]

It is maliciously asserted that we who desire to give the volunteers a chance to serve their country are endeavoring to retard the creation of an army. That is simply preposterous, and if I did not want to keep within the bounds of parliamentary language I would make it a great deal stronger than that. [Applause.] On the contrary, the call for volunteers would hasten the formation of an army. It is understood that War Department officials say that it will require from three to five months to set the draft going. Why not then call for volunteers at once and secure a large volunteer army while preparing for the draft? [Applause.] Clearly it is those who oppose calling for volunteers and not those favoring the volunteers who are delaying the formation of an army.

Another thing, if the President had the day after the war was declared asked Congress to authorize him to call for 500,000 volunteers or even a million, both Houses would have passed the bill in 48 hours, and by this time he would have thousands of volunteers in camp and in training. [Loud applause.]

But it is said in answer to all this that anyone desiring to volunteer can enlist in the Standing Army! That is no answer at all, because it is a very different thing to serve as a volunteer with volunteers and to serve in the Standing Army. There is no use to give the reasons. [Applause.] They exist and intelligent people understand them full well.

Another serious objection to the War Department bill is the conscription age limit of 19 to 25. If we are to have conscription, it should apply to all men of military age. And if it did there would not be such a hullabaloo in certain quarters. When I went out to Chicago on St. Patrick's Day to make a speech to the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick—I think that is the name of the society—a reporter came to the hotel to interview me about this war. I did not want to be interviewed; I was not in a talkative humor. I said, "I wish all the editors of this country who are shouting for war could be put into the front rank." [Applause.] I think that interview was never published. [Applause and laughter.]

Why single out boys who were too young to vote for President and Representatives? They had nothing to do with bringing on the war, and why should they not be of the exempted classes in this selective or seductive conscription, so they may finish their educations, thereby fitting themselves for the duties of citizenship? [Applause.]

Consistency is rated as a jewel. I have always thought that it is better to be right and inconsistent than to be consistent and wrong. However that may be, I beg leave to call to your attention the most delicious piece of inconsistency ever put into print since Gutenberg invented movable types.

All of us read the Washington Post, and it is a bright paper. All of us know that it is one of the stanchest advocates of conscription to be found betwixt the two seas. Homer sometimes nods, and surely the Post editor nodded when he wrote the leader in the issue of Sunday, April 22.

Here is an excerpt from it—all that is pertinent to this discussion:

THE ROOSEVELT VOLUNTEERS.

Officers in the War Department are said to be opposed to granting permission to Col. Theodore Roosevelt to raise a division of volunteers for early service in France, because they think it would be inconsistent with the plan for raising a regular army by selective draft. If this objection were valid, Col. Roosevelt's patriotic offer should be declined.

But where is there any inconsistency? Where would the two plans conflict, and how?

Roosevelt is a fighting man. Nobody denies that. I think a great deal of him, because he knows a little about more things than any other human being I ever clapped my eyes on. [Laughter.] And he is not mealy-mouthed about telling it, either. [Laughter.]

Col. Roosevelt proposes to raise a division of volunteers, to be commanded by Regular Army officers. He proposes to accept men above the age of 25, who would not be subject to draft.

But they ought to put into parenthesis "Regular Army officers under him."

He proposes to accept men above the age of 25, who would not be subject to draft.

In that he is entirely correct.

The President's plan for selective draft would not be affected in the slightest degree by raising a division of volunteers.

If it will not be infringed upon in the slightest degree by raising one division of volunteers, how would it be infringed upon by raising a hundred times a thousand volunteers? [Applause.] Then he says:

The President's plan for selective draft would not be affected in the slightest degree by raising a division of volunteers.

That is what Prof. Squeers, of Dotheboy's Hall, would denominate "richness." I am reasonably certain that could Isaac Disraeli return to earth and get out a new and enlarged edition of his Curiosities of Literature he would give a prominent place to the foregoing excerpt from the Post. Col. Roosevelt is one of the most famous Americans, but is not giving him a division of volunteers a clear infringement of the selective draft? Why should the honor of volunteer service be granted to him and denied to all other American citizens? There is no question about his fighting qualities; but there are others. [Applause.]

Now, there is another thing: Nor will the statement, oft repeated in the public press and in debate, that the volunteers will be less efficient than conscripts, because they will elect their own officers, and in many cases elect incompetent men, stand for an instant the light of truth. Under the present volunteer act the officers would be taken from the Officers' Reserve Corps, selected by the War Department after proper examination. In fact, a volunteer army would be officered in exactly the same way that the conscript army would be.

Another thing: These gentlemen insist that they would have to drill an army if you would have conscripts. Now, will some of them rise and state how it happens that they can drill conscripts, who do not want to go into war at all, any quicker than they can drill volunteers? What is the sense in that sort of twaddle? [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I am going to read a few words from an old document. I am not certain but that I ought to apologize for reading it at all. Nevertheless I am going to read it. It is the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] It is an instrument that Gladstone said was the greatest performance ever struck from the human mind at one time, an instrument at whose making George Washington presided. And by the way, he was simply a plain volunteer. [Applause.] He was not a Regular Army officer. He was not a conscript, bless your soul! [Applause.] And while I am at it, and while it has nothing in the world to do with this debate, I am going to give you briefly my opinion about him; and, that is, that we do not do him honor enough, even yet. [Applause.] In my judgment he rendered greater service to his country and to the cause of human liberty as the President of the Constitutional Convention than he did either as Commander in Chief of the Army or as President of the United States. [Applause.] If it had not been for his vast influence we never would have had any Constitution agreed upon, and if it had not been for the certainty that he would be the first President they never would have ratified it. [Applause.] They came mighty near not ratifying it anyhow.

I want to read to you from the Constitution. I still believe we are living under the Constitution. [Applause.] Here is what it says about armies; it is in the eighth section of Article I, where the powers of Congress are granted:

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

To provide and maintain a navy.

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.

That is prefatory. Then—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

My fellow Representatives, has the Constitution of the United States also become "a mere scrap of paper"? [Applause.]

There was once a man in this country named Ulysses Simpson Grant, who had some vogue as a soldier. I take it that those who are howling for conscription and nothing but conscription would rather take the opinion of these modern carpet knights than that of the silent soldier. So far as I am concerned, I pin my faith in this matter to the invincible warrior. In his memoirs, by the way, one of the most readable books in our vernacular, he says:

While at Cairo I had frequent opportunities of meeting the rebel officers of the Columbus garrison. They seemed to be very fond of coming up on steamers under flags of truce. On two or three occasions I went down in like manner. When one of their boats was seen coming up carrying a white flag a gun would be fired from the lower battery at Fort Holt, throwing a shot across the bow as a signal to come no farther. I would then take a steamer and, with my staff and occasionally a few other officers, go down to receive the party. There were several officers among them whom I had known before, both at West Point and in Mexico. Seeing these officers, who had been educated for the profession of arms both at school and in actual war, which is a far more efficient training, impressed me with the great advantage the South possessed over the North at the beginning of the rebellion. They had from 30 to 40 per cent of the educated soldiers of the Nation.

They had no standing army, and consequently these trained soldiers had to find employment with the troops from their own States. In this way what there was of military education and training was distributed throughout their whole army. The whole loaf was leavened.

The North had a greater number of educated and trained soldiers, but the bulk of them were still in the Army and were retained generally with their old commands and rank until the war had lasted many months. In the Army of the Potomac there was what was known as the "regular brigade," in which, from the commanding officer down to the youngest second lieutenant, every one was educated to his profession. So, too, with many of the batteries; all of the officers, generally four in number to each, were men educated for their profession. Some of these went into battle at the beginning under division commanders who were entirely without military training. This state of affairs gave me an idea, which I expressed while at Cairo: That the Government ought to disband the Regular Army, with the exception of the Staff Corps, and notify the disbanded officers that they would receive no compensation while the war lasted except as volunteers. The register should be kept up, but the names of all officers who were not in the volunteer service at the close should be stricken from it.

Now, gentlemen, I take it that the witness is competent, and that he is intelligent about the things he is talking about; and it strikes me that we had better pay some attention to such men as that, rather than to a lot of fellows that have never been under fire.

I want to read now an article that was published in the Baltimore Evening Sun. It is signed by a veteran. I read:

HARK, FROM THE TOMBS COME AN ARGUMENT AND A SONG ABOUT EQUAL IN QUALITY.

To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN.

SIR: Within the last six months a great deal has been said about regulars, volunteers, and drafted men. Nearly every old soldier of the Union Army knows that during the Civil War the volunteer regiments did more than nine-tenths of the fighting. In Fox's report of the 300 regiments that did nearly all the fighting, he has 296 volunteer regiments, four regiments of Regulars, and no drafted regiments.

They would not put them in the front. [Applause.] They were afraid to trust them. [Applause.] I read further:

Also, of the 46 regiments that lost between 200 and 300 killed in action, the whole 46 were volunteer regiments. Pennsylvania's share was 11, nearly one-fourth; and a New Hampshire regiment had the highest number (298) killed in action. No regiment reached 500 killed in action. The old song that I sang in war times—

"Our troops are the best the world ever saw;
Our men are the bravest that ever went to war;
Our people, they are good wherever you go;
Our boys, they are fast, and our girls, they are not slow."

Chorus:

"Then hoist up the flag," etc.

VET.

BALTIMORE, April 17.

[Laughter and applause.]

One of the very best books ever written about the Civil War—I think Gen. Dick Taylor's Destruction and Reconstruction is the best—is a book entitled "Stonewall Jackson in the American Civil War," by Col. Henderson. I advise all of you who think well of the American volunteer to get it and read it. Here is what he said—and remember he was a colonel in the British Army:

Of the prowess of Lee's veterans sufficient has been said. Their deeds speak for themselves. But it was not the battle field alone that bore witness to their fortitude. German soldiers have told us that in the war of 1870, when their armies, marching on Paris, found, to their astonishment, the great city strongly garrisoned and hosts gathering in every quarter for its relief, a singular apathy took possession of the troops. The explanation offered by a great military writer is that "after a certain period even the victor becomes tired of war"; and "the more civilized," he adds, "a people is, the more quickly will this weakness become apparent." Whether this explanation be adequate is not easy to decide. The fact remains, however, that the Confederate volunteer was able to overcome that longing for home which chilled the enthusiasm of the German conscript. And this is the more remarkable inasmuch as his career was not one of unchequered victory. In the spring of 1863 the Army of the Potomac, more numerous than ever, was still before him, firmly established on Virginian soil; hope of foreign intervention, despite the assurances of the politicians, was gradually fading, and it was but too evident that the war was far from over. Yet at no time during their two years of service had the soldiers shown the slightest sign of that discouragement which seized the Germans after two months. And who shall dare to say that the southerner was less highly civilized than the Prussian or the Bavarian. Political liberty, freedom of speech and action, are the real elements of civilization, and not merely education. But let the difference in the constitution of the two armies be borne in mind. The Confederates, with few exceptions, were volunteers—who had become soldiers of their own choice, who had assumed arms deliberately and without compulsion, and who by their own votes were responsible that war had been declared. The Germans were conscripts, a dumb, powerless, irresponsible multitude, animated, no doubt, by heriditary hatred of the enemy but without that sense of moral obligation which exists in the volunteer. We may be permitted, then, to believe that this sense of moral obligation was one reason why the spirit of the southerners rose superior to human weakness, and that the old adage which declares that "one volunteer is better than three pressed men"—

[Applause.]

I wish you gentlemen would recollect who it is that is saying this—a trained soldier of the British Army, who observed the war with the eye of a military critic.

We may be permitted, then, to believe that this sense of moral obligation was one reason why the spirit of the southerners rose superior to human weakness, and that the old adage which declares that "one volunteer is better than three pressed men" is not yet out of date.

I do not know whether Col. Henderson is dead or not. I hope he is not. If he is alive it will make his eyes pop open like morning-glories when he finds out what they are trying to do here. [Applause.]

Nor is it an unfair inference that the armies of the Confederacy, allied by the "crimson thread of kinship" to those of Wellington, of Raglan, and of Clyde, owed much of their enduring fortitude to "the rock whence they were hewn."

I stand on these quotations from Gen. Grant and Col. Henderson without any ceremony, and put them against every word that has been said in this country, high or low, in favor of conscription. [Applause.] And with those two witnesses only I might close the evidence on our side.

But I want to read to you another little piece. One of the greatest writers on army matters that ever lived in any country, and who has writen a great many books, is Col. F. N. Maude, of the British Army. Whether he is the man who is the conqueror of Mesopotamia and the capturer of Bagdad I do not know, but he is a British colonel, at any rate. Here is just a short extract from him. After telling what the British have done he says:

What more in numbers could compulsion have afforded us; and what about the quality? After the distinction already won by many territorial units in the field—

You know what territorials are—

it is hardly necessary to say anything on this point, and as to the regulars, also volunteers, we will let the Prussian Guards and the German staff tell us now what they really think of our armies. Compulsion had done all that it could do, and more than even the best Prussian dared to expect, for their troops. It has carried them forward to almost certain death in a manner which has exacted the admiration of all our men and officers; but at that critical moment when the fate of empires hangs in the balance it has always failed them, and our men—territorials and regulars alike—territorials and regulars alike have sprung forward upon them with the bayonet with a determination never dreamt of in warfare since the days of Waterloo and the Peninsula.

And he takes pains to say that the regulars are volunteers—

Now, my friends, some gentlemen with more zeal than discretion have been trying to make out that everybody who is in favor of the volunteers is in some strange manner attacking the President of the United States and opposing him. We are not doing anything of the sort. We are supporting him better than they are, and I am going to prove it by him. [Applause.] He might not acknowledge it, but nevertheless it is true. This may be a little dry, but it is what Horace Greeley would have called "mighty rich reading."

In the months of January and February, 1916, there took place considerable correspondence between Secretary of War Lindley M. Garrison and President Wilson over certain measures proposed for preparation for national defense. Secretary Garrison indorsed and warmly advocated the continental army plan of the General Staff as opposed to the National Guard plan proposed by Mr. Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee.

You all know Hay. He is one of the ablest men we have had in Congress in some years. [Applause.]

The Hay plan, Secretary Garrison declared in a letter to President Wilson bearing date of January 12, 1916, was the entire abandonment of the idea of a Federal force of national volunteers. He added:

There is unfortunately very little knowledge and very little intense personal interest in any Members of the House concerning military affairs.

It has always astonished me that men who know everything, who could pass a tariff bill over night, who can pass any other great measure while you wait, do not come down here and get into one House or the other of Congress. [Laughter.] About two years ago, when we had up the Federal reserve bank bill, one of these men came into my room and was telling me that we were all a lot of lunkheads in both the House and Senate, and he kept on in that way until I got somewhat warm. I said, "I have always wanted to know why men like you young Solomons, who know everything instantly, right off the bat, and do not have to investigate anything, do not get elected to Congress and come down here and do these things." He said, "Why, everybody does not want to come to Congress." I said, "There are not a thousand men in the United States who, if they could, would not come either to the House or the Senate." [Applause.] "And I will tell you the reason you do not come down here and get into the House or the Senate, because you can not get votes enough." [Laughter and applause.] "People have not confidence enough in you." I have not heard anything out of him since. [Laughter and applause.]

Secretary Garrison urged upon the President the imperative necessity of his seeking an occasion at the earliest possible moment to declare himself with respect to the matter, and in doing so to make it clear beyond peradventure that nothing excepting national forces, raised by the Nation and subject to its exclusive authority, responsibility, and control, is any real settlement of this issue.

To this letter the President replied on the 17th of January, 1916, following, in part, as follows:

I am not irrevocably or dogmatically committed to any one plan of providing the Nation with such a reserve, and am cordially willing to discuss alternative proposals.

On February 9, 1916, Secretary Garrison wrote the President that he desired to be informed of the determination reached by him with respect to the so-called Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill—to which he was also unalterably opposed—and to the continental army bill.

On February 10, 1916, the President wrote Secretary Garrison in part as follows:

As I have had occasion to say to you, I am not yet convinced that the measure of preparation for national defense which we deem necessary can be obtained through the instrumentality of the National Guard under Federal control and training, but I feel in duty bound to keep my mind open to conviction. The bill in which it will be embodied has not yet been drawn, as I learned to-day from Mr. HAY. I should deem it a very serious mistake to shut the door against this attempt on the part of the committee in perfect good faith to meet the essentials of the program set forth in my message, but in a way of their own choosing. As you know, I do not at all agree with you in favoring compulsory enlistment for training, and I fear the advocacy of compulsion before the committee of the House on the part of representatives of the Department of War has greatly prejudiced the House against the proposal for a continental army, little necessary connection as there is between the plan and the opinion of the Chief of Staff of compulsory enlistment.

Upon receipt of the above letter Secretary Garrison immediately tendered his resignation as Secretary of War, and it was promptly accepted by the President.

In the account of Secretary Garrison's resignation, published in the Washington Post of February 11, 1916, that paper stated that the President declined "to take any irrevocable stand on the ground that it would not be proper for him to say to a committee of Congress that it would have to take his plan or none. He declared he did not believe Members of the House dealing with military affairs were ignorant of the military necessities of the Nation, but had found them well informed.

Should a bill be presented to him which he could not accept as accomplishing the essential thing sought, he said, it would be his duty to veto it and go to the country on the merits.

Now, I say, we come nearer to backing up his well-considered opinion than Brother KAHN and his confreres. I want to read another sentence or two from the President. He is a great and good man. He writes with a great deal of facility. There has not been a more skillful artist hold of the English language in a century than he.

On Memorial Day, May 30, 1916, he made a speech at Arlington. In that speech he used these refreshing words:

I have heard a great many people talk about universal training. Universal voluntary training with all my heart, if you wish it, but America does not wish anything but compulsion of the spirit of America.

Those words were fitly spoken and are "like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

Now, I challenge Brother KAHN, who is the head and center of this thing. It reminds me of the knighting of an Englishman, "Kneel, Julius; rise up, Sir Julius." [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say in all seriousness that if this conscription fad is to be put on the American people there are two men in this House who deserve more credit for it than any other two men on top of the ground. One is the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. I am in favor of giving the devil his due. [Laughter and applause.]

For several years there has been a systematic effort in Congress, in certain clubs in this city, in many newspapers, by some public speakers, and in sundry magazines to belittle, depreciate, and minimize the American volunteer. I resent such performance in the name of the living and the dead, in the name of the brave men who gave us our freedom and who have maintained it, in the name of the volunteers who have shed imperishable luster upon American arms and upon the American Republic. Our Regulars have always done well, but there have been few of them by comparison. God knows that I have not the slightest disposition to disparage them; but after all due honor has been done to the Regulars, the fact remains that the volunteer has done most of our fighting.

The American volunteer is one of the glories of the Republic. Under young George Washington he saved the remnants of Braddock's army from destruction. In the French and Indian War he fought side by side with the British regulars. From April 19, 1775, when on the village green of Lexington and at the Concord Bridge the embattled farmers and the Minute Men of Massachusetts fired the shot heard around the world down to the last shot in the Spanish-American War, the American volunteer has been a very present help in every time of trouble. He made Bunker Hill a name to conjure with forever. He captured Burgoyne at Saratoga. He upheld Washington amid the horrors of Valley Forge; he destroyed the Hessians at Treu-ton; he achieved the astounding victory at Kings Mountain against Ferguson's British regulars, thereby turning the tide of the Revolutionary War. On a hundred fields, sometimes victorious, sometimes defeated, hungry, naked, footsore, and weary, he fought on with dogged pertinacity until he stood with the glorious and victorious Washington on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown, where Jefferson's declaration was made good and America was free indeed. [Applause.]

The critics of the American volunteer are always harping on the rout of a handful of untrained militia at Bladensburg by British regulars; why do they never, even by accident, mention Gen. Harrison's splendid men at the River Thames? How does it happen that they never can remember Andrew Jackson, and how at New Orleans, with 5,500 untrained backwoods volunteers armed with flint-lock, muzzle-loading rifles, he defeated Wellington's Peninsular army, who had snatched the iron crown of Charlemagne from the brow of Napoleon. That was the most amazing piece of shooting done by any army in any battle anywhere since the invention of gunpowder. And God be praised, American volunteers did it. [Applause.] But, strange to tell, these belittlers of the American volunteer are silent as the voiceless grave when it comes to Andrew Jackson and New Orleans! God forgive them for their lack of appreciation of the heroic deeds of the brave men who won imperishable renown on that bloody field!

The volunteer was our chief reliance in the War with Mexico. He conquered at Buena Vista, Churubusco, and Chapultepec, and placed the Starry Banner of the Republic on the palace of the Montezumas. In that war Col. Alexander Doniphan, with 1,100 green Missouri volunteers, marched from Fort Leavenworth, Kans., conquered Arizona, New Mexico, and Chihuahua, fighting dozens of battles, never losing even a skirmish, though frequently fighting ten times his own numbers, and finally reported to Gen. Taylor, ragged, hungry, but invincible, on the red field of Monterey—the most astounding march in the annals of war.

That is what a Missourian could do! The march of Xenophon and his 10,000 has been proclaimed by historians for 30 centuries, because he had sense enough to write a book giving an account of his own performances; but here is this brave Missourian, who made the most astounding march in the history of the human race, and Xenophon with his 10,000 is not a marker to it, and his glorious name does not appear in some of the great American encyclopedias. Why, if he had been a Massachusetts man, followed by Massachusetts volunteers, the world would hardly contain the books that would have been written about it. [Laughter.] I am a Missourian, thank God, and proud to be a countryman of Doniphan.

In the Civil War the volunteer did nine-tenths of the fighting on both sides. It is said that men will not volunteer; but nevertheless there was no draft until the North and the South had raised about 2,000,000 men—the best soldiers the sun has looked upon in 6,000 years of slaughter. At the first tap of the drum an entire people sprang to arms. We had, North and South, then only 33,000,000 people; now we have more than 100,000,000. Why doubt their love of country? Where is the man with sufficient temerity to stand up in a public place and assert that the volunteers who fought in the Civil War on both sides were not first-class soldiers? Who will dare to say that the men who charged with Pickett up the slippery slopes of Gettysburg or the men in blue who rallied around George H. Thomas, "The Rock of Chickamauga," for three dreadful days did not arise to the highest standard of military excellence? American volunteers, God bless them every one! [Applause.]

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead!

If this stupendous war continues long, conscription may become necessary; but in the light of the history of English-speaking people we contend that it is not necessary now. Conscription has always been repugnant to men of our blood. [Applause.] In this very war Great Britain never ordered a conscription until she had raised 5,000,000 volunteers, a somewhat sizable army, certainly; and not one British conscript is fighting on the Continent now.

Canada, with only 7,000,000 population, 3,000,000 less than that of New York, has sent 400,000 volunteers across the sea. The Canadians have done such splendid deeds as to fill the world with their acclaim; and Canada has done her full share without a draft, and will have none of it. The Australians and New Zealanders have furnished their full quotas and acquitted themselves handsomely without a draft, and refused the draft on a referendum vote.

Why do gentlemen doubt the courage and the patriotism of the present generation of Americans? There is not a scintilla of evidence that we have degenerated into a race of cowards or mollycoddles. As for myself, I love to think well of my countrymen.

Patrick Henry said:

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience.

The poet Campbell expanded Henry's thought into these lines:

Go watch the wheels of nature's mazy plan
And read the future from the past of man.

Assuming that the great lyric orator and the great Scotch poet were correct in formulating a rule for predicting human action, why do gentlemen jump to the conclusion that Americans of our time will fail in their full measure of duty and service in this time of stress? What right have they to assume any such preposterous condition of things? Our fathers did their duty; we will do ours, never fear.

For we are the same our fathers have been,
We see the same sights our fathers have seen;
We drink the same streams and view the same sun
And run the same course our fathers have run.

I am sure that the House will pardon a word purely personal. My only living son is, with my full consent, going into the Army in any capacity in which he can be useful, either as an officer or a private. [Applause.] Of course I hate to see him go, but he thinks it his duty, and I would not have it otherwise. Naturally he is dear to me—no dearer to me than other men's sons to them. I hope and pray that when the hour may come when he is subjected to the ordeal of fire, he may go into battle not by the side of the slackers and loafers whom the advocates of this bill say they desire to reach but shoulder to shoulder with free men who serve gladly, willingly, to fight for the honor, the safety, and the perpetuity of this Republic. Should he fall, I want the privilege of carving on his tombstone these words: "This man, a Missouri volunteer, died fighting for his country." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I realize the disadvantage that any speaker must labor under who undertakes to follow the distinguished Speaker of the House, well beloved as he is by all of the membership of the House. However much anyone may differ with him, no man could have listened to the closing sentences of his very remarkable speech without having flee from his heart all sense of bitterness or personal antagonism which might have grown up because of a difference of view on this vital and all-absorbing question. And so I shall not in any way undertake to make my speech a reply to that of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] other than it may of necessity have to be, in reviewing the arguments that all have made on his side of the question and which he has so eloquently and well made. But I may be pardoned if I accept one challenge of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri. He challenged any Member here who might say on behalf of the people of his State what he so proudly said touching Missouri and her conduct in the Civil War. Knowing the distinguished gentleman's birthplace, I marveled that he did not also remember that Kentucky, his native State, also furnished her full quota to both sides in that great conflict. And while he was speaking I received a telegram from a very distinguished Kentuckian, a constituent of mine, a soldier during the long, bitter years of the Civil War. In that telegram he makes a request of me with which I shall comply. It reads:

I have sent this letter to CHAMP CLARK. If he does not read it to the House, I hope you will.

Then follows the letter:

As an old and steadfast friend, whom you have sometimes honored by calling him your teacher, I am constrained to challenge the vote it is reported you are about to cast upon the Army bill. If the war should last long enough to put the issue to actual test, it will surely return to dog your political future and bar your usefulness in public life. Our beloved country never faced a more exigent situation. Congress will make mistakes at the peril of all we hold near and dear. The volunteer system, like the stagecoach, served its purpose in primitive times, but like that stagecoach it proved unequal to the expanding needs of modern times. The selective draft system is the contribution which experience offers to intelligence. The talk about Prussianizing our Army is the chatter of unreflected demagogy. We must meet organism with organism and fight the enemy with both hands, not with one hand tied behind us. Out here in God's country the people understand the question perfectly. They know that the volunteer system favors the slacker and the shirk, while the selective draft system is fair to each and every man, but, above all, they know that the volunteer system has been a failure wherever tried, and seeking efficiency they prefer the selective draft system, just as seeking speed they would prefer a locomotive to an oxcart. I am distressed that you can not see your way to this view, but seem about to ally yourself with a policy of obstruction which can only embarrass us and aid the enemy. And it is in deep solicitude for our country and sincere affection for you that I venture to obtrude this protest.

HENRY WATTERSON.

Mr. Chairman, before I undertake somewhat briefly to state to the committee the fundamental principles that I think should guide us in determining this issue, let me say that it is not true, in my judgment, that those who favor the selective draft do or desire in any way to reflect upon the courage, the glory, or the patriotism of the volunteer soldier who of his own volition serves his country. [Applause.] That issue is not here presented, and no amount of oratory, no amount of review of the glorious pages in the history of America, of the things that we all love and have the right to recall with high pride can make that the issue. Believing, as I do, in the selective draft, and that it is absolutely essential for a consistent military policy at this time, I glory equally with the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in the achievements of the volunteer soldier. [Applause.]

The indictment that is undertaken to be brought against the individual citizen is not by those who plead for the selective draft, but by those who undertake to make the country and this House believe that under a selective draft you are only going to get shirkers and slackers and that it is to be put upon a plane of comparison with the old conscription that came after men had failed and refused in any degree to volunteer and when those who were affected by it had the deserved stigma of unwillingness to defend their country. I deny that there can be any sort of stigma upon a man who by the law of his country is to be called upon to perform the highest act of citizenship—to offer his life for the support of that country.

When we undertake to make the selective draft we do not classify invidiously our citizens. We do not say that those to whom the draft shall apply are cowards, unworthy and unfit to be classed with volunteers. But we do say this, that modern war is the most scientific pursuit of man; that the needs of the Nation are not simply on the battle field, but behind the line in the feeding of the army in front and behind that among the workshops and in the activities and industries of a nation, and we do say that in order that a nation may use its strength most effectively there must be some coordination, there must be some decision as to who shall perform a particular duty that he owes to the country and who shall perform a duty of another character; we do say that this system that is required can not be maintained by depending upon a fluctuating coming in of an army of volunteers. Believing that, I believe that it is absolutely illogical that you should apply every possible scientific method the moment you get your men in the service, but that you should not apply such method in getting the raw material for it. So I deny again that the issue here is an issue between men who are discrediting the value of volunteers and those who extol them or that we are proposing that men shall fight our battles who are lacking in courage and who will fight only because they are compelled to do so. A draft is not humiliating except when applied after failure of volunteering and on slackers alone.

Now, I want to undertake very briefly to convey to the committee what I believe to be the task ahead of us and how best it can be met. It is natural that all of us, abhorring war, should in our hearts hope, and with some of us that hope may lead to belief, that this European war is soon to end, and yet no more fatal mistake could be made than for Congress to enter upon the task now in front of it with the belief that the war is soon to end. God grant that in His mercy it will very quickly end, that the tremendous sacrifice of life now going on may stop, but this Nation must prepare on the assumption of the very worst and not the very best conditions that may confront it. [Applause.] It must prepare not only to spend its treasure, but to spend its life. If the poet be right, that blood be the price of admiralty, aye, even more is blood the price of the honor and the sovereignty of a people; and the people of America would be unworthy of their heritage if they were prepared to enter this war only with money, seeking to hide behind the sons of the countries in alliance with us in this war who are giving their blood upon the battle fields of Europe. Whether men believed this war should have been entered into or not, every man now worthy of the name of American wants to see American soldiers equipped and sent to the battle fields of Europe as soon as we can send an efficient fighting force. [Applause.] I should be ashamed of my country to believe that we would wait one hour after we can supply an efficient fighting force. I use the word "efficient" because to send any other force there is not a help, but a hurt, to the common cause. The question then comes as to how best we can provide in the quickest way for an efficient fighting force and how we can best guarantee to keep that force efficient and to supply the places in the ranks of those who shall fall fighting for our country. Before I go into a discussion of the respective merits of the proposal of the minority and the majority of the committee it may not be amiss if I undertake to state what I conceive to be the obligation of both the Nation and of the citizen. A government must, as a primary factor, consider its own preservation. It must do those things necessary to win a war in the quickest possible manner, though it should so do them as to place the burden most equitably upon the citizenship of the country.

The citizen, on the other hand, owes as a duty to give in any degree of property, of comfort, aye, of life, when the Nation may ask. It is not volitional with him. That is the basic fact that should underlie this debate. The citizen has not a right to volunteer. He has not a right to refuse to serve. He has a duty to serve as and how and when his Nation commands [applause], and any other citizenship is a citizenship that lacks the very essence of what goes to make the sovereignty of a nation.

No amount of argument will ever convince me that a nation can last that does not have the right, and, when the occasion arises, exercises the right, to compel of every citizen the doing of those things that may be necessary for the preservation of the national life. [Applause.]

In a less momentous way that question was met at the beginning of this Government. When the States were organized together by the Articles of Confederation, and the National Government undertook to obtain those things necessary to continue its life, it had to leave it to the volition of the separate States. And they were told what moneys they should furnish and what acts they should perform in order that the Nation might continue and might thrive. And their failure to perform those acts forced those practical men, faced with a concrete situation, to create a Nation where the obligation of the citizen to the National Government was direct, not indirect; mandatory, and not volitional. And it was because of that that these United States came into being.

I repeat that a citizen has no right, moral or otherwise, to refuse to give of his life, if need be, when his Nation calls. Any man who is not willing to accept that position has no right to live within a country and accept the benefits that come from the Government that protects him. I am not nearly so much concerned in this hour touching the rights of individual citizens as I am touching the duties of the citizenship of America. [Applause.] What little experience I may have had in life has taught me that the man is best and worthiest who thinks most of his duty and insists least upon his rights. [Applause.]

Now, which is the fairest? This Nation must do the necessary thing. It must get the men; but which is the fairest way to get them? To get them simply from those who volunteer first and demand nothing from those who do not see the obligation as those do who volunteer? And, mark you, it does not follow that because a man does not volunteer he is a coward or that he is unwilling to do that which he ought to do for his country. Men have different conceptions of duty. Aye, men in this country and on this floor have all degrees of belief as to the particular thing they should do and the degree of the emergency which now confronts this country. It is not fair to ask of the citizen that he shall determine for himself whether his duty is to go to the front or whether his duty may not be to perform some of the essential things behind. It is not fair to ask him to decide that question, and it particularly is not fair to say to those who do solve it along the line of duty in volunteering that they shall bear the burden and that the Nation, as a nation, shall not take any action touching the duties of other men and their obligations who yet have not seen fit to volunteer.

The one cardinal principle that must be kept in mind in all of this debate is that we here are spokesmen for the Nation and not spokesmen for the individual. We are not spokesmen for our congressional districts or our States. I speak to-day not as a Kentuckian—proud though I am of the title—but as an American citizen in a National Congress of the United States. [Applause.] The need of the Nation is paramount, and not the wish of the individual. These statements, to my mind, should be axiomatic. I can not conceive of any man seriously disputing them, and in their last analysis no man on either side of this question is disputing them, because the report of the majority of the committee contemplates the right, when the need may come, of the Government to draft men into the service and recognizes the obligation of citizens to obey.

What, then, will justify a departure from the principle that I have laid down of the Nation, as a nation, determining the dut yof its citizenship? Nothing but the efficiency that may be gained by a contrary system, and the only valid argument that is offered by those who favor the volunteer system is that you will get a more efficient force quicker. I deny it. I deny that you will get it as quick, and I deny that it will be more efficient. Because, I repeat, under a selective draft, put in operation in the beginning, you are not choosing slackers and cowards; you are choosing from the mass of the citizenship of America according to their ability best to perform the function they are called upon to perform. And I, as an American, am unwilling to believe that the men who will come under the selective draft will come as cowards; or, to use the expression of the gentleman from Missouri, that the convict is equal to the conscript. I deny and repudiate any such suggestion. [Applause.]

It is said, however, that the selective draft can not be put in operation for many months, and that pending that you can obtain a volunteer force and that this volunteer force can be trained and officered and be made ready to take the field while you are getting ready to make your draft and make your enumeration. I deny it. I deny that there is anything in the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, every word of which I have read, that warrants that conclusion. Oh, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]—I think it was—said. "Why, you in a measure confess it, because you provide for volunteering as to the Regular Army and the National Guard." I want to impress upon this House that the volunteering that is thus permitted, and which, by the way, gives an opportunity for those men who feel that their honor would be impaired if they obeyed the command of their country by reason of the law of their country, but that it will be kept bright if they volunteer, irrespective of a law, is justified by the existence of organizations in the Regular Army and National Guard already drafted that can absorb such volunteers, and——

Mr. MASON. May I ask a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MASON. Is there anything under the present law that would permit a man to volunteer during this war?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. And there is nothing under the present law that will carry out your plan. But if this bill passes, either according to the majority or the minority report, there will be an opportunity for men to enlist in the Regular Army and in the National Guard for the length of the war, and no longer. And every man here knows it, and nothing is more unfair than to try to produce the impression that there would be no opportunity for volunteers for the length of the war.

Mr. MASON. There is nothing there either, if you will pardon me, that justifies the impression that men ought to enlist now, when there is no call for enlistment and no opportunity to enlist during the war.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman seems to be worried about there having been no call. I wonder at that man who thinks that the only kind of patriotic action is that which springs spontaneous and then talks about the need of a call in advance of volunteering. [Applause.]

When this law shall have passed, whether the view of the majority or that of the minority goes into effect, there will be an opportunity for enlistments. Gentlemen, if you will take the RECORD of to-day and turn to page 1023 you will find there a letter of the Secretary of War addressed to the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, United States Senate, in which it is shown that there will be, according to the view of the Secretary of War, an opportunity for 724,718 volunteers.

Now, for my part I want to be frank with the House. I do not believe that any such number as that will be taken into the National Guard or into the Regular Army by volunteer methods. I question very much the desirability of doing it. But certainly there is an opportunity for two or three hundred thousand men to volunteer in these organizations.

Now I return to the pertinent inquiry: Why is it that the department says in one breath, according to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and others, "We are not ready for volunteers, and we do not want volunteers now," and in the next breath points out a method for volunteering, running up into the thousands? To the casual observer there would be an inconsistency in that proposal; and yet there is nothing of the kind. I was stating when interrupted that the reason why volunteers can be taken into the Regular Army and into the National Guard now and mustered into the service is because the organizations are there, sufficient to absorb these men, and it is not necessary to go through the preliminary work of the organization and training of the officers that would be necessary if you were going to take men in under the volunteer system that is proposed by the majority of the committee. [Applause.] That fact is a dominant and pertinent fact, and it can not be lost sight of by any amount of oratory.

Oh, gentlemen say, "We will have an army quicker by virtue of the volunteer system"; and the gentleman from Kansas announced, with all the weight that attaches to membership on the Committee on Military Affairs, that one firm in America could furnish a million rifles in 60 days after the order was given for equipping these men. It is only charitable to hope that his other statements touching facts are more nearly accurate than that statement [applause], because in less than 20 minutes after the statement was made by the gentleman from Kansas, Gen. Crozier said to me before my committee that they hoped, after the order was given, within 60 days to get some deliveries, and at the end of 12 months they trusted to be able to get a million rifles.

But more than rifles are needed for soldiers. There are camps, there is shelter, there is food, there is clothing, there is all of sanitation. God forbid that this country should ever again go through the experience that it went through with volunteer forces in the Spanish-American War, called into groups and assembled in camps without any provision having been made for them, so that the death rate from disease was infinitely greater than any death rate from wounds received in battle; so that the camp was more deadly to the soldier than the battle front itself.

Gentlemen, to organize a modern army is not a matter of a few moments. It is not a matter of a few days. Men who have sat, as I have sat for 10 days past, and listened to the details of the estimates that go to make up the $3,000,000,000 that the Army is asking for would realize something of the tremendous task that is put upon the Army officers and the War Department in handling properly this force when it is called into existence.

Now, what is the proposal? The proposal is this, that these men shall be selected as the result of an enumeration of the citizenship of the land, which shall determine the numbers that are eligible, that they shall be selected and called for in such numbers and at such times as they can be properly taken care of and officered.

What is really the proposal that underlies the proposition of the majority of the committee? It crops out every now and then in the remarks of gentlemen. It came out to those who were observant in the speech of the distinguished Speaker of the House. It is this, that you can not and should not get volunteers except by getting them in units, when their organizations will be made up by them at the time; in other words, that individuals in my community and in your community shall be permitted to organize companies, and the companies shall be permitted to organize into regiments, and that these shall then be offered to the United States.

Oh, but some gentlemen will say the bill that is before the House provides that the President shall have the determination of the officers and may remove any that are incompetent. Gentlemen, there is a great deal of difference between what the law permits and what the facts will permit. If these men should be able, under their plan, as they say, overnight almost, to raise 500,000 men and to throw them into the Army of the United States, it would be absolutely necessary to take the officers that come with them, good, bad, or indifferent, because it would be better than any other available organization. But if you go along as it is proposed, by the training of officers, by making provision for the care and housing of these men, by the time your draft will have been made you will be prepared to receive your men as they come in, and these men will come in not according to chance but according to need. I repeat, the men will come in not as the result of chance but as the result of need. [Applause.] And it is entirely feasible and contemplated that when so taken in they shall be formed into regiments composed of men from the same State and, in large measure, locality.

Who is here so wise, so eminent, that he can tell how many men will volunteer, and from where. And who is here so courageous that he dare risk the safety of his country on the correctness of his guess. [Applause.]

The one essential thing for the proper organization of an army is continuity in the supply of men, and after that army is organized and it goes to the front, in order to support it with the reserves that are necessary to fill up the ranks, there must be knowledge of the number of men needed and the ability always to get that number. And when you leave it to the volition of men, you leave it to chance, say what you please.

If many men should volunteer in new units at once, we could not take care of them.

If we could not get them easily, we would have the disgrace of a campaign of recruiting such as England witnessed. If in the meanwhile we should be able to get organizations of officers, we would lack the men to fill the ranks. We could not know how many we would get from time to time, and could not make real provision for them. Of necessity we would have either organizations of officers without men, or men without effective organizations to feed them into.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman think that the majority report leaves that entirely to the volition of men? Does not the gentleman realize that we authorize the President to proceed with his program?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I appreciate the fact that the gentleman's bill is really built on a repudiation of the principle for which he contends. [Applause.] But the principle of volunteering, for which the gentleman has contended, is a principle that leaves to the volition of men and not to any system, the acquiring of the units.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has stated that I built this on a repudiation of my own ideas. I think I ought to be permitted to make this statement, that the idea of the majority of the committee was that while the machinery was being put in operation for the draft system, the President, if necessary, could call for volunteers, to fill up the ranks by volunteers; and if Congress adjourns before that happens, then he will have the authority. And we did that in order to meet the argument that you could not raise them by volunteers.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's plan contemplates getting the first 500,000 and then the second 500,000 by volunteers. Is not that true?

Mr. DENT. That is very true, if the President so decides.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Now, if the President so decides, when does he get the power to decide otherwise? When in his opinion the volunteering system breaks down. Is not that true?

Mr. DENT. That, in his opinion, the volunteer system has broken down.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The President has the right to decide that it has broken down.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Now, I repeat that your proposal, as a whole, is built on the assumption that the volunteer system will break down. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr SHERLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am perfectly willing to concede that may not have been the motive and the desire of the gentleman, and I know he will appreciate that I speak in sincerity when I say to him that I attribute only the loftiest motives to him.

Mr. DENT. I am sure of that.

Mr. SHERLEY. But this House is not concerned with what was the intention of men. It is concerned with the legislative effect of their proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. The gentleman certainly will not state that if the majority report is adopted the President can not get everything that he asks for.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; but I think he has to get it after he has gone through the trial and the tribulation of finding the volunteer system inadequate, and he gets it by having to try a system that if it fails you then put upon men the very stigma that you gentlemen say you are desirous of keeping away from the citizenship. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. DENT. But I want to ask the gentleman to state right in that connection if he believes we should use the selective draft in order to defend the country, why is it that the Navy, which is the first line of defense, is not selected in the same way? [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman's inquiry. It is one thing to be able to furnish 100,000 men over a course of years, as ships come into commission, and to get them by the volunteer system, and it is quite another thing to organize 1,000,000 men by the volunteer system, with the uncertainties of enlistment and of volunteering. [Applause.] If the gentleman can not see any difference in practical effect between keeping the Navy fully manned from year to year as ships come into commission by volunteers from 110,000,000 people, and requiring in all something like 100,000 men to man the ships—if the gentleman can not see the practical distinction between that problem and the one which presents itself of suddenly getting 1,000,000 men to put in the field, why then he and I can not meet anywhere along the line. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. "The gentleman" can see the difficulty in the problem; but what I want to understand is why it is that you should recognize the volunteer system when you come to fill up your enlisted men in the Navy, which confessedly is not filled up now, and yet repudiate the volunteer system when you come to the Army?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FARR. Eighty-seven thousand men for the Navy.

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a minute; one at a time. I am not undertaking to belittle the volunteer. I started my speech by a repudiation of that suggestion. My refusal to accept the volunteer system is not because I hold a grudge against the volunteer. God forbid that anything I should say should detract from the heroism and the patriotism of men who, wisely or unwisely, offer their lives at their country's call without waiting for law. [Applause.] But it is one thing to glory in the patriotism of men and it is another thing to adopt a system when there is imperative need of having the system work. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Why does the gentleman object to our offering to the President the opportunity to raise 500,000 men by volunteers——

Mr. SHERLEY. I have been rather stupid if I have not made plain to the gentleman and the House the reason why I object. The reasons why I object are these——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not finish my question. The bill from the War Department puts it up to the President that he shall be required to decide when the Regular Army and the National Guard is not being filled up rapidly enough, and we take exactly the same language which the bill uses to apply——

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer the gentleman. The trouble with the gentleman is that he thinks that because he uses the same terms and applies them to different conditions he is consistent. Consistency consists not only in applying the same program, but in applying it when the facts upon which it is to be applied are the same. Now, I answer the gentleman in this way: The reason why it is practicable to accept volunteers in the Regular Army and the National Guard——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a moment, to finish in my time the thought which I am trying to express. It is that in the National Guard and the Regular Army you have the organization that can absorb those men.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield all that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Whereas I deny that you could take care of half a million volunteers now if they were offered, in separate units.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But I understood the gentleman to say that we confessed our plan was a failure because we offered the alternative of the selective draft in the first two——

Mr. SHERLEY. If we can expedite this debate, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the statement that you all think it is a failure. I think it bears that construction, but I am willing to relieve you from that.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What the gentleman says about the organization of the National Guard and the Regular Army is also true of the Navy, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That the organization is there, and the question of volunteer officers is not involved.

Mr. SHERLEY. There have been many reasons advanced by many men for their position. You hear privately more than you hear publicly the statement that if you have a draft you will have riots in America. You usually hear that statement from men who did not believe that this country ought to go into war. [Applause.] I believe with my whole soul that this is a holy war that these United States are going to prosecute. [Applause.] I believe with every fiber of my being that every ounce of power that we have must be used in bringing the war to a victorious end. If we have riots, we shall know how to deal with them, but I deny there is any probability of riots. If they should come, we shall be able to separate the sheep from the goats.

I have little patience with men—I ought not to say that, because it is not the time when we should speak disparagingly of the motives of other men—but I am sure that those of us who feel the responsibility of having placed this country in a war are determined that by no failure of ours anywhere shall we make the success at all doubtful. [Applause.] Men have talked about it being difficult to vote against war. Each man must search his own conscience. It had been infinitely easier for me to vote "no" on the war resolution than to vote "aye." It is not a pleasant thing to send men into battle when you yourself shall not go. Nothing but a compelling sense of duty, I am sure, actuated those of us who on that fateful day voted "aye." It is a compelling sense of duty now that causes me to insist and to urge that this House do not adopt the system; that they do not risk the lives of the men of America on a system that, however sincere their belief, has not the approval of those who have the duty to supervise, to train, and to lead this Army into battle.

I know it is the custom of the cloakroom, particularly in piping times of peace, to belittle the Regular Army officer and say that his viewpoint is the result of a selfish desire of promotion. If we send the Army into the trenches of France, the promotion that most of the officers of that first division will get will not be an earthly promotion. [Applause.] They present to you their views because upon them is the responsibility of getting results.

Let things go wrong in this country—we are an impatient people—and then these men will be held responsible. They tell you now, with a knowledge of what is needed, that it is not practicable to take over night 300,000 or 500,000 volunteers in new organizations and equip and train them. They tell you that the most important thing is to be sure of an adequate supply of men. They tell you, and England tells you, that the result of the volunteer system there was that at first they got more men than they could use, equip, and handle, and subsequently they got less, an finally they were forced to a draft. Men talk about their raising 5,000,000 men by the volunteer system. The last 2,000,000 or more of that 5,000,000 was raised by the most compulsory, odious method known to mankind. It was not the compulsion of the nation speaking as a nation; it was the compulsion of public opinion, public opinion that operated justly and unjustly upon the individual until it got so that no man fit to bear arms, no matter what the reason was, no matter how badly he should be needed at home, could stay at home because of what was said to him and of him by those in England.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it, then, correct to say that those men who will be put in by compulsory law are fitted to fight alongside of the volunteers?

Mr. SHERLEY. I said that every man fitted to bear arms was under such criticism and attack that he sought to enlist whether he ought to have enlisted or not. As a result many who did enlist were sent home afterwards because they could serve their country better there than in the ranks. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Then, they were sent home under the volunteer system. Could not they be sent home under this bill by the Executive?

Mr. SHERLEY. The important fact is not that they were sent home under the volunteer system, but they were sent home; and there was that much loss of motion, that much weakness to the nation, that much of delay in preparing to meet the issue that faced England. That is the thing we want to avoid. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. This bill provides the same method of leaving men at home under the volunteer system as the draft system. Where is the difference?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a great deal of difference in practice. It is one of those cases where you have a paper similarity but an actual dissimilarity. You can not take men as volunteers, raise a unit, get a hundred men to go into a company because John Smith is going to officer it, and then have 11 other companies of similar organization, and the 12 formed into a regiment, have them then offer to come into the service, and then undertake to use the selective plan of rejection, for your volunteer system will go to pieces. The very argument you gentlemen have made in favor of the volunteer system is that these men will volunteer if permitted to do it in their way, but they will not volunteer for the Regulars or the National Guard because it is not their way. The moment you put in the right to reject for reasons stated in the bill, then their way of volunteering disappears and their voluntary act itself disappears. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. And, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would suggest to him, in addition to the other matters he enumerated with regard to the volunteer who was sent home, the expense, the enormous expense, the waste of money, in training the man for the battle field and then sending him back to work in the industries.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is quite right. What has happened in Canada? We hear Canada talked of as being an example of the value of the volunteer system. Millions of money have been expended because of skeleton organizations that have to be maintained without the men in them, because the supply was not certain and shifted from day to day. Let us look at another aspect. Last summer I talked with a gentleman high in Canadian public affairs, who the day before had received the news of the death of his boy at the front, and he told me something of the Canadian situation. He said to me, "Mr. SHERLEY, from the Province of Quebec hardly 10,000 men have gone to the front." He was not referring to the city of Quebec, but to the Province of Quebec.

Mr. KAHN. And the city of Montreal, a great city, is in that Province.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but irrespective of that, the statement was made that but a little over 10,000 men at that time had volunteered from the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MASON. And as I understand it, they had no draft there?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; they did not. The gentleman seems to think it is commendable that one part of Canada should let the rest of it bear the burden of Canada. [Applause and laughter.]

To continue, Mr. Chairman, this gentleman with whom I was speaking said to me, "I do not mind my boy having gone to the front; I felt when he left that I should never see him again, and I would not have had him do otherwise than go; but I do feel that some of these other men with sons similarly situated should have their sons bear part of the burden." [Applause.] That is a natural feeling.

I do not know that I can add much to what I have already said. I have spoken very much longer than I anticipated, but may I make just a reference or two to some of the things that were said by the distinguished Speaker of the House? He quoted a number of distinguished soldiers. He quoted Col. Henderson, an officer of the English Army, who wrote a life of Stonewall Jackson, and a very great book it is, a book that I have taken great pleasure in reading. He commended it to us. May I be pardoned the liberty if I commend to him a book to read? I commend to him and to every man here present who has not read it Upton's Military Policy of the United States, and I will ask you not to take the conclusions of the author, but to examine the references that he gives for every statement that he makes and then see—not that the volunteer was not a brave soldier, not that the volunteer would not and did not fight, not that we have not won our wars under the volunteer system—but see the wastefulness of it and see the prolongation of war because of it, and how the inability and the unwillingness of men to throw their minds into the future and prepare and plan along scientific lines has resulted in unnecessary loss of life, in the calling of unnecessary numbers to the colors, and in great loss of time, of money, and of all the things that are desirable in the prosecution and successful termination of a war.

I also believe that the way to judge the future of man is by his past history, and I was struck somewhat by what the gentleman said touching the letters that had passed between Mr. Garrison, when Secretary of War, and the President of the United States. And as he read those letters I could not help but think that the President of the United States has learned by the events that have happened since then, whereas the Speaker of the House refuses to consider those things. I am glad that in the very letter of the President he said he had an open mind. I would to God that all men might keep an open mind and let the events as they have unfolded from day to day and week to week and month to month control their judgments. [Applause.] That was before most of the Mexican border trouble. The President said he was willing to try out the National Guard system, that he was not wedded to it, and he properly rebuked the then Secretary of War for his aspersions upon Members of Congress, and I share in what the distinguished Speaker of the House said touching the tendency of men to criticize Members of this body upon the assumption that they themselves alone know the facts. But it so happens that events in America have proven that the system that we adopted and that we put through by what is known as the Hay law is by no means the ideal system, to speak charitably of it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman think that the National Guard system, as patterned by the Hay bill, is a failure?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it is a glittering success.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentlemen think it is a failure?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it is a complete failure. I do not think any system that gets men into the service is a complete failure; but I am concerned not in what are complete failures but in the relative merit of things, and I hope to get hold of a plan that we will not have to describe in terms of failure, whether complete or partial. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. DENT. The gentleman thinks that the Hay bill is not a success on account of the experience upon the Mexican border?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes. I do not think that all that was due to the National Guard. I think some of it was due to red tape in the War Department, and much was due to the fact that you had two systems that are not fundamentally reconcilable, and undertook to reconcile them, and that they did not work.

Mr. DENT. One further question, in order that we may get the facts correctly. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the first call of the militia issued by the President for the Mexican border was issued prior to the adoption of the Hay law?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is also aware of the fact that the Hay bill did not pass until June 3, 1916, and the last call of the President for the militia was issued June 18, so the Hay bill could not have been in operation very long.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to concede the Hay bill did not get a complete or fair try out, yet it was not sufficiently different in fundamentals from the old National Guard system that they undertook to supersede to make any doubt in my mind as to its ultimate failure. By that I do not mean to say that it did not have value; but I am answering a contention of the Speaker of the House that because the President at that time did not agree with Mr. Garrison, then Secretary of War, we must now agree with the Speaker. I submit to those who are logicians that it is a non sequitur—it does not follow.

Just another word, gentlemen. Much has been said about our proposing that the boys shall do the fighting. Now, it might be a sufficient answer to that statement to say that the bill now before the House provides for a draft of men between the ages of 21 and 40, but men insist that this House will of necessity accept the terms of the Senate bill, and the Speaker, who generally is sure of the courage of the House and of its ability to hold its own, now warns you, gentlemen, that the House will lie down at the bidding of the Senate and accept whatever terms they put in the bill. I submit that this House can not in advance legislate on the theory that what it does it will give up simply because the Senate does something else. [Applause.] The statement was made by the gentleman that he would like to see the editors in the front ranks of the war. I do not want to see any class, because of its being that class, in the front ranks of the war. I should not vote for a particular age because it was a particular age. If men are to be chosen because of a given age, it is not because you want to make that age bear the burden, but it is because the efficiency of men of that age makes its requisite that they make the first sacrifice and that the Nation as a whole can better afford to put those men in that activity in war time than in some other. I repeat again the most dangerous thought men can have in the consideration of this subject is that of the individual. You have got to think of the Nation, and, hard though it may be, the individual can not count as an individual in face of the need and the necessity of the Nation. [Applause.] If we put through the selective draft younger men will go first, not because older men are unwilling to fight, not because older men would want to shunt off their responsibilities. That has not been the history of the world. When you have your volunteer system the married men usually volunteer more than do the unmarried ones. It is not the youngest men in society who furnish the more numerous volunteers.

The reason of the need of young men is because war now involves something more than it did in the old days. Men must get into their minds the fact that you have got absolutely to organize and mobilize the forces of the country. We talk a lot of this, but we do not seem to understand the very words that fall from our lips. War is not now simply a matter of men, but even more of metal. Statements have been made touching the men from my State who fought in the Battle of the Thames and those from my State and others who fought in the Battle of New Orleans; that they were volunteers who picked up their rifles and went to the front. It is true, and all glory to them and their bravery; but does any gentleman believe now, in cold, common-sense deliberation, that the need and conditions of men of that day, touching their ability to fight and win battles, has any relationship to the need and conditions of men to-day in fighting battles? If he does, why, then it is useless to point out to him the events that have been happening from hour to hour and from day to day. The mind of man has never been engaged in so scientific, coordinated an activity as it is now being engaged in on the battle fields of Europe.

Gentlemen, I can only end this rather desultory speech—because I have had no time for written preparation—as I began it by saying that the duty of the citizen is to give at the command of the Nation all that may be asked of him. His duty is to serve or not to serve as a soldier or as a civilian. The highest patriotism does not always exist in going to the front. Sometimes it is shown by a man playing a more humble rôle at home, even though some men may, with a sneer, say that it is a less hazardous rôle; but for a nation it is important that all men should be ready to give as the Nation determines, and it is absolutely essential, if we are to be prepared for what may happen, that we should first determine not the need for the next few weeks or the next six months but, if need be, for the next three or five years, and that our plans should be founded upon command and not upon volition, with the uncertainties of it. God grant that we may have the wisdom and the patriotism to rise to the needs of this hour and see to it that through no shirking of ours, disagreeable as the task may be, do we fail to give to the President and to those who are to carry into the field the colors of America the army and the means which makes it efficient that will bring this war to a short and a glorious end. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think there is one thing we should make very clear and, if possible, hold it in mind from now until the end of this discussion, and that is that the men who are insisting upon the selective system have nothing but reverence and praise for the volunteer, past or present [applause], but that we do object to the system of butchery which destroys the volunteer when he gets in. We are talking about systems and not about patriotism.

The man who has read the story of any war that has been fought by volunteers in his heart bleeds because of the useless death of thousands of those men who came in under that haphazard system, managed by men who were strong of heart but not trained in military affairs, and certainly he does not wish to see the men of America started into this great war under such a system. We are discussing systems and not degrees of patriotism. There is another thing that we had just as well get clearly in our minds. If the volunteer system is right, the men who are for it ought to be willing to bank on it to the end of the war. If we ever intend to use the selective system, it is only fair that we begin with it. [Applause.]

You can never start a volunteer system and switch to the other without bringing about the very condition that you have condemned here for three days. I believe that we should take the men from 21 to 50, so far as I am concerned, and I am not in favor of selecting boys under age. [Applause.] But remember this, that I have a boy who has just turned 16. He is my only boy. He is already in uniform. He can outshoot his instructor now. He has been in khaki since he was a little chap. I will give him the best possible military training I can until the Government says it wants him; and his daddy has already offered to go with him. [Applause.] Any man who is willing to serve does not object to waiting until he is called, and I am rather surprised to hear men on this floor suggest that because a selective system, which means efficiency and wisdom and the use of the least number of men possible rather than the greatest we can crowd in—I am surprised to hear men suggest that there is a man in this Nation who is willing to serve under the volunteer system but is not willing to serve when the Nation calls him by selection.

I want to say another thing. It is popular to jump onto the newspapers when you can find nobody else to "cuss." But the editors of this country are just as patriotic as any other group of men. [Applause.] So far as I am concerned, the letters and telegrams which have come from my district are not those of a propaganda. They are personal letters from men whom I know, men in factories, in stores, in offices, men in high places and in low. And the significant thing of it is that 30 per cent of all the men who have written urging the conscriptive selective system are offering their services to go now. I do not find men who are willing to go objecting to the selective plan. And it is a strange message to send from the floor of this Congress that there could be found enough men in any community who, if the Nation should select those men to serve, could start a riot in opposition to the call of their country.

We are discussing, gentlemen, not the question of patriotism; we are discussing a system or a plan which has been the boast of our Government everywhere except in this. If there is anything we like to prate about it is about efficiency. We talk it everywhere. Who would imagine for one moment that in the mobilization of our industrial life we would leave it to chance and to volunteering? We are providing by our laws for this Government to take under control during this trouble every industry that is necessary, and propose that the Government shall say to that industry what it shall do, where it shall work, and how much it shall deliver for this mighty struggle. Who could think of a man organizing a great industrial plant and permitting a 50 per cent efficiency man to be put in some place where he could make only 25? This plan proposes that the 100 per cent man shall be put at the 100 per cent job, and the 50 per cent man shall be kept at his job. It appeals to common, practical horse sense. When we stop to think of organizing, if organization means anything it means there shall be some directive head; that there shall be some supervising force or mind. In the matter of our manufactures, of transportation, of finance, of supplying the foodstuffs and every other activity in our Nation, we are insisting upon organization and order and direction from a central head, until it comes to the Army, and then it is everybody's business, which means that it is nobody's business.

We should stop to consider this thing, which does not yet seem to have gotten clear home to some men, namely, that we are now at war, and at war with the most powerful military organization this world ever saw. In the second place, we have got to win! [Applause.] It does not matter how we may have felt about it before this declaration of war was made. We are now in. I am not concerned about any other thing than that this Nation shall in the quickest possible time so man and so equip its armies that the most powerful military force on earth which dared strike at Americans shall realize that when she deals with a Republic she is dealing with a people who have ability to organize and to strike as one individual. The selective plan is going through—I am convinced in my mind that we have passed the danger point—but when it shall have been adopted I hope that the gentlemen on the floor of this House who, in a moment, I believe, of unthinking speech, have suggested that the people of their district will resent it will have the courage, and the patriotism as well, to say to the men of those districts, "Let us all get ready, and when the call comes whichever man it happens to take, that man will be ready to go."

We have an illustration right here to-day. There are many heavy hearts amongst the men on the floor of this House. I have been talking with one this afternoon, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. He has three sons, all of military age. They have all offered themselves for service. What an honor! With what pride, even though his heart bleeds, the father should think of the three sons who have offered themselves! [Applause.] But is it not barely possible that under the selective system some of the boys might not be sent on the first draft, and instead of taking, as we heard a gentleman this morning speak of the three boys that stayed at home and the one who went to the front—instead of taking all three in the first instance, there might have been two of the boys left for later service?

Now, gentlemen, here is another thing that we have got to take into consideration: The very word "selection" means order. It means discipline. I think it was the great apostle who said that "All things should be done decently and in order." If there is any one thing that we Americans are accused of loving to do it is to make spread-eagle speeches about our own greatness and our own prowess. If there is not an opportunity to volunteer at present, I would like to know what it is that is going on down here at the Star Building and at other places night after night, with the Marine Band and some of the most eloquent gentlemen that we could find in the Halls of Congress, and in all these other places and cities throughout the country great rallies of every sort, trying to talk men into volunteering.

Everybody but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] understands that there is a call now. Some gentlemen seem not to be able to understand that volunteers are wanted because they have not heard a call, but every man who reads and walks the streets by day or by night knows that every effort has been put forth for weeks past, every energy has been directed, toward getting men into the service by speeches and advertisements at our theaters, at our picture shows, on our billboards, in our newspapers, an the sides of delivery wagons, in the sermons at church on Sunday, and everywhere we are hearing only one thing put to the men of America. If the gentleman has not heard about it, at least some of the fellows who rushed to get married had heard about it and hurried into matrimony in order that they might hide behind the skirts of the girls who were foolish enough to take them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. With all this advertising, does the gentleman know that up to day before yesterday only 102 men had volunteered who reside in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; I know that until day before yesterday only 102 men had volunteered who reside in the District. We all know that, and I am amazed that men should come in here and try to give the impression to the country that there is no opportunity afforded for enlistment. It only cheapens their position when we know that everything that possibly can be done has been done to lead the boys of this country into the service.

Now there is another thing to be said to these men who are talking about robbing the homes. Where else are you going to get these men if it is not out of the homes of America? Most men have homes. I have not heard these orators say anything about the homes that were robbed of the boys of 15 up to 18, amounting to over a million and a half, during the Civil War, and I have not heard them say anything about the high-school boys who at these very hours are being graduated in advance of June, in order that whole classes might go.

Mr. DALE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. DALE of New York. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that in the Borough of Brooklyn, in the city of New York, the high-school boys are now attending school in full uniform?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes. My son is in uniform in the high school. On my desk are letters from parents who are just as patriotic as any haphazard volunteer advocate on this floor, who are asking that the Congressmen shall write to their boys of 16 and 17—mere lads—advising them to stay in school until they shall have finished their education and have come up to something like maturity before they go. I have not heard any of these volunteering fellows talking about those boys. The boys of the high schools are the lads who, when they hear the fife, the drum, the band, and the oratory, in their youthful enthusiasm and their desire for adventure allow their hearts to overcome their judgment. They are the fellows who sign up, and your volunteer system means just what it meant in 1861. It means that officers who are going to raise companies, and who would rather have them filled with boys of school age than not filled at all, will wink at the statements in regard to age, and we will see the same thing we saw then. If there were no other reason for voting for the selective plan, I would vote for it simply to keep those boys out of the Army until they are old enough to go. [Applause.]

Listen to me. When you are talking about "protecting boys," that means that you are to tell them not to do things that they want to do. But your other system leaves it with the boy. Again I say, that if for no other reason than for putting the responsibility of this war and its burdens upon the shoulders of citizens to whom the Government has already said, "You can have all the privileges of citizenship, and because of that you have got to bear the burdens of citizenship," I would vote for the selective plan. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not possible that the reason why the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is against this conscription plan is that he knows that under the volunteer bill the skulkers who have tried to hide themselves behind the skirts of the girls whom they have married would escape service, and that under the compulsory system some of them would have to enlist in behalf of their country? [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; but please do not ask me to inquire why the gentleman from Illinois is opposed to conscription. I have tried for three days to understand his position, but I can not. I can not see how any man who dares to say a word about protecting children can refuse to vote for the only plan that will keep the children out of the Army, namely, the selective plan. [Applause.] There is a vast difference between pure sob stuff and horse sense. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. As I understand the gentleman, if the selective-draft system is adopted he opposes applying it to boys under 21 years of age?

Mr. MEEKER. Absolutely.

Mr. FIELDS. I am glad to know that.

Mr. MEEKER. Absolutely.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I guess the gentleman is aware that the bill as reported by the Army permits——

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, it is not here. I am sick and tired hearing about things that are not here.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It permits the enlistment of volunteers of 18 years in the Regular Army and in the National Guard.

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, I am talking about the selective-draft system.

Mr. FIELDS. If I may interrupt the gentleman further, there is at least that part of the administration plan of which the gentleman does not approve.

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, I am not bothering about the administration plan. I am talking about practical sense. I never followed the administration. I am for this thing, not because the President is for it, but because it is sensible and right, and I am glad he is sensible this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. The gentleman says the President is sensible this time?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. DENT. But the gentleman is not willing to follow the bill just as the President presents it?

Mr. MEEKER. No; I am not. Neither is the gentleman from Alabama. He has not come within a thousand miles of it. I am for one system and the gentleman from Alabama is for a double-geared concern, and it is a mighty difficult problem to ride two horses at the same time when they are going in opposite directions, as the gentleman and some others in this House have already discovered. You can not talk about the glories of the volunteer system and then when that has failed offer as a substitute your conscriptive plan. I would be man enough to stand for one or the other, and I would not pass the buck to the President when he was the President of my own party.

Now, aside from keeping the boys out of the Army, in this selective system the next thing, which is just as essential, is that it will provide for a steady supply of men for the service. We will not depend upon the oratory of the gentleman from Alabama or of the gentleman from Miama, Fla. And by the way, men, if it were not to call up bitter thoughts of the past, I would talk to those who in the past have held back our defense plans. I believe in laying the responsibility where it belongs. I want the men of this House who for the past three years have been opposing us and calling those of us cowards who have been working for a preparedness program that would have given us all the guns and clothing and everything we need—I want those men to understand that the condition we are in to-day lies at their door. [Applause.]

It is a mighty cheap thing for a man to do a thing of that sort, and when he comes to the test try to lay the responsibility somewhere else. We know why we are not prepared. We men here know who it has been in the last four years who have been sowing the seed in opposition to America equipping herself to take care of herself in this world war. As we have now entered at one door, let us not fool ourselves into believing that possibly before we are through we will not be involved with others than that nation against whom war has been declared. The moment we begin to sing ourselves into the belief that we are safe because we are big and lubberly and fat and rich, we have begun to sing our funeral dirge. These active nations of the world, who think only of themselves and of their interests, are going to take advantage of our unpreparedness and of our awkwardness with a gun and of our strange maneuvers in trying to get ready for war. Let us remember that every flounder we make, every misstep that we make, is judged by the enemy against whom we are pitted as evidence that we can not do anything but talk. There could no better and no more effective notice go to the Imperial Government of Germany as to what America will do—not what she says she will do, but what America will do—than the news that America has adopted a practical, sensible plan of supplying 1,000,000, 3,000,000, 20,000,000 trained men, if necessary. [Applause.] If there is anything that appeals to a German mind it is efficiency. That gets clear home to him, for he has got the most efficient fighting force all the way through that the world has ever yet seen. And every awkward step we make, every delay that occurs from this moment on—ah, even in the years gone by, in our experience in Mexico, in our attitude elsewhere—from all these things the world had been led to believe that we would not fight, and the world is not right sure of it yet. We have voted money; we have got more of that than anything else. We float bonds and take interest on the bonds, but, gentlemen, that is not war. There is just one last place where that will be decided, and that is where the armies of the two nations come face to face. When the man on the other side, facing the man on this side, knows that he is a better trained man, that he knows how to use the machinery that he has at hand, and that when he turns loose one of those messengers of death and hell he knows that his aim is deadly, will he respect and fear him as an opponent.

That great soldier of peace, Grant, who was the most merciless warrior America ever produced while he was in a battle, was the first general of the northern army who realized that the only way to stop that war was to make it such a hell of destruction that the men on the other side could not stand it. And that is the way with every war. We talk about the Civil War. We had volunteers on both sides; but oh, to read the story of how those high-spirited men died in swamps and on hillsides and everywhere because of the ignorance of army life is sickening. There sits before me my colleague from St. Louis [Mr. DYER], a veteran of the Spanish War. There are many of them here on this floor, and so far as I can ascertain they are all for the conscriptive plan, so that "George" shall not do it all this time. Let the men who served in that war, many of whom never reached foreign shores at all, tell you what occurred to thousands upon thousands of the boys who intrusted themselves in that volunteer scheme. I tell you, gentlemen, this is a test of the practical organizing sense of the American Congress. Upon the one side there is no greater patriotism than on the other. Nobody has a corner on that. Neither Congressmen nor editors nor preachers nor farmers nor bankers nor anybody else has a monopoly on patriotism, and it rather disgusts me to hear men talking about it. We are here to-day to determine whether we shall announce to the world that America can not only mobilize her industries, her transportation facilities, her money, and her food products, but that at the same time she can do that bigger thing, learn to think and act as under the direction of a single mind. Somewhere in every great struggle, at last, one mind must direct all. We can not have a division of counsel. We must have in this as in any other war—because we are going against a nation that is a solid unit—we must have a body of trained men, hard as steel, who serve because they are called and selected, and not because of some beautiful sentiment which they may have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, any personal views I may have I am willing to yield temporarily to the judgment of those upon whom rests the responsibility of conducting the war. This is not the time for a division of sentiment between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Each one must bend all his energies toward doing his bit in any capacity in which he may be of use and service to his country. [Applause.] Hard, practical common sense, not theories, must be applied in the wise solution of the great problems under consideration. The advice of those who know from bitter experience what we should do and do promptly should not be ignored. I would not regard my opinion as a civilian upon the best method of raising efficient armies in the shortest possible time entitled to serious consideration.

The Government has educated and trained officers of the Army and the Navy upon whom necessarily must rest the responsibility of conducting the war successfully. These officers with great unanimity endeavor to impress upon us what legislative action should be taken in this national emergency. So far as I am concerned I feel bound, basing my official action upon the sole consideration of the best interests of my country, to accept their advice. We must give to them what they say they must have to conduct the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. It is apparent that they regard time a vital element in the premises. We should respond promptly and unitedly, and vigorously sustain and support them during the period of the war. [Applause.]

I have never been in favor, and am not now in favor, of establishing a military oligarchy in this country. But the Nation is at war, the Government is in peril, and we are informed by the Executive, who must be presumed to have complete information before him, that the rights, the liberties, and the freedom of democracies are threatened with destruction in this titanic conflict between democracy and autocracy. Under such circumstances, and in view of the exigencies of the hour, we should not hesitate, in my judgment, to accept the recommendations of those to whom we must intrust in time of war the security and perpetuity of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, in my speech of yesterday I made use of certain figures relative to the ages of volunteers in the Civil War which I stated I had secured from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Saturday, placed there by Senator NELSON. Before making the speech I requested the Legislative Reference Bureau of the Congressional Library to verify, if possible, those figures. I received no report until this afternoon, and I find from the official report a substantial error in the figures that I gave. They gave me some unofficial figures that greatly vary. The one official report that they referred me to is a letter written to Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, on March 20, 1916, and placed by him in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 21,

1916, written by the present Commissioner of Pensions. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, March 20, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CANNON: In compliance with your verbal request of to-day, I have the honor to hand you herewith what is believed to be a correct statement of the relative ages of the men who enlisted in the Union Army during the Civil War.

Trusting that this will serve your purpose, I am,
Very truly, yours,

G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

Age at enlistment—1861–1865.

The records of the office of The Adjutant General, United States Army, show that in the War of the Rebellion the enlisted men consisted as follows:

Those 10 years and under	25
Those 11 years and under	38
Those 12 years and under	225
Those 13 years and under	300
Those 14 years and under	1,523
Those 15 years and under	104,987
Those 16 years and under	231,051
Those 17 years and under	844,891
Those 18 years and under	1,151,438
Those 21 years and under (these two classes make the total number of enlistments)	2,159,798
Those 22 years and over (these two classes make the total number of enlistments)	618,511
Those 25 years and over	46,626
Those 44 years and over	16,071

Total men enlisted 2,778,304. The estimated number of individuals in service is given as 2,213,365.

On that occasion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] took occasion to say:

I had the privilege shortly after I came to Congress as a Member of the House to dine one evening when Gen. Sheridan, Gen. Sherman, Gen. Logan, and quite a number of others were present. I did not do any talking, but I did a good job of listening. I never shall forget that Gen. Sheridan made the statement that if it had not been for the boys under 21 years of age we could not have succeeded in that great struggle.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be accurate in the figures that I give on all occasions. I make this statement for the purpose of correcting the figures given by me yesterday. I want to say, however, that they do not in the least degree affect the force of the argument that I made on yesterday, because under this official report nearly 50 per cent of the volunteers of the Civil War were boys 18 years of age and less, and nearly 80 per cent, according to this report, of the men in the Civil War were boys of the age of 21 years and less.

I understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] made an attack on the figures given by me yesterday. I want to say that the figures I now give under this official report serve every purpose for the argument, and if the gentleman from South Carolina cares to question these figures, his attack must not be upon me; it must not be on Senator NELSON; but he must attack the present Commissioner of Pensions, who made the report, a Democrat appointed by the President of the United States—a Democrat! [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH].

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I can not vote for this bill if its volunteering features are stricken out as proposed. I will vote for it if such features are retained, out of deference to the judgment of the President, assuming that his wishes are correctly reported to us by the war journals and by those of our House leaders who are supposed to speak for him, although some of its other provisions, its colossal magnitude, its suggestions of close foreign cooperation and possible future entanglements, contrary to American ideals and contrary to the thought of many Members of the House when they voted for the declaration of war believing, as they did at the time, it was to be an American war, waged by American volunteer soldiers in defense of American rights ruthlessly invaded by the German Kaiser, as set forth in the President's address. Members of Congress of all parties were willing to trust the management of such a war to the President and his official advisers under American plans, not expecting them to resort to royal ways or royal advice.

Consideration of my own duty, therefore, in regard to the measure has been largely confined to the question of conscription without first giving the citizen, able and willing to serve his country, an opportunity to volunteer in its defense whenever or however it may be attacked. Conscription, without such opportunity, is, in my judgment, unrepublican and un-American. It is a stigma upon patriotism. Its advocates are fundamentally wrong in their basic conceptions. They declaim loudly about universal military service being the duty of every citizen of the State, but they strangely omit to mention the fact that in a Republic the people are the State and that therefore the duty they proclaim is but the ordinary reciprocal obligations of good citizenship, universal and binding alike upon all who would enjoy the blessings of a republican form of government. It is a proud privilege, a freeman's heritage, a most sacredly guarded right of the citizen to voluntarily join his copatriots in defense of their common country when assailed without being conscripted or unjustly classed with the unwilling or unworthy. Conscription implies involuntary servitude by force, a stigma not to be put upon the patriotic citizenship of a Republic excepting only when the volunteer system fails to produce satisfactory results.

This has been the rule of the Republic ever since its foundation. It has brought victory and never defeat to the Stars and Stripes. Its virtue has never heretofore been questioned. But it is now said a great emergency has arisen and that there is no time to study the historic lessons of our own Republic, founded by George Washington and his compeers, and that, therefore, American traditions and ideals must be abandoned and the old, old lights of the world invoked for our own immediate guidance.

A great English general, hero of nine wars and first British officer to meet the German line, according to reports in our war journals, tells us that the volunteer system is a failure. But his viewpoint is from that of a monarchy; he speaks for the citizenship of a Kingdom, not of a Republic. A study of some of the great battles of our Civil War, fought by volunteer soldiers, Federals and Confederates, might tell a different story.

The wheels of progress and thought are to be turned backward toward militarism, backward toward a condition which our modern Secretary of War, in his letter to Chairman DENT, calls a "philosophy." So be it. This bill with its elastic volunteering feature provides for just such supposed contingency, but it places the responsibility where it justly belongs—with the President. The House committee has wisely provided that—

In the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised under the call for volunteers as herein provided the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary.

No limitation as to time is put upon this power of the President. If in his judgment conditions exist warranting it, he has power to so order at any time after volunteering begins. It is left discretionary with him; he is the sole judge, and the bill does not seek to restrain this exercise of executive power.

Early after the election of the President last fall, induced largely by the cry that "he kept us out of war," I resolved, as a matter of patriotic duty, to stand by his administration in so far as conscience would permit. I resolved in my humble way, waiving all conditions not vital to conscience, to follow his leadership. I have tried in this respect to be true to my country's best interest according to the light God has given me.

In this spirit I voted approval of the ill-starred expeditions into Mexico, although not entirely convinced that the Taft policy was wrong in declaring an embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition across the Rio Grande and keeping the American Army encamped on the north bank ready to protect and defend American life and property from any and all assailants.

I voted without question for the President's modest recommendations, as originally made, for increasing our Army, relying, like a majority of American voters, upon his campaign promises.

I voted to sustain him in his German diplomatic letter writing, believing it to be in line with a well-considered policy of avoiding actual rupture with a great nation with which we had been at peace all our national life.

I voted approval of his severance of diplomatic relations, although I felt some hesitation, thinking possibly the necessity might have been avoided by a little stricter adherence to our announced policy of neutrality and the exercise of more real diplomacy in dealing with the German embassy at Washington.

I voted for the authority asked by the President and his advisers to arm American merchant vessels to defend against German submarines, which now on all hands seems to have been a useless waste of patriotism.

I voted for the declaration of war asked for by the President, yielding much of my own judgment to what I believed to be a patriotic duty, and to the necessarily superior knowledge of facts on the part of the President and his legal advisers.

I voted, with confessed misgivings as to where it might lead us but in accordance with my desire to patriotically stand by the President, for the $7,000,000,000 appropriation asked to carry on the war, the immensity of which is staggering and has no parallel in history.

I have expressed my willingness to vote for this bill giving, as it does, to the President an absolute war power greater than that ever conferred upon king or potentate, saving only that over the life and death of the subject, if only the ideals of the Republic and its founders can be preserved and militarism pure and simple be thus avoided in the land of Washington and Lincoln. Conscription, in my judgment, without opportunity given to the citizen to first volunteer in defense of his country, leads directly to militarism. It is the sure precursor of the man on horseback; yea, more in these modern days, it heralds the motor truck with Army supplies overriding the people and crushing out all semblance of liberty in a land where now none but freemen live.

I can not follow the President in this.

I must answer to what seems to me a higher duty.

I criticize no one who differs with me.

I answer only to my own conscience, to my ideas of an overruling Providence, feeling that I am immune from the embittered charge of political self-seeking hurled against Members of the House who do not in this instance support the Army Staff ideas, not expecting again to be a candidate for Congress and having no future earthly ambition except to do my duty as God gives me to see it during this Congress, the most important parliamentary body ever assembled in the history of the world. I shall hope, however, if I live until March 4, 1919, to take home to my constituents a clear conscience and a pair of clean hands. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman is a veteran of the Union Army, is he not?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I am.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not a fact that the experience of the gentleman was that the conscripts were never men who would stand the fire; that conscription was a failure in the Civil War to a very great extent?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I do not know much about this conscript business. We were all volunteers in the company in which I served. I was one of the boys under 17—16, a private—and did all that I could, and I did not concern myself much about who was a conscript. But I will say this: I attend Grand Army reunions, and I mingle with the boys who served in the Civil War and in the War with Spain, and I have never yet been able to find a man who would admit that he was a conscript. [Applause.] They will not do it, and I defy anyone who may speak upon this subject to name one man who served in any army who will admit that he was a conscript.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th day of December, 1915, upon the opening of the Congress of that year, I had the honor to present to this House H. R. 621, which contained the provision authorizing the expenditure of $1,000,000,000 to be divided equally between the Army and the Navy, such money to be expended on the advice of the General Boards of both of these departments by the Secretaries of those departments, the money to be spent purely for equipment, ordnance, and munitions. At that time this measure seemed to be looked upon by this House and by a good part of the people of the country as more or less of a wild proposition. I am simply bringing this matter to the attention of the House at this time for the purpose of pointing out that if this measure had been given the consideration that it was entitled to, we would now find ourselves with sufficient equipment on hand to supply the first increment of the new army that we hope to provide for by this bill that we are now discussing, and we would also have saved to the Government of the United States not less than $300,000,000. I believe every man in this House will concede that there is not a single item that I have mentioned but what could have been purchased in December, 1915, for 30 per cent less than we can purchase these items to-day.

In considering the relative merits of the plans of selective conscription and volunteer service for the raising of an army of the size required for the present emergency, it seems to me that it is well to look at the matter from two principal standpoints. In the first place, which plan is best economically; and, in the second place, which plan will produce the most efficient army in the shortest time.

I am well aware of the fact that in the past the United States has always placed great dependence upon voluntary service. Essentially we are not by nature a military people and we have taken great pride in the fact that our wars have been won by the patriotic few. The fact that wars to-day are not won by the conflict of arms alone is apparent to anyone who has given the matter thought. Behind the bulwark of the Army and the Navy the great industries of the Nation must go on, not only without the slightest curtailment of production but with that production multiplied manyfold by the increased demands of the war. We have absolutely no right to enact into law a method of procedure which does not take fully into consideration the requirements of the war from an industrial standpoint.

The principle of selective draft or conscription rests squarely upon the assumption that the defense of the Nation should be directly in the hands of the citizens who compose it. Not a part of them but all of them. Under the volunteer system the first men to answer the call are those who have already made good in their chosen work, whatever it may be, for they are the kind of men who do things. The ne'er-do-wells, the tramps, the incompetents are the last to go and then usually under a draft. It is easy to conceive of entire industries being forced completely out of business while others go on practically unaffected, due simply to the fact that the employees of the one may be more patriotic than those of the other. The effect upon the industries of the country of voluntary service is a serious matter. We have all of us witnessed within the past few years the struggle made by England to equip and maintain in the field that first little volunteer army. It was only when the English Government had awakened fully to the defects of the volunteer plan and had by selective conscription replaced on the firing line in France the men who were needed at home to carry on the industries of a Government at war that they were able to make a beginning of that industrial and military preparedness which is to-day bearing the fruits of victory.

Selective conscription as advocated by the administration and favored by me, will have absolutely no adverse effect on the manufacturing and farming of the country. It is proposed that all able-bodied men, with certain specific exemptions, between the ages of 19 and 25, shall be made available. It is estimated that this provision will produce 7,000,000. It is also estimated that one-half of these will eventually be rejected for one cause or another, leaving 3,500,000 to select from, and that the number required at any one time shall be proportioned among the congressional districts, of which there are 435. Assuming, in round numbers, that there are an average of 116 election districts in each congressional district, a simple calculation discloses the fact that out of every election district 69 men would be required to produce an ultimate Army after all increments had been added of 3,500,000. In other words, on the first call for 500,000 each election district on an average would be required to furnish from 8 to 9 men.

Not an enormous matter, and as far as the industries of the Nation are concerned, a negligible quantity. Any plan that does not fully consider the effect of the sudden withdrawal from the mills and farms of the men who are absolutely essential to the increased demands of production is totally inadequate to meet the present situation.

Let us look at the question for a moment from the standpoint of the young man whose services will be required. In the first place the plan breathes the spirit of a true democracy. The service must be universal. The son of the rich man and the son of the poor man must drill shoulder to shoulder. Absolutely the only persons exempt will be those not physically fit or those who for some reason are the only support of their parent or parents. Will not this provision by itself eventually serve to crystallize in the minds of the coming generation that in the common defense, class distinction and pride of position have no part whatsoever.

In return for the increased measure of service that a young man will be able to render his country in time of need, he will receive for himself a training and a discipline which will be of inestimable value to him throughout his future life. In proportion as he becomes a better soldier will he become a better citizen. No man can go through a course of military training without coming out of it a better man physically and mentally. He will be subjected to a wise discipline and a thorough education in self-reliance.

When we get down to a consideration of the relative merits of the two plans from the point of the efficiency of the Army to be raised, there is a great deal of valuable information available, if we care to make use of it. In the first place, the principle of selective conscription is the carefully worked-out plan of men who know what they are talking about. It should be obvious that a department of the Government whose duty it is to study the question from every possible angle, with a wealth of data available, is in a position to draw up a proposition that will be sound from a military point of view. I believe that the General Staff has presented through this measure such a proposition.

Even those of us who are not proficient in things military have read history and have seen demonstrated time and again in our own country and in others all of the evils of the volunteer system.

The particularly vicious feature of the amendment providing for the calling out of an army of volunteers is found in the provision that the company commissioned officers may be selected from among the various local contingents. With our eyes fully open to the grave dangers surrounding it, we are preparing to return to a system of political appointments—a system which absolutely destroyed the efficiency of the National Army in the first years of the Civil War.

This war is not for amateurs. It is a serious business. Do I want my sons, do you want your sons to volunteer to serve their country knowing that they must be clothed, fed, maintained, and finally be led into battle by a man who, no matter how high his motives may be, is not fully qualified by all the experience and training possible? I think not. I protest against it. I believe that when our young men go into this war we should be very sure that we have given them every fighting chance to the end they may eventually come back home and take their places in the pursuits of peace. Are we giving them this chance unless we insist that those to whose care they are intrusted are absolutely the best that the world can produce?

Gentlemen, I believe firmly in the principle of selective conscription and shall vote for it. I believe that in the last analysis it will be found the only method that will produce the results that are absolutely essential to the peace and well-being of this Nation. Without our desire we have been forced to take a hand in the shaping of the destinies of the nations of the earth. Fortunate indeed are we that up to the present moment it has not been necessary for us to participate actively in the struggle from which we have stood afar off and watched. Who can foretell the moment we will be called upon? When the time comes they will go. There is no question about that. They always have. Millions will answer, your sons and my sons, whether we want them to or not, untrained, most of them, not properly equipped; and we will watch them go with the full knowledge that we are sending them off to die for their country with the handicap of a mistaken policy hanging like a millstone around their necks.

Is it not time that we approached this question unflinchingly, to the end that by a system of selective conscription we shall give to the youth of this country an opportunity, nay, more than that, a duty to prepare themselves for the great work that they may be called upon to perform? [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY].

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the experience of England in the present war and our own experience in the Civil War, the action of the majority members of the Military Affairs Committee is, to my mind, inconceivable.

They admit there is some doubt as to the success of the voluntary plan they advocate by the insertion of the provision for selective draft as an alternative for voluntary enlistment in the event of the failure of a sufficient number of men to volunteer; or, as they say in their report, in the event the President decides that the force to be raised shall not have been effectually raised and maintained under the call for volunteers they provide for then there shall be conscription. Yet they ask this House to adopt a plan that is clouded in doubt. The gentleman from Alabama, the able and popular chairman of the committee, in his opening speech says he went to the President and Secretary of War with every proposition of compromise trying to bring about unity of action. Is not this another admission that the majority members of the committee were not sure that their plan would produce quick and satisfactory results?

If they had confidence in their own plan they should have stuck to their colors and never raised the banner of compromise. There is a principle involved in this proposition—the principle of justice and fair dealing—and you can not compromise a principle. The gentleman from New York in the minority views submitted by him says the bill makes it necessary to try out the volunteer system or declare it a failure before the draft can be put in operation.

Here we are at war with the greatest military power the world has ever seen and we are asked to resort to an experiment.

Nero fiddles while Rome burns. This is no time for experimenting. Let us adopt a plan that is sure of producing quick and satisfactory results and not dillydally with a problematical system of obtaining an army. Let us profit by the experience of others. It is ridiculous, it is nonsensical not to do so. Why try a plan that has broken down whenever and wherever tried; and why turn down a plan that is prepared and recommended by military experts? I know there is a disposition on the part of a number of Members of this House to resent any suggestions coming from the War and Navy Departments; but for myself I am willing to subordinate my judgment to the combined judgment of men trained in the science of warfare and whose whole lives have been devoted to its study.

If we can not rely on the advice of our military officers, trained and educated at West Point, officers who for bravery, intelligence, and ability are not surpassed by those of any other nation, then we must admit that that great institution of learning is a failure and the millions of dollars we have spent for its maintenance have been spent in vain.

Whilst I am ready and willing to rely on such advice for guidance in matters of this kind, I am not compelled to do so at this time, because abundant testimony has been furnished this House of the ineffectiveness of the volunteer system and the fairness and effectiveness of the selective-draft plan.

The sentiment in favor of the latter plan is stronger than some Members of this House imagine, and it is not confined to the big cities.

The demand for its adoption comes from the rural districts as well; and I know that Members from such districts have been in receipt of hundreds of telegrams and letters in its favor and demanding that they stand back of the President, as all patriotic Americans should now do. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I remember to have heard a lecture by Elbert Hubbard, the famous Philistine, just a week before he sailed on the ill-fated Lusitania, which took him down to a watery grave, the victim of a Prussian torpedo. He described the experiences he had in a New York insane asylum. He said he had gone through the building and over the grounds of the asylum. Out from the buildings, probably a mile, he came upon a little guard about five and a half feet tall in charge of 25 of the huskiest insane inmates he had ever seen in his life. That little fellow was in absolute charge of the 25. Hubbard said he watched him for some time and then went down and spoke to the guard. He said, "I would like to ask you one question. What would you do if these 25 powerful fellows should get together and come at you all at once? You have no weapon, not even a club. What would you do?" He said that the guard looked up at him with a quizzical smile and said, "My friend, you belong here all right. What would I do if these 25 should get together and come at me all at once? Why, if they could get together with anybody or anything they would not be here. That is the trouble with them; that's why they're in an insane asylum."

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it is the test of sanity to be able to get together in such a moment as this. Because I believe that getting together means coordination of all American activities, our military and our industrial as well, I am earnestly in favor of the selective draft as advocated by the President and the War Department. That means we act as a unit. It means that there is a real America, an organized nation. Whittier saw that in days of another crisis, when he said:

> Like warp and woof our destinies are woven fast.
> All linked together like the keys of an organ vast.
> Tear one thread and the web ye mar.
> Break but one of a thousand keys
> And the paining jar
> Through all shall run.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much of the failures of the volunteer system in our own country in every war in which we have been engaged and in England during this war.

Even if the volunteer system would bring to the standards of America the millions of men needed in this gigantic conflict, and even the majority of the Military Affairs Committee, which brings out this bill, does not believe it will do that, it would be a fatal mistake to adopt it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has ably emphasized that fact.

Fully as important in modern warfare as the man in the firing line is the man behind the fighting line. There must be skilled men in the mines and mills and factories and on the farms if the soldier is to be effective at the front.

In fact, the entire Nation must be mobilized, and to accomplish it there must be some power to direct the disposal of the Nation's resources in man power, to say to some, "Go," and they must go, and to others, "Stay," and they must stay. This can only be done if we recognize without quibble and equivocation that every man owes his services to his country, to be used where they are most valuable.

There is one rule of conduct which must be established, and that is that the Government shall compel the individual to relinquish self-will and self-interest when the safety of the Nation demands it.

Here is the fundamental difference between those who advocate the volunteer system and those who adhere to the principle of universal service. It is the age-old struggle between personal liberty and the common welfare, between individual rights and social obligations.

That has been the storm center around which has raged many strenuous conflicts in time of peace. Never has there been an attempt in this Congress to advance social and industrial justice but opponents have declared that such legislation was an interference with the sacred personal liberty of the individual. The public-school system, pure-food laws, railroad regulation, temperance legislation, and many other measures have been denounced as paternalistic and despotic attempts to restrict personal liberty.

But actual conditions in time of peace were the most effective arguments as to the menace contained in the philosophy of stark individualism. Its Ishmael tendency to put every man's hand against his neighbor, with no motive save selfish individual interest, had become a sullen incentive to anarchy and strife. The existence of a jungle warfare was bound to have the result it did have—the triumph of the strong and the crushing of the weak.

In pioneer days the principle of individual, independent action was effective and beneficial. But the changing conditions which transformed the Nation from an agricultural community into a nation of closely organized industries made the ideas of individual liberty as misleading as the guideposts to the German armies in the campaign of 1866 after the Austrians had turned them the wrong way.

We could not have gone much further even in peace on the theory of "every man for himself." The report of the United States Industrial Commission as to the causes of social unrest in this country is an eloquent revelation of the results due to the practical application of that theory. It shows clearly the injustice and inequity which results when personal liberty is put above the common good. I had earnestly hoped that the battle between these opposing ideas would be fought out in times of peace when the entire attention of the Nation could be centered upon them. There can be no doubt as to the end of the contest in favor of the common welfare over private advantage.

But now with the Nation at war the fundamental issues involved, though strange and new in appearance, are the same in reality. We are in the position of a town whose citizens had been called in mass meetings to consider plans for the common welfare. The interests that sought to profit by the exploitation of the many were being shorn of their power to prey. The welfare of the town itself was being put above the rights of a few powerful citizens.

Then suddenly comes the cry of "Fire!" Instantly the meeting is forgotten and the citizens rush to meet this menace. But now the efforts of all are required and each man must perform his duty. If responsibility for fighting the flames is placed upon a few, while the many hold their hands from helping, there will be no town left to benefit and all the measures for the public welfare will be of no avail.

That is the situation in America. The fire of war has endangered our safety and our future existence. Gone is the motto, "Every man for himself," and in its place rises a nobler slogan, "Each for all, all for each, and all together for a common cause."

In fact, the very war in which we are engaged is a struggle between the very elements which were contending for mastery in American life. On one side is the Imperial German Government, the very embodiment of the law of the jungle, the power of the mailed fist. For ourselves we have solemnly chosen to stand on the side of equal opportunity for all, the rights of man called "million," and the obligations of the fraternity of nations.

Now, in such a conflict shall the national defense be regarded as a choice for the individual or a matter of obligation resting upon every citizen alike? Shall we depend upon voluntary enlistment for military service and voluntary contribution of the necessary money, or shall we require both men and money to the full limit of the Nation's need?

To my mind, there can be no choice here. I have advocated measures time and again which recognized the superior claims of the common welfare over personal liberty. I have consistently maintained that this Government, instead of keeping its hands off everything except the preservation of law and order, should put its hands on everything whereby it could best serve the public good.

Now, in the test of war I can not hesitate to follow the same course and speak and vote for the principle of universal service and the obligation that every citizen owes his Nation in time of need.

I have heard gentlemen declaim as to the essential freedom of the volunteer system and the slave character of universal service.

Even if the volunteer system meant really the free choice of every individual, it would have no force against the need of the Nation for varied kinds of service. But does volunteering mean the absence of coercion? Experience proves that it rests upon the most relentless and unreasoning form of coercion possible—public ridicule and vituperation. The brand of cowardice and the stain of recreancy to duty is put upon those who refuse to enlist. White-feather devices are used to shame men into offering their services, and the contemptuous looks of men and women sear the souls of those who may have good reasons for not enlisting. The system makes necessary the arousing of white-hot passions and prejudices. Freedom of speech and press must be limited in such a campaign, since the publication of the truth would hinder recruiting.

The fact is there is less coercion in the determination that all shall recognize the obligation of service, each in his place of duty, than in a system which depends for military service upon the whips and scorns of bitter speech and slurs. The history of volunteering shows more evils of restricted liberty and compulsion than any system of universal service we can establish by law. Others have said here on this floor that the system of universal service is revolutionary and introduces an entirely new principle in American life. On the contrary, the principle is the logical development of the plan laid down by the founders of the Government and the framers of the first laws for the Nation.

The act of May 8, 1792, passed just three years after George Washington was inaugurated President of the United States, was a definite recognition of the principle of universal service, and it continued in force until its repeal some 14 years ago. It provided for the training of all citizens between the age of 18 and 45, and requires each man to provide his own weapons and equipment.

Thomas Jefferson, one of the great believers in democracy, in a letter written in 1813, had the following to say on the subject:

> I think the truth must now be obvious that our people are too happy at home to enter into the regular military service, and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing armies; and that in doing this all must be marshaled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

Washington was a firm believer in universal service and advocated it on many occasions as the only method for adequate national defense.

Mr. Chairman, during this debate gentlemen have said that the universal service idea embodied in the minority report on this bill is essentially militaristic. I would like to ask what militarism is? Is it not a system whose very lifeblood is the domination of the few over the many? Militarism implies a despot ruler and a subject people. It is possible only where government is in the hands of irresponsible power. There can not be militarism in a democracy, a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. Any measures of national defense taken by a people's government are self-imposed. They are based on the principle of self-help, the imposition of military measures upon the people by the people themselves.

German militarism is a menace to world freedom, not because it means universal training and preparedness for defense, not because it requires time and money to guard against sudden peril. It is a peril because it is a weapon in the hands of autocrats who advocate the doctrine that might makes right and that brute force is the only true test of a nation's strength. It proclaims the value of war for war's sake and holds a people as helpless slaves before its tyrannical power.

There need be no fear of the establishment of militarism under the system of universal service. You could not recruit a single regiment in all America to carry out the orders for ruthless warfare, such as has characterized Prussocracy in Belgium and France and on the high seas. No more can you erect a militarism in a nation where the people insist that its army must be its servant and not its master.

Mr. Chairman, it can not be denied that there is widespread opposition to the idea of universal military service among the people of America. But this opposition is not against the principle so much as the injustice of expecting all men to perform equal obligations when they are not accorded equal rights.

This opposition, expressed in bitter attacks upon "conscription," is by no means due to the selfish desire to enjoy rights while the fulfillment of duties is evaded. It does not come from peace-at-any-price pacifists, nor from pro-Germans. It comes from true-blue American citizens, and it demands the most thoughtful determination to remedy the conditions responsible for the feeling.

You can not expect a tremendous desire for sacrifice from those who have been exploited and oppressed until they feel that they have no real stake in the country. When men are consistently denied their rights of protection against rapacious and conscienceless interests, they can not be expected to rush violently to the performance of duties which are supposed to depend upon those rights.

I want to say that there are millions of American citizens who to-day are burning under a sense of injustice in social and industrial relations. Nor is it a captious or fanciful assumption, but one based upon tragic reality.

Since this European conflict began the rising prices of every necessity of life have spelled privation and suffering. The increase in wages have meant nothing, for it was more than eaten up in increased prices. During a period of widely heralded prosperity, when great industrial corporations were declaring dividends of a hundred per cent and more, and the papers were full of the immense profits made from war materials, the workers have endured hunger and hardship. Though the toil never so hard and long, they found a steadily increasing gap between their incomes and the expenditure necessary to maintain themselves and families in any degree of comfort. For two years and more the cost of living has been ascending the scale and the situation in hundreds of thousands of American families has been growing more intolerable.

To fan the flames of discontent these workers have seen their efforts to organize for better protection beaten down brutally by these same prosperous corporations which had been receiving such bountiful gifts from the cornucopia of war-created profits. It is a fundamental right that the labor of this country be permitted to organize for collective action. Without it there can be no equality in the relations of capital and labor, and yet this right has been bludgeoned from hosts of American workers.

Is it any wonder that industrial workers everywhere in America are lukewarm to arguments of universal obligations in a democracy, especially when they see in the foremost rank of the spokesmen for such obligations the very men who have persistently and venomously fought against unionism and every attempt to secure a measure of democracy in industry?

Think of the situation right here in Washington. The head of the Washington Railway & Electric Railway Co. arbitrarily refused to permit organization of the employees of that company. Eleven hundred men were locked out when they insisted upon this right, and strike breakers were imported and put to work in their places. With an iron hand this despot of street car transportation crushed the effort of these men to secure their just demand.

Then in the very midst of such a situation this same man, with a fanfare of publicity, erects a great sign on Pennsylvania Avenue bearing the slogan in flaming words, "The Navy Needs You. America First."

For my part, I can readily understand why every man of the 1,100 employees of this street car company, their dependent ones, and their friends would view that sign with resentment and as a fiery insult.

The same thing is true elsewhere. What more biting sarcasm in very truth than that same cry of "America first" from those who have consistently fought to put Americans last.

That is the kind of injustice that has poisoned the high purpose and in some measure nullified the enthusiasm of the Nation. The profiters from privilege and the preyers upon the poor are in great part responsible for the sincere protests which are being made against universal service. They have brought us to the pass where American ideals seem blurred and American patriotism chilled.

But let it not be understood that these men are disloyal or that they are recreant to duty in any way. They are in fact the most sublimely patient citizens in all America and they are ready and eager to do that beyond which no man should be required to do—match their rights with their duties.

I am confident that the workers of America will support the principle of universal service for the common good. All they ask is that the principle be put into effect in everyday affairs, as well as military service. They are ready to do what they have always done—bear the burdens of fighting America's wars—but they demand a square deal for themselves and families, no more and no less.

Among the very first expressions of loyalty to the Government in this crisis was the declaration of the American Federation of Labor. Here is what that organization said:

We, with the ideals of liberty and justice herein declared as the indispensable basis for national policies, offer our services to our country in every field of activity to defend, safeguard, and preserve the Republic of the United States against its enemies, whosoever they may be, and we call upon our fellow workers and fellow citizens in the holy name of labor, justice, and freedom to devotedly and patriotically give their service.

There can be no more sincere and noble pledge of loyalty than that, and it is the expression of genuine Americanism.

The masses of the American people will gladly accept the principle of universal service as soon as they understand that it is to be universal, without unfair advantages to wealth and influence. They are eternally opposed to a large standing Army in this country, an immense professional organization of mercenary soldiers. They know such an army would be a perpetual threat to labor and that universal service will be assurance as much against terrorism within as without.

The great majority of Americans now are ready for conscription of men if with it goes conscription of wealth. They will not consent to sacrifice themselves in order that a few men may add to their fortunes.

One thing is essential in the conduct of this war. There must be no unjust profits in it to any one. And as the Government takes men and does not borrow them, so it must take money, not borrow it. Excess profits over a small percentage should be conscripted to pay the costs of this war. The peaks of large incomes and fortunes should be conscripted to pay war expenses. Human rights are higher than property rights and common justice demands that if those who are best able to fight are required to fight, those who are best able to pay shall be required to pay.

This conscription of wealth can not, of course be provided for in this measure, but it can and must be in the tax bill which is soon to be reported.

Other measures can make real the principle that equal obligation go hand in hand with equal rights and privileges. Governmental control of every food supply in the country and the elimination of every food shark and speculator will give the inalienable rights of life and liberty to those who feel that at present they are eating the scanty and bitter bread of oppression.

More than that, America must not allow the defenders, raised under this bill, to be assailed and despoiled by the liquor traffic. When these hundreds of thousands of soldiers are gathered in mobilization camps their health, their morale, and their welfare are again a matter of universal obligation. We must see to it that the Government immediately exercises its authority to prohibit the sale of liquor to American soldiers, in uniform or in civilian clothes and in a wide zone around every concentration camp. The mothers who give their boys to the Nation's safety will not hold us guiltless if we permit the wanton defiling of that sacrifice.

Because I believe the principle of universal service is right and just and fair, and because I believe that these other phases of the same principle can be and will be enacted into law, I am unhesitating in my support of the President's plan of a selective draft.

I am convinced that its adoption now will show more effectively than was ever done before the interdependence of the American citizenship.

That relationship exists in peace as in war. And I warn you that an unjust carrying out of that principle, making it refer only to the Army in time of conflict, will be a perilous course.

We are going to compel all to accept and endure sacrifice as a common obligation. Let us face every condition in America to-day in the same "together" spirit, realizing that an injustice done to the poorest, weakest citizen in America is an injustice done to all.

There are only Americans and anti-Americans now. The most dangerous anti-American of all is the man or set of men who will not act and work for the common welfare.

This war in which we have engaged is a noble enterprise. It must not—it shall not—be made a force of reaction and despair for the American people. Rather it must be a new birth of freedom, through which our institutions may be revitalized with new purpose. It must bring us to the day when every citizen shall have equal rights with every other citizen, and equal obligations.

Mr. Chairman, the biggest word in America to-day is "together." As the Commander in Chief of the Army stated in his inspiring message to the American people, "The supreme test of the Nation has come. We must all speak and act and serve together."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN].

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all that has been said in behalf of this bill, I am still of the opinion that since the passage of the war resolution on the 5th of April the sole all-important, vital test to be applied to every war measure is, Will its passage the better fit us to aid our allies and overcome our enemies? Applying that test to the pending bill, I am constrained to follow the trained professional judgment of the War College and the General Staff rather than the untrained amateur judgment of the majority members of the Committee on Military Affairs. If this be acting like a rubber stamp, make the most of it. Prior to the passage of the war resolution it was the right and privilege of every Member of Congress to exercise his individual judgment as to whether or not by any vote of his war could be honorably avoided. I have respect for the man who follows that well-known advice, "Beware of entrance to a quarrel." I lack respect for the man who ignores the balance of it, "but being in, bear't that those opposed may beware of thee."

This Sixty-fifth Congress was called together in extraordinary session, the exact situation was placed before us, and to us was given the choice of submission or resistance to the unlawful acts of Germany. With the patriotic words of the President ringing in our ears and echoing in our hearts—"There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making, we will not choose the path of submission"—this House decided upon the course of resistance by an overwhelming majority.

The question now presented is: Shall we conduct this fight standing up or lying down? As our Commander in Chief, the President has asked us, "To take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war." In denying now to him the Army bill he seeks, the bill his military advisers deem absolutely necessary, are we dedicating "our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have" to the duty that we have undertaken? Great armies of men and vast sums of money will be needed in order that this war may be ended and peace be restored. We have voted the money and we intend to inforce its collection. We might have secured this money by asking voluntary contributions to the war funds, and in time, perhaps, the generous might have responded in sufficient amounts. We wisely took no such chances. We might raise the necessary men by voluntary enlistment, and in time the brave and patriotic might respond in sufficient numbers. But the war is already on, our allies need and are entitled to our help, and no time should now be wasted in doubtful uncertain experiments. The adoption of the policy of conscription by this Congress will assure our military leaders that they have behind them and their military plans the full power and strength of the American Republic. I labor under no illusions as to where our armed forces may be sent. I believe that we will fight this war like men and that our armies, when trained and ready, will be sent where, in the judgment of the General Staff, they may strike the hardest, most effective blows for the restoration and preservation of those American rights which by the Imperial German Government have been ruthlessly and brutally violated.

If any troops go abroad in all probability the Regular Army and the National Guard will be the first to go; and I say to you that it is not right; it is not fair or just to send a single American abroad, a Regular, a National Guardsman, or a Volunteer—not even Col. Roosevelt himself—or anyone else without the knowledge that every other able-bodied man of military age will be compelled to do his bit to sustain that American soldier with food, to equip him with munitions, and to reinforce and relieve him on the firing line and in the field and trenches. Only by the adoption of conscription can this be absolutely assured. If we go at all we should go in force. The more that go the easier will be the task of each individual, the less will be the risk of defeat, and the more speedy and certain the restoration of peace through victory. It has been truly said that God is on the side of the heaviest battalions, and that battles are won by having the greatest number of men on the right spot in the quickest possible time. I have grave doubts of the success of the volunteer system. In this peace-loving commercial age of ours there is altogether too much of the spirit of "Let George do it." In the course of debate it has been said the Volunteers did not fail in 1776, in 1812, in 1861, in 1898. Far be it from me to say anything that would reflect upon their glorious deeds. To them we owe our independence and the integrity of the National Union. Let me say, however, that Gen. Washington pleaded with the Continental Congress time and again for a continuous supply of trained men and for the adoption of a "uniform and well-digested" military policy. Of the militia that was raised from the several Colonies as occasion seemed to require, he said:

If I were required under oath to say whether they were the greater help or hindrance, I should be obliged to say the latter.

In the War of 1812, except upon the sea, there was very little of which to be proud and much to regret. We suffered an unbroken series of humiliations on land because of our untrained militia. Outnumbering the British 2 to 1, we abandoned and surrendered this beautiful city of Washington to the enemy with a total loss of but 12 men. If the North in the beginning of 1861 had had the policy of universal service that war would have been shortened years, thousands of lives spared, and millions of money saved.

In 1898 I recall my own personal experience under the voluntary system. The official United States record shows that Company I of the Third Connecticut mustered into the service of the United States 106 strong. The real facts are these: In May of 1898 we were a company of the maximum peace strength, 68 in all. When the call came in June we marched down the street 26 in number, of whom 9 were recruits enlisted between the day of the call and the day of entrainment; so that out of the original 68, 17 volunteered and 51 stayed at home. The 51 who stayed at home were brave enough, but they considered that there was no necessity for them to go into the United States Volunteer Army. I think it significant indeed that the volunteers of '98 now stand for conscription. [Applause.]

The burden of the national defense in time of war should not be shifted from the shoulders of the many to the shoulders of the patriotic few. Military service in time of war is the highest, greatest duty that every man owes to his country, and every man should pay and perform that duty in whatever manner or capacity the Nation may decide. The military advisors of the President have asked for selected conscription because, in their judgment, this policy will bring together the best and largest number of armed men in the quickest possible time with the least disturbance to our industrial and agricultural systems. The pending bill makes subject to selective draft all men between the ages of 21 and 40 years. I keenly realize that this power of selection is capable of being abused in its administration, but I do not believe that those charged with the enforcement of its provisions will take any advantage or play any favorites. I feel that to exempt at once arbitrarily, without examination, all those between the ages of 25 and 40 would be a grave mistake; but in time of war great power must be given in the trust that it will be wisely and properly exercised. I do know this, however, that a law of conscription is a solemn duty that we owe to the mothers and sisters of those now in the Regular Army and National Guard, many of whom will be between the ages of 18 and 21, in order that they may know that their boys will not be called upon to make all the sacrifices and that every other able-bodied American will be made ready to come to the assistance of their boys should the occasion ever require. To this end and purpose I favor the minority report. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my good friend from Boston, Mr. GALLIVAN, in his speech of yesterday, said that he had heard that many Members of Congress had not seen the ocean.

I am convinced from what I have heard upon the floor of this House since the debate on this bill began that there are some Members of this House who have not heard that the United States has declared war against Germany.

Some Members of this House do not seem to know what war means or what war is.

I would like to state, for the benefit of those, that war is where people get hurt; where they get killed, maimed, disfigured, and sometimes lose their sight, hearing, or some of their limbs.

If any Member of this House thought when we declared war against the greatest military power in the world that we were going to have a lawn fête or a tea party he was seriously mistaken.

If Germany was not now having her attentions directed in other ways we would know what war meant, for German soldiers would now be on our soil. And we could not stop it.

It is no time now to discuss the beauties of the volunteer system or the hardships of the draft system of raising an army.

We have to have an army, and we have to have it quick.

If I was sick, I would consult a doctor.

If I needed legal advice, I would consult a lawyer.

If my soul was troubled, I would see a minister.

If I needed military advice, I would consult a soldier and not a politician.

I presume that the President of the United States consulted expert military advice, and that when he speaks he speaks from the knowledge he has received from that source.

I do not know much of anything about armies or the organization of armies, and as a Member of this House I am going to do what I can to assist in the winning of this war; and the best thing I can do, and the best thing all the Members of this House can do, is to follow our leader, our Commander in Chief, our President. [Applause.]

The German follows the Kaiser; the Frenchman follows his President; in England they have not much confidence in the King, so Lloyd-George acts as leader.

I want to say to those Democrats who are opposing the President now that they were mighty glad to be following him to victory last fall and will be awful glad to follow him again in 1918. He is the biggest man in your party to-day. Take Woodrow Wilson out of the Democratic Party and it would cease to exist.

If you do not have confidence in him as a leader, then select some one else. [Applause on the Republican side.] We must have a leader in this war.

If I were to select some one else, I know of but one man in the United States who would make a better leader than the President, and that is Col. Roosevelt.

And, by the way, I might say that it is my opinion that a volunteer soldier is better than a conscripted one. I believe that 100,000 volunteers under Col. Roosevelt would be better than half a million conscripted men under some leader they did not know. But that is not a question for me to answer. I am asked what is my duty now under the present conditions. Am I to set up my opinion against the opinion of my leader in this war, the President of the United States?

There is no excuse on earth for a Democratic Member of this House not following the President. If it were not for the President, half of you would not be Members of Congress now.

Next year every man now opposing him in this crisis will be out on the stump telling what a great President he is and how he stood up for American rights.

If there is to be any faultfinding with the President, it should come from the Republican side, not the Democratic side.

For instance, I believe that if the President had stood for the rights of American citizens in Mexico we would not now be at war with Germany.

I believe if the President had been firm for American rights and Germany really knew that he would enforce them she would not have violated them.

I believe that the War Department will not permit Col. Roosevelt to organize an army, because they fear him politically.

There are a great many things that the President has done that I would not have done, and there are many things he has left undone that I would have done.

But I am not going to complain now. The people have selected him as their leader.

I dislike the word "conscription" as much as any Member of this House. I dislike to feel that it is necessary to resort to conscription, but we must remember that this is not a very popular war and that it is harder to get volunteers now than it would have been three years ago. People have been reading of the horrors of war, and they hesitate not only to enlist but to permit their boys to enlist.

I disliked to vote for a $7,000,000,000 bond issue.

I disliked to vote for the declaration of war, but I felt that the position taken by the President in our international relations made such a declaration necessary.

I dislike to see our brave boys fill the trenches of France and hope they may never have to go to Europe.

I would rather the President would have confined the enforcement of our rights to those upon the sea.

I dislike this alliance with England, France, and Russia and their allies.

But it was not of my choosing.

We are now at war, and the only way we can win that war is by following our leader and doing as he thinks best, surrounded as he is by the best military experts in the world.

It is no time for arguing, for debating, for hesitating; that hour is past. The hour for action is here.

This country can not win this war without a proper leader, and the only thing for Congress and the country to do is to stand by the leader.

I am not going to vote for this conscription because I like it, but because in this emergency I am going to take the advice of the Commander in Chief.

Throughout this war I shall follow the advice and suggestions of the President, because I know that he is better informed than I am and because he has better opportunities to learn what is the best policy for the country to pursue.

It is no time to argue with the commander when the enemy is here.

It is no time to tie the hands of the President when war is declared.

It is no time to hesitate about ways to be pursued in this war, for some one must have his way.

If I am to choose between my own judgment and the judgment of the President in this crisis, I shall take his judgment, for he is in a much better position to know what to do than I am.

The sooner we stop useless talk and accept the President as our leader and commander the sooner the war will be over and the fewer lives will be sacrificed.

Mr. HILLIARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HILLIARD. If war is declared, then, do you see any reason for Congress at all?

Mr. EMERSON. Congress exercises its legal function. But that is all farce. That is a child's question. We have got to have a leader. We have got to have a commander in chief. It is just as some one said here the other day, you might march a regiment out in front of the enemy, and before you ordered it to fight have a referendum to decide whether it should fight or not. It is just as nonsensical as the question asked.

Mr. HILLIARD. You do not think the Constitution has anything to do with it?

Mr. EMERSON. That is all nonsense. I wish the gentleman would not ask nonsensical questions.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. You talk about standing behind the President. Do you propose to vote for any measure the President will offer here?

Mr. EMERSON. That is a child's question.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. How far are you going?

Mr. EMERSON. That is a child's question. I believe the President of the United States has brains enough to act in this crisis. I opposed him last fall as vigorously as you defended him. I believe he has brains and intelligence enough in this crisis to lead this country. I might select somebody else if I had the selection, but he is the leader. But while he is leader I shall stand behind him. [Applause.]

A member of this House who stands here and says he is standing by the President, when he is opposing suggestions made by the President in the conduct of this war is either jollying himself or has a wonderful imagination.

It seems strange to see the Republican ranking member of this committee [Mr. KAHN] fighting for the President's policies and the Democratic chairman fighting against them, but that is what we must expect.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman know that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the ranking Republican member of the committee, is not supporting the bill drafted by the President but is only criticizing one feature of the bill that the majority reported in?

Mr. EMERSON. I do not think that is a material question. It is an academic one. He is standing by the President better than you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Will you define an academic question?

Mr. EMERSON. A child's question.

Mr. HILLIARD. And which a philosopher can not answer.

Mr. EMERSON. The Republicans will finally have to do all the fighting and will finally have to pay all the expenses of the war. So, it is not unusual to find the Republicans on the Military Affairs Committee standing by the President and the Democratic members opposing.

I sort of agree with the Democratic members. This war should be managed by the Republicans anyway.

Some members of the Military Affairs Committee on the Democratic side are worried because some one might get killed in this war. They throw up their hands in holy horror because some one may get hurt in this war. If I understand what war is, why, war means fight, and fight means some one gets hurt, and some one must do the fighting. The question is, Who shall do the fighting? I believe the President knows best how to conserve the resources of the United States. I believe the President knows best how to conserve our agricultural resources, how to conserve our manufactured resources, and how to conserve our resources of men.

I believe the President knows what is best for this country to do in this crisis, and I shall follow him as a leader.

If we are all to run the war, we might as well prepare to pay a subsidy to Germany now, for we are licked.

If every time the President asks us to do something or to pass some legislation we are to talk and argue and refuse and hold him up, we are defeated now. The sooner we get down to serious business the better it is for us and the better it will be for our country.

I can epitomize all I have said by saying, "Stand by the President." [Applause.] The question is, Who shall do the fighting?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it your judgment that the conscripts—these skulkers and slackers that you propose to get by this system that you are favoring—will fight better than the volunteers? Is that the reason you favor the conscription plan?

Mr. EMERSON. No. I said that one volunteer was as good as two conscripts.

Mr. GORDON. Why do you not favor giving us the volunteers, then?

Mr. EMERSON. I will tell you why. I do not believe you can raise half a million men as volunteers in this country to be sent abroad, and neither do you. This is no baby war. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. But you voted for it, did you not?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; I voted for it, because the President had taken a position before the convening of Congress in extra session that we could not have withdrawn from without dishonor to the country.

Mr. GORDON. You support the President in the war for the reason that you are in favor of this minority report—because the President wanted you to be?

Mr. EMERSON. That is it exactly; because you have got to have a leader and a commander in chief. If Members of Congress were running this war, we know how it would be run. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have more time. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. EMERSON. I do not care to have more time.

Mr. GORDON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You say that one volunteer is worth two conscripts?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; that is my opinion, although I may be wrong.

Mr. GORDON. And your opinion also is that no one will volunteer?

Mr. EMERSON. I did not say that. I said I do not think you can raise an army of half a million men to go to Europe by the volunteer system.

Mr. GORDON. That is simply your opinion?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; that is my opinion.

Mr. GORDON. The majority report provides that if they shall call for volunteers and give those who desire an opportunity to enlist and fail to raise the necessary number and the President finds they can not be raised by volunteer enlistment, he may by an order put this conscription into effect. That would not delay the proceedings, would it?

Mr. EMERSON. That is putting it up to the President.

Mr. GORDON. That is what you are doing.

Mr. EMERSON. No. He puts it up to me.

Mr. GORDON. Do you think the President is competent to decide whether these men can be raised by volunteer enlistment?

Mr. EMERSON. That is not the question. He is the President of the United States, elected by the people.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, yes.

Mr. EMERSON. And if you are going to conduct a successful war and let every Tom, Dick, and Harry here in the House of Representatives suggest the manner in which the war should be carried on, you might as well get ready to pay a subsidy to Germany to-day.

Mr. GORDON. I am not opposed to the war, but the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and not of Congress.

Mr. EMERSON. Oh, that is no man's question. That is a boy's question. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, as I am a new Member of this House and have only 15 minutes, I would not like to be interrupted. I have no prepared speech. I simply have an idea here and there, gathered from the debate of the last three days. I stand for a selective draft.

This is a solemn moment in the history of this Nation. It was a solemn moment to me when I sat on the floor of this House for the first time and heard from the Speaker's desk the magnificent message of the President of the United States, which all of us applauded, and heard him say to you and me what war meant to us if we voted a declaration of war. The President said in unmistakable terms this:

> War will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my judgment, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training.

It was a solemn moment to me, Mr. Chairman, when in the early hours, the gray hours of the morning, after a long debate in this House we voted almost unanimously a declaration of war, and in that declaration we said in unmistakable terms also that we would, as the Congress of this United States, pledge to the President "all the resources of the country."

Did we mean it? We pledged to the President all the resources of the country, and it seems to me it comes with ill grace from any Member who voted that declaration of war to say to-day that he is going to keep back a part of the price. [Applause.]

What are the resources of this country? Its most precious resources are its citizen soldiers from the age of 21 to 40. Are we going to keep back part of them? Are we going to say to the President, "Of these resources you can have only those that volunteer"? Are you going to say, "We thought the President was going to issue a call for those who could go or stay, just as they pleased"?

Some one has said that only 1 out of 10 would enlist voluntarily. Under selective conscription the 10 are at the call of the President. Which are we going to take? Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, with all deference to the older Members of this body, that only here in Congress is there much of a difference of opinion as to what we should do. Among our constituents, out in our great beloved Nation everywhere, people are standing by the President for this conscription, this draft, and not for volunteers. The legislatures that have met since this message came before the country without an exception have stood by the President.

The legislature of my own State on March 8 declared by every vote in that legislature to stand by the President for conscription. The action of Maine was followed by the Legislature of New Jersey on March 19, by the Legislature of Rhode Island March 20, by the Legislature of New Hampshire March 22, by Massachusetts March 29, Connecticut March 30, Minnesota April 3, and of Texas April 23. Every legislature that has had the opportunity to vote has stood by the President. All the governors of the States, with one exception, stand with the President to-day. The Daughters of the American Revolution, speaking for the women of the land, the other day in this great city declared unanimously to stand by the President. The presidents and the educators of our colleges in the Nation are all with the President.

Three hundred and eighty-three mayors of cities in our land of over 5,000 inhabitants are with the President to-day. The Boston Transcript, the most reliable newspaper in this country, conservative and independent, says that 93 per cent of the press of the country is with the President and for conscription. You may make a little light of the press of the Nation, but I say to you that this Congress ought to pay some attention to the great press of this country.

The British Cabinet are for conscription, the French Cabinet are for conscription, the American Cabinet are for conscription. Every military man whose opinion can be obtained stands to-day with the President for conscription.

Among the great former Secretaries of War is Henry L. Stimson of New York. He said the other day:

From the standpoint of our military history there is no more clearly established fact than the failure of the volunteer system. The United States have not yet warred with a first-class power free to devote its entire attention to them. Nevertheless, in our wars the system has regularly broken down. The leading States of Massachusetts and Virginia were forced to resort to the draft by 1777, or only two years after the opening of the Revolution. During the course of that war, in spite of such sporadic efforts by different States, the patriot armies shrunk in number from 89,000 in 1776 to 29,000 in 1781, and our cause was only saved from failure by the timely intervention of the French fleet and army. In 1812 the volunteer system broke down in so many and varied ways as to make that war the most conspicuous example in our history of how not to carry on military operations. During the Civil War both sides were forced to use the draft—the South within a year and the North shortly thereafter. Even in our little War with Spain the full quota of volunteers called for by the President was never obtained. The failure last summer of recruits to appear when called for by the President to meet a national emergency, although over 1,000,000 citizens were parading and shouting themselves hoarse for preparedness, is merely the latest incident of what has been a practically unbroken record in our history.

Gen. Leonard Wood, our greatest military commander to-day, said, April 17:

A voluntary service, however delightful in theory, is ridiculous in practice. It would be a noble thing if every man rushed to the colors, but every man doesn't. The universal system treats all alike—rich or poor, native born or newcomer. So get behind the administration and you'll get rid of a lot of loose talk about war. Only 6,000 men have been enlisted in two weeks, and I leave it to you to estimate how long it will take to get an army of 1,000,000 men. Many men are willing, but they are not willing to do the work of "slackers." Compulsory service will cut out the "slackers"; so get into the fight and make up your minds that so long as there is a sun in Heaven you will never be caught in this fix again.

In this Nation we have 20,000,000 men between 21 and 40 for military service. Out of these under the selective-draft bill you select what you want. Under the volunteer bill men can come or stay at home just as they please. I believe that this Congress should vote to stand by the President of the United States, stand by the War Department, stand by the experience of the world in this matter, and give to the President all the power he needs. If you do that, what will happen? We will take our place once more among the great nations of the world. Then there will come to us all the power we need. Out of the 20,000,000 men from whom to select we will obtain an Army that will go from victory to victory; they will be selected—

From northern forest, from the sun-kissed shore
Of dreamy southland, from the western plain,
From city, town, and hamlet, as of yore,
The answer sounds, "We come—we come—again,
The kin of all who made our country free,
To light the world, the sons of blue and gray,
With all we have and are and wish to be.
Our country calls; we come, we come to-day
To man the ships that strain their leashes taut,
Impatient for the word to cross the wave
Where Jones and Farragut and Dewey fought,
To send the hidden death to hidden grave,
To fill the ranks, to answer every call,
To do or die where'er the flag may lead.
Another million, if a million fall,
And freemen all—ten million if you need!
To show to other men that we are men,
Willing to meet our God in death's mad dance,
To bear the starry flag, unsoiled, again
Unshamed beside the starry soul of France."
Of England, roused and grim, our motherland,
With hand unswerving on the furrowing plow,
No backward look, no trembling of the hand?
(We ne'er were prouder of our birth than now.)
Of Russia, born anew and stretching hands
Across the sea in freedom's brotherhood?
Of Italy, who left her sunny lands
To fight through snow and avalanche and flood?
Of bleeding Belgium, nursing still the spark
Of sacred fire in her stricken breast?
Swift must our answer be to war's alarms.
Our place is in the van upon the long
Red battle line, where valor, cleaned by fires,
Beckons all free men. There with flag unfurled
We'll show the world we're worthy of our sires
Until we blot forever from the world
This hideous foe of light. The night is o'er!
Our path is straight and shining is the goal!
Awake! America, from shore to shore,
And look not back! Thank God, we've found our soul!

[Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS].

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the public at least understand that the ethics of the House expect new Members to observe, for a season, certain reserve and self-restraint, and I confess a diffidence I feel in attempting to address you would in itself impose modesty in keeping with the rule.

But the new membership of this body represents 20,000,000 of our people, and the questions involved in the pending bill are so momentous and their correct solution will have such a far-reaching influence on the future development of the spiritual and physical life and well-being of our people, and the perpetuity of our national existence, that I am impelled to say a few words on the subject and give the reasons I have already assigned as my justification.

I am convinced that the volunteer method should be adopted in recruiting the armed forces we are seeking to enlist at this time to carry on the war. That this method should be our practice until it is apparent that an insufficient number of men are coming forward to carry on the war. In spite of all that is being put forward under the guise of reason to justify "conscription," a real scrutiny of our military history, a search for the profound lessons it has to teach us, a due regard for the love of country which we are all mightily interested in maintaining and bequeathing to posterity as a priceless gift of our day, the future progressive growth of our democracy and the desire to have the ideals and aspirations of free government dominate the civilized world all point to the one irresistible conclusion that we should perpetuate the volunteer system until there is at least some slight indication that the method might be found inadequate. I submit that neither during the present war nor in any of our wars in the past was the volunteer system found unsuitable for the purposes sought to be accomplished. Whatever weaknesses may have existed in our armed forces are not properly chargeable to this method of recruiting. The other and real reasons are readily discernible if we will not blindly close our eyes.

Every shot that was fired in the cause of liberty and for the right of representation at Lexington and Concord came from the musket of a volunteer. The weaknesses that became apparent in the subsequent period of that initial campaign of the American Revolution can not be laid at the door of the patriotic spirit that prompted our forefathers to take up arms; the volunteer method of enlistment never has been, nor will it at any time, be found to be responsible for the lack of arms and supplies, nor for the absence of an opportunity to train and be trained in military maneuvers and tactics, while conscription at once destroys the ideals and enervates the spirit of the freemen who should and will under our democracy protect its life and institutions. I will not be counted among those who, in advocating the "draft," impliedly admit that there is such a lack of national motive in our present war that we must resort to "conscription" in order that we may secure the man power necessary to defend our shores and bring to fruition our aims and aspirations in this contest.

During the War of the Rebellion the number of volunteers under arms prior to the institution of the draft was somewhat in excess of 600,000, and thereafter almost 1,370,000 men were enlisted, but the fact is recorded in our history that, notwithstanding the existence of the conscription act, more than 1,000,000 of the men recruited while it was on the statute books were volunteers, and, at that, less than 3 per cent of the total number of men recruited for the Army in this war were personally drafted. The history of recruiting during this period of the existence of the Republic is in itself a refutation of every pretended argument that is being put forth in advocacy of conscription. [Applause.]

I am convinced that what little sentiment there is among the masses of our people against this measure is based upon a misconception that is being given vitality by the propaganda exploiting conscription in the press. Before the declaration of war there was, and still is, a widespread belief in a system of universal military training which would, in the opinion of its advocates, be efficacious in preventing us from either entering into war for purposes of aggression, and in the event we were wantonly attacked it would be an effective instrumentality of defense. The propagandists are seeking to create the impression that such a system of universal training and conscription to meet the present situation are one and the same.

There is no basis for such an assertion or assumption, and it can not be shown more clearly than in the statement of Secretary of War Baker, in the official report of the hearings held by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, on April 7, 1917, but the pronounced belief in a universal system of military training is being used to secure favor for conscription. I want to assert that in raising an army, either by volunteering or by conscription, neither plan has an advantage over the other in regard to the military qualifications of the personnel of the proposed armies. Under either system the army would stand on an equal footing in being composed of civilians to be developed into soldiers, but certainly the volunteer system would have the advantage of being composed of patriotic men who enlisted with the highest motives and the single thought of serving their country, which would certainly give it a forcefulness and strength of character above one composed of conscripted men. I sincerely believe in a volunteer system, also, because, in accordance with the ideals we have sought to develop and inculcate in almost a century and a half of national life, a conscript is without honor, and this stigma would doubtless attach to men of splendid character who would be compelled to enter service by a conscriptive measure.

True, it is argued by the advocates of selective conscription, that patriotic men may even now volunteer in the Regular Army, but as that Army to this time has been composed of scattered units, who have not been impelled by the patriotism that comes with national danger to sever home ties, surrender personal opportunities and sacrifice their aspirations, and who have enlisted when war was only a remote possibility, the distinctive honor of volunteering for this war would be lost to such as enlisted in the Regular Army, and, furthermore, would not be as congenial and inspiring as enlisting in a company and regiment from their own towns and communities, by which local enlistment they would hope to bring honor to their communities.

The element of the press that is advocating conscription is laying great emphasis on the selective idea as a feature of the proposed military establishment. Every word that has been written, and every syllable that may be uttered in favor of the purposes expressed by this word, as used in this legislation, is applicable to both the volunteer and conscriptive systems created by the law we have under consideration. For even a casual examination of the bill before us will disclose that the selective principle is made equally a part of both the volunteer and conscriptive systems and in any event should be retained in principle in the new organization that will be established by its provisions. Further, the proposed volunteer method has the advantage of affording the means of supplying the men required for our armed forces at a much earlier day than the conscriptive system. It can be made to operate and it is the expectation of its advocates that it will be in operation during the four months' period that it is conceded will be required as the registration period under the conscription system. In other words, during the four months following the enactment of this law not a single conscript will be enrolled, but the volunteer method will be bringing hundreds of thousands of loyal patriotic Americans to the colors. When registration, which is an essential step under the conscriptive system, is an accomplished fact, if the volunteer system is supplying an insufficient number of men of the right quality, its operation can be at once terminated, and the right to conscript becomes by this very bill a power of the Government. Gentlemen, I submit to you in all candor, which system will care for the immediate national requirements? Can any valid reason be advanced why we should forego this advantage of enrolling immediately the thousands of men who can only be obtained by the volunteer system proposed in this bill and before the conscriptive method can become operative?

The argument that selective conscription would reach the sons of rich men that otherwise might escape service is, I believe, without justification, and is probably used by some to arouse prejudice in support of the conscriptive proposition. In our own war and in the present war in England it has been clearly demonstrated that this class has presented itself early for enlistment, and has suffered to at least as great an extent as any of the other elements in the country. [Applause.] Let us be frank and appeal to no prejudice. Patriotism is not the exclusive heritage of either the rich or the poor; it is a quality of mind and heart common to our people in all positions in life.

Let us look at a more recent example of the workings of the voluntary system. At the outbreak of the Spanish-American War there was such a wave of patriotism and demand on the military authorities for permission to enlist that there was much ill feeling and disappointment among thousands who were turned away. I may say, modestly, that with a whole company of boys who resided in my home community I was of this number, and I know of thousands of men in Indiana who made earnest efforts to enlist and were denied the privilege. Would anyone assert on the floor of this House that our citizens are not as loyal to-day, and when called would not answer as promptly and heartily now, as at that time? I am disposed to resent the implication which the conscriptive measure would awaken, that loyalty is so dead with us, as a people, that force must be employed to obtain an army at the beginning of this war. Are we not, as a people, as loyal as the Canadians, Australians, and English? The first two named countries have not to this day resorted to conscription, and Canada, with a population of but 8,000,000, has raised a volunteer army of 400,000 men; Australia, with a population of 5,000,000, has enlisted an army, without compulsion, of over 260,000; and Great Britain, with a population of 41,000,000, recruited a volunteer force of 5,000,000 men, and only resorted to conscription two years after the war began. Compulsion has not as yet been adopted in Ireland, but Erin has furnished more recruits in proportion to population than any part of the United Kingdom. No one would seriously contend that the expeditionary army which England sent to French soil in the early days of the struggle was weak because of the method by which it was recruited. It was weak only because its numbers were small compared with the forces they were compelled to meet. English military weakness in the early days of the war can not justly be made a count against the volunteer method of enlistment, but was in fact the weakness that is inherent in any system that embodies no policy of military training and education for youth, together with practically a total absence of a marshaling of the industrial and productive resources of the country for equipping and maintaining a large armed force on a war footing.

Every man in our Regular Army, from the private to the highest staff or line officer, is a volunteer, and is there a man within the hearing of my voice who believes or would assert that it is not as efficient in proportion to its numerical strength as we have a right to demand and expect, merely because each human being in it of his own free will sought membership in its various units?

Are not our hundred million people as loyal to our country as the people of the United Kingdom are to their Government? Has anyone the temerity to claim that the volunteer system will not bring to the colors as many men as can be used under the provisions of this bill in less time than our Government can prepare to train and care for them? [Applause.]

No doubt conscription will and should come, but we can not afford to have it adopted at the inception of this war. Do not put the brand of "conscript" on the patriotic young men of the Nation. I implore you do not put this system on the loyal men of Indiana. I know that the adjutant general of my State, under the direction of our governor, at the first breath of war, permitted the organization of companies and regiments to be started by volunteers, but recruiting was discontinued at the first suggestion of "the draft." I can assure you, my colleagues, that if you will but remove the ban imposed by the proposed conscription, Indiana will furnish her quota of the army it is proposed to recruit by this bill as soon as the mustering officers can reach the State. Every man will be animated by such love of country, ready to forego the pursuits of civil life in the protection and upholding of his country's cause, that we will have the army of a real democracy—an army imbued with the ideals that are basic in our Government, believing in the righteousness and justness of our cause, and worthy of battling to uphold and maintain the honor, aims, and aspirations of a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] 20 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have a certain amount that I want to say on this subject, and a limited time in which to say it, I hope I may proceed without interruption.

Mr. Chairman, on the 5th day of April last this House, by a vote of 373 to 50, recognized the existence of a state of war with Germany and stated that "to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States." This resolution, having had the approval of both Houses of this Congress and the Chief Executive, is to-day the voice of the American people expressed in the only way our people can speak.

Having in this solemn manner pledged our resources, we are setting about to try to make our actions harmonize with our words. We have recognized a state of war with the strongest military power on earth, a people who, under the guidance of the Bismarckian theory of "blood and iron," for 40 years have been perfecting a military system that has to-day evolved the greatest military machine known in the history of the world. If it were not such a mighty fighting machine it would long since have been destroyed by the efforts that have been made to wreck it. The world sees for the first time a nation of 70,000,000 people completely mobilized for war. We have deliberately taken up the gage of battle that the Government of this nation has thrown down. In so doing we justify our action on the theory that we are forced to do this in defense of the rights and liberties of our people and in the holy cause of humanity and justice. We contend that we have exhausted every resource of arbitration and diplomacy and solemnly assert to the world that this thing we do we do because there is no other alternative, and lest if we do not now and here take up the sword our people now and in generations to come will suffer the loss of some of their essential liberties. We say also that there is abroad a disturber of the peace of the nations that it is our duty to help to suppress. Avowing these laudable and elevating motives for our actions, we have departed from our peaceful vocations and appealed to the God of our fathers for victory to our arms. Our declaration has also arrayed or will array against us the armies of three other nations.

It seems to me that in consideration of this matter we ought to take such steps as would enable us to cope with our antagonists, without regard to those who may be fighting side by side with us. We have no allies, so called. We should exercise the greatest care to avoid entangling alliances that would for all time ensnare us in the international maze of Europe and Asia. We should not enter such compacts that we can not easily recede therefrom at the close of the war. I am in favor of taking any advantage that may be of the fact that other nations are also fighting our antagonists. But this is our war. We went into it because we had a just cause. We will wage this war until that cause be removed and we be secured in all our rights as a free people. When we have fought our war and attained our purposes, in my judgment, we are done. Of course, a decent regard for the safety of our friends, who have fought side by side with us, and the continuing peace of the world may require us to continue the struggle for a time even after our own objects are attained. Therefore we ought to, in a measure, disregard the conditions that exist as to other nations and measure our own strength with that of our antagonists. Conditions may quickly arise that will throw us on our own resources. If the new Government of Russia quickly makes peace with the central powers, the conditions on the west front might be so changed that peace would be forced on the entente powers unless they received immediate and substantial help from us. We can not expect some one else to fight our battles for us. This is not an imitation war. Conditions may arise where it will require every ounce of energy we have as a people to protect ourselves, irrespective of waging an aggressive war against an enemy 3,000 miles away. We should not expect to declare war and calmly sit down and take our time to it. Wars will not conduct themselves.

The President of the United States has been intrusted by our people with high power in this emergency. He and his advisers have means and facilities for gathering information as to the conditions, information that is not available, in large part, to this body and to the people. We are not well and intimately advised of the exact economic, financial, and physical conditions of the nations at war with Europe. The President is. We act according to our lights only. He acts with those lights and many others. He has no doubt given the matters now in consideration by this House deep thought. As a result of this, he recommends to the Congress a course of action as to the raising of an army and solemnly states that, in his judgment, to adopt any other might end in inefficiency and disaster. Unless I know some good reason to the contrary I am willing to accept his judgment.

In this Nation we have three great resources: Money, men, and food. If we are wise we will conserve all three in any way possible. We must not lose sight of the fact that war is but a transitory diversion of our national life, but that when peace is again resumed our principal business in life recommences. For the period of the war I believe I am right in saying that this people ought to bend all its energies to carrying on the war for three reasons: First, to end the war successfully. Second, to end the war quickly. Third, to conserve our resources in every possible way.

During the period of this war, for general efficiency, profit making should cease. If the war is worth making, then it follows that the war should be waged as nearly on a cost basis as is possible. If there is any one thing the American people ought to do it is to see that some fortunate class or classes of our people are not allowed to fatten at the expense of those who patriotically are bearing the burdens of the war. In the making of munitions the owner and the laborer should alike contribute, the one from his labor and the other from his capital, to the common defense and welfare. The cost of living, now mounting sky high, largely as a result of speculation, ought to be controlled and regulated by the most stringent and far-reaching legislation during this emergency. This war, undertaken in what we protest to be a holy cause, must not be the occasion of the rich growing richer and the poor growing poorer. Let us fight our fight side by side; let us for a while forget our profits. In this emergency he who seizes the occasion to exact great profits from his factories, he who takes advantage of material wants to compel greater return for his labor, he who seizes the food of the people and demands inordinate profits is just as disloyal as the man who shirks and evades the service in the field or gives assistance to the enemy. [Applause.] And, furthermore, we should so vote on this matter as to minimize, as much as possible, the creation of such unnecessary conditions.

We have, by an almost unanimous vote of this House, contributed an immense sum for the carrying on of the war. We did it freely and willingly, and we will give as much more, if need be.

The greatest question that confronts us now, it seems to me, is how we may best conserve our human resources. We are all agreed that for six months, at least, it will not be possible for us to place any force of any importance on the battle line in France. We are also all agreed that if the allied troops are to carry on the war, and to have any chance of success, we must keep a lane open across the sea and keep them supplied with munitions, and especially with food.

The flow of foodstuffs across the sea has taxed our strength exceedingly during the last year, even when we were at peace. If this food supply stops, the allied nations can not keep the field. In addition to this burden we are now about to raise an army of about 2,000,000 men. These men will be drawn from the ranks of producers, and we immediately will have to feed them. Added to this is a very noticeable failure in crop prospects for the coming year. An inclement season has largely killed the winter wheat in some localities. There is, and has been for many years throughout the great Middle West, the mighty storehouse of the Mississippi Valley, a great scarcity of farm labor. Men have drifted into the cities, attracted by the conditions there, and the farms have been denuded. Examine the census reports and you will find that in the 10 years from 1900 to 1910 the population of many of the rural counties of the West decreased while the urban localities largely increased. Men are getting $50 a month in my locality for farm labor, and at that you can not get them. The problem of keeping the farms producing is one of most stupendous moment.

I believe in raising this new army we ought to conserve our human resources. We ought to conduct this war with the least expenditure of money, and especially of human life, possible.

I can not see, from all the light I have been able to get on the subject, how we can do this by the adoption of a volunteer system of raising an army. I appreciate the claims that are made by those who point with pride to our record in former wars when our people marched to the colors to defend the land. These are glorious traditions and are calculated to inspire us to patriotic thought and action. Through the smoke of battle, on many a field of glory, the American volunteer has proved himself the peer of any soldier in the world. I consider it my greatest pride of memory that I sprung from the loins of one of the men of '61, who, side by side with his comrades, wore the blue and laughed at pain and saw the bayonet's flash and heard the call to arms. [Applause.]

But, irrespective of this, experience has taught us that many thousands of lives of the best youth of our land have been lost needlessly by disease and inefficiency in our various wars of the past. There are men now here in this House, as I have heard them state, who felt their hearts torn with pity in 1898 when our boys died in the camps of Georgia and Florida. The same thing was true in 1861 and in 1812 and in 1776. The volunteer system is not efficient; it is wasteful of the one thing we ought to conserve above all things, human life. For example, in the War with Spain, in the volunteers, there were 3,729 deaths from disease and 190 killed in action and 78 died of wounds.

Two plans of raising this army are suggested: (1) That it be raised by a volunteer system, if possible, and if not, by selective draft by Executive order; (2) by selective draft. Either system includes the element of selective draft, but in the one Congress says, "let the President do it," and in the other it says, "we will do it ourselves."

If a call is issued for 500,000 volunteers under the act of April 25, 1914, there can be no choice of applicants, except as to physical fitness. I can find nothing in that bill to authorize a selection. Therefore a half million men will indiscriminately come from the country, out of lives of useful production, into the consuming class of the Army.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I stated at the beginning of my remarks that as I had only 20 minutes I preferred not to be interrupted.

I have heard much discussion on the question of the elements of our national life from which these will be recruited. It has been said to me that they will come mostly from the young men and adventurous and nonproducing classes of our people. I do not agree with this. Such is not the case in my country. If you will pardon a personal allusion, in my little town of 2,500 inhabitants we have already sent into the service 120 young men, and they are the cream of the town, students, farmer boys; we are giving the best we have. In 1861 our country was denuded of its best young blood. The same was, in a limited degree, true in 1898. I tell you that in my judgment a call for volunteers will take the best blood of the land, the blood that wisdom and discretion counsel ought to be conserved as much as possible. It ought to bear its share of the burden, but no more. Our colleges and schools are boiling with patriotic fervor. The young men from the farms are ready and anxious to go, and will go when the call comes. It will be remembered that enlistment in the Regular Army or federalized National Guard does not appeal to the ordinary young man as the trumpet call of the President's call for volunteers would.

Let us be sensible about this matter. Let us conserve our vital forces. A friend of mine, in this House, said to me the other day: "Wars are expensive and have to be paid for, and the only legal tender is blood of brave men." It is true, and we ought at least to make the price as low as possible.

If we permit our young, strong element to go from the forge and the school and the farm indiscriminately, we cripple ourselves in our producing power. It may not appeal to the imagination so much, but the man who follows the plow and makes the earth produce and the man who makes the plowshare in the factory may be worth a hundred soldiers in the field. My district is in what is called the military tract of Illinois, I believe the richest tract of farm land in the world. I know what will happen if the call for volunteers comes—these farmer boys will go at the call of their country, and thousands of acres will not produce the foodstuffs we shall so much need before this coming winter is over. A great Government arsenal is in my district, where men toil night and day to make the things our fighting men need. If the call for volunteers comes, do you not think many of these men will go? The red blood of our fathers is in their veins, and with patriotic zeal they will hear the call of their country. We do not, as has been said, raise our taxes by voluntary subscription. Our institutions secure us the right to trial, when accused of crime, by a jury of our peers. When our time comes, we perform our service on juries by lot, unless we have some reasonable excuse that a fair court will accept. We all ought to bear the burdens of government equally. It might be different if there were in this country a governing class and a serving class. But here, thank God, the people rule. Here we have organized ourselves together and have formed a Government for the single purpose of protecting ourselves in our liberties and rights. Our Government has no other functions. Therefore, as we, the people, are the Government, we must each equally maintain the Government. There is no fair way to do this except by equal contributions of our money and time and service, according to our ability.

We have decided now that the necessary defense of our liberties and rights requires war. War requires time and money and service. The only question now is: What is my fair share of the burden—is it a part of my money or is it my time or my service? By a fair method this should be ascertained, and, whatever it is, we should give.

But it is said that to preserve American traditions we should first try the volunteer system, and if it fails, let the President draft men. I believe men will volunteer if such a call be made, but every farm and industry in the country will be crippled by it, and this we can not afford to do. But if it does fail, and then the draft is used, immediately you create two classes, the volunteer and the slacker who was forced to go. In either case, the experiment has not worked well.

If we start on selective conscription in the beginning, the burdens will rest equally on all of us. By local tribunals, having full knowledge of local conditions, the availability of each selected man may be passed upon and that man be placed where he will do the most good, and if the judgment is that he stay on the farm or in the factory, then the stigma of slacker will not be applied to him. By this means, production will not be crippled, and the farms will yield their golden store; by this means each man will fit in the place where he can do the most good, and the rule of conservation of our human and vital forces will obtain. Any other method is wasteful and ought not to be thought of.

But the greatest result that will follow the adoption of a selective-draft system immediately by this people will be the effect it will produce on our antagonists. Do you not believe that the spectacle of this great Nation girding on its armor and forgetting nothing, the vision of a people of 100,000,000 assembling and mobilizing all its energies in a careful and efficient and thorough manner, will impress those with whom we are to do battle with the intensity of our purposes to pursue our way until victory shall be attained? And when the war is ended, and the world has gone back to its ways of peace, do you not think that the national marauder that next sets about to disturb our national peace will have an indelible memory of a stalwart Nation, terrible when aroused and when its cause is just, of America mighty and America efficient?

I listened with great interest to two wonderful arguments this afternoon, one by the gentleman from Missouri, our respected Speaker, and the other by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. They were addresses such as few of us will ever listen to again. But after I had listened to them I tried to analyze them, and the determination I came to was that one appealed to the sympathy and the other to the reason. And this, I believe, is the reason for the great difference in opinion here. If we go by our sentiments the volunteer system is the system that appeals to our minds, while our reason tells us something else. And I could not help thinking as I listened to the Speaker's wonderful peroration, in which he mentioned his son's intention to give his service to his country, of the days we have seen this young man standing by his father here, intelligent, alert, active, useful, the incarnation of young manhood, that no system ought to be adopted that would permit this young man and 500,000 more of his kind, from patriotic and laudable motives, to go and give their lives on the field of battle, while 500,000 more young, strong men, but lacking in usefulness and appreciation of their duties as American citizens, loaf on the streets or in the barrooms or pool halls and idle away their lives, basking in the light of a freedom secured to them by a volunteer system and the valiant services of brave and patriotic men. [Applause.]

Several points have been made in argument for the majority report. Constant reference is made to the administration bill's limit of 19 to 25 years. There is no such bill before this House, and why waste time discussing it? It has been said no one could know what the exemptions may be if selective draft be authorized. Why not? Section 3 of the bill names the classes exempt. Neither side differ about these. I have heard it said that the President may make unfair regulations and certain districts be discriminated against. In the first place, I do not believe it. I hold no brief for Woodrow Wilson, but I refuse to believe the President of the United States would stoop to such ignoble measures. If any unfair measures were adopted by those in authority, it is a matter of administration of the law for which those responsible will be held to account by the American people at the polls. But you will observe that if the President might do so under the minority bill, he could also do so under the majority bill. Note the provisions of section 3 of the printed bill, page 9, lines 9 to 16. It has been said that the State units should be kept together and the neighborhood idea preserved. This is provided for in the third paragraph of section 1. That no State or Territory can be discriminated against and that each such division must contribute its pro rata part of the burden is amply provided for in the same paragraph.

I am, therefore, constrained to believe that the plan adopted by the majority of the committee is unwise and that the minority plan ought to obtain. I am a Republican, and after about four weeks' experience in this House my faith is to-day stronger than it ever was. I do not believe I agree with a single policy of the Democratic Party announced and followed by it for four years past. I do not agree with Woodrow Wilson in his conduct of international affairs prior to this war. But a majority of the American people did, and this is a country where the majority rules, and so be it. But when the President came to this Congress and asserted the rights of the American people, I enlisted under his banner, and I enlisted until the end of the war. He says now, by implication, that the adoption of any other method than that proposed, the selective draft, would end in confusion. He ought to know about this; he has had the benefit of the best advice from experts and through diplomatic channels and knows whereof he speaks. I have not been so informed. Therefore I have to-day my own reason and the advice of the Chief Executive both pointing out the same path for me to follow, and I shall follow, feeling sure that while I have perhaps not followed an easy path it is the best one my mind's eyes have yet perceived. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, on August 1, 1914, a war broke out across the sea and spread like a conflagration until it enveloped nearly all of Europe. The United States proclaimed its neutrality and did everything possible to keep out of it. For two and one-half years we succeeded. The President, with calm, patient diplomacy unequaled in the history of this country, succeeded in avoiding war. We were encouraged to believe that the end would come to the terrible conflict in the no distant future without our being drawn into it.

As in all wars, neutral rights were violated, and we entered vigorous protests. Lives of our citizens were taken on the high seas without warning, and at first excuses were made and apologies offered. About two years ago the Lusitania was sunk without warning, and the civilized world stood aghast. Among the passengers going to a watery grave were 115 American citizens.

A demand was made on the Imperial German Government by the United States to define its policy with reference to the use of submarines, and that Government was then informed if such a policy was to be followed longer it would lead to the severance of diplomatic relations and the holding of that Government to a strict accountability. Everybody applauded the diplomatic victory of the President, and our Government was assured of a discontinuance of the submarine policy of Germany.

This continued until January 31, 1917, when, without previous notice, our Government was warned that the submarine policy of Germany would be renewed again on February 1, 1917, against all vessels within a certain prescribed zone around the British Isles and in the Mediterranean Sea. This led to the severance of our diplomatic relations. There was no other course open for our country to pursue, because Germany had admittedly become an outlaw upon the high seas. The American people still hoped that this would not lead to war and that Germany would not in fact pursue the policy of destroying the lives of neutrals or the sinking of vessels without warning in admitted violation of international law. However, since that time, ship after ship flying alien flags and the flag of the United States has been submarined without warning and 224 Americans have lost their lives. This was murder as much so as if Germany had invaded the United States and killed our citizens on our own soil.

The President called Congress to meet in extra session on April 2, and on April 5 the House passed by an almost unanimous vote a resolution declaring that a state of war existed with Germany. There was no other course to pursue. This Government could not with honor permit the lives of American citizens to be taken in violation of international law. I voted for this resolution.

A war can not be fought simply by making a declaration. There must be men to fight and money to supply food and munitions. On April 14 the House passed an act authorizing the issuance of $5,000,000,000 in bonds and $2,000,000,000 in certificates for the purpose of conducting the war to a successful conclusion. I voted for this bill. This bill passed both the House and Senate unanimously. It authorizes the raising and expending of the largest sum of money of any measure passed by any legislative body in the civilized world.

We have voted the declaration of war, we have provided for the raising of this large sum of money and its expenditure, and we have now come to consider the present bill, authorizing the temporary increase of the Military Establishment of the United States.

It is unnecessary to discuss the bill at length. There is a majority and a minority report. The difference between the two reports succinctly stated is as follows: The majority report favors a trial of the volunteer system in enlisting men for the Army, and the minority report favors universal military service and the selective draft. The Military Committee of the Senate has reported in favor of the selective draft. The President favors it, as does the Secretary of War with all his Army officer advisers.

Let us examine the two systems. By the volunteer system an appeal is made to the patriotic men of the country to come forward and enlist for service in the Army. I have no doubt that if such a call were issued and the men of our country were assured of seeing real service, they would respond readily. The selective-draft system, on the other hand, contemplates a registration being taken immediately of men eligible for military service under rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Only men between the ages of 21 and 40 years are liable to military service. By this system all citizens are put upon a plane of absolute equality. Everyone between these ages is liable to military service. Exemptions are provided for men physically unfit, for men whose religious principles are against war, and certain other exemptions in the bill not necessary to enumerate. To my mind this is an absolutely fair method. It makes no distinction because of occupation, wealth, or station in life. It recognizes the principle that every one owes a duty to his Government.

Everybody should serve his Government in this emergency in some way. You can serve it as patriotically by raising food supplies, by working in munition plants, by assisting the transportation facilities of the country, or in thousands of other ways as effectively as you could in the Army.

By the selective method, every citizen could be required to do the work for which he is most fit and which he can do most effectively, where he can serve his Government best.

Discussion for the past two or three days upon the pending bill has taken a very wide range, and, to my mind, much of it has been far afield—wide of the mark. The question is not whether we shall vote for war. We voted for war April 5 almost unanimously. It is not a question of whether we shall give the war financial support. We unanimously voted $7,000,000,000 for this purpose on April 14. The question now before us is what is the most effective plan for enlisting men in the Army. What is an absolutely fair plan, the volunteer system or the selective system? We have heard much talk against the enlistment of boys under 21 years of age. That is not in the pending bill. Both reports provide for enlistments of men between the ages of 21 and 40. Why, then, should we discuss it? The only point of difference before the House is, which is the fairer method of enlisting men for the Army? The majority of the committee argue that men who volunteer would be the young, patriotic, liberty-loving sons of our country, who would come to the defense of our national honor and would sacrifice everything in defending the flag; but the question is, Can we consider this a fair method?

We love our Government and its institutions, because it guarantees protection to all alike; and I insist that there is a corresponding military obligation upon every citizen of this country to serve it and to defend its honor. [Applause.] You issue a call under the volunteer system. Public meetings will be held, patriotic speeches will be made, and references will be made to the glory of our past history in order to induce the very flower of our country to volunteer; but this argument will not appeal to many, and the slackers, who are the unproductive citizens at home, will not volunteer and pay a military obligation they owe this Government.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Is it the gentleman's idea that a selective draft will produce more efficient men and at the same time make everybody bear an equal burden?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think so; and if the gentleman will wait patiently until I get through with the argument, I think it will appeal to him.

Under the selective system it is proposed that a registration shall be made of all men between certain ages, exempting from military duty men who are in the service of the Government of the United States, or of any State, and men engaged in industries including agriculture. In short, it would permit the selection of men of military age from those who are less productive and who can best be spared from the civil walks of life.

During the past three days, in the discussion of this bill, no one has pointed out the unfairness of the selective method. Assuming that this is a righteous war, that Congress should have voted for it as it did, and that Congress should appropriate money to sustain it as it did, it is our duty to enact a law which will raise an efficient army speedily. If all who are of military age are required to register and men claiming exemption are passed upon, I submit that it is fair to everyone for the remainder of the names to be drawn from a box or a wheel after the fashion that juries are drawn, up to the number called for. That is equality. That would require everyone to perform his military duty. No one during this debate has shown the unfairness of this method. The debate has run off on side issues.

Attention has frequently been called to the glorious record made by the volunteer armies of this and other countries. No one would pluck a laurel from the brow of any soldier of this country who volunteered in the Revolutionary War or any subsequent war; but because he volunteered and rendered distinguished service did not make it right that he should leave his home and fireside to suffer sacrifices while others owing an equal military obligation, but whose ears were deaf to the patriotic appeals of their country, remained at home. [Applause.] This war may be long. No man in this House can to-day foresee its end. We all hope that it will be terminated before any American boy crosses the sea and is landed upon European soil. [Applause.] About this there is no disagreement. However, that is not the question before us.

We are trying to provide the means for raising an army, and the question that must never be lost sight of is, Which is the fairest method to raise it? If this war continues any considerable length of time, every sort of sacrifice must be made. It is unnecessary to enumerate to those who saw any service in our past wars the great sacrifices that must be made not only by the soldiers in the ranks but by the loving mothers and the fair daughters of our land who will be called upon to make all kinds of personal sacrifices. We must prepare in every way to meet the greatest military nation on earth, and preparation does not mean only the raising of a large army and navy, but that we must provide an abundance of munitions of every kind and character, keeping in mind that we must furnish also our allies who are fighting side by side in a common cause. Not only this, but we must raise food supplies, keep our industries going and our avenues of transportation open on land and sea. To do this will require large armies of men in civil life. We will require the active, energetic, industrious assistance of every farmer, and everyone who can be induced to go upon the farm to raise food supplies. Shoes and clothing must be manufactured in unusually large quantities, and there will be an increase in every kind of manufactured goods that will tax the maximum capacity of our industries and will require an additional force of trained men in order that foodstuffs, clothing, and munitions may find a continuous flow to the seaboard. An army of men must run the trains of the country. Manifestly, it would not be for the best interests of this Nation to permit men to be taken from these various civil walks of life, where they will serve their country to such a splendid advantage, and permit them to volunteer in an army, and at the same time allow the street loafer, the inhabitant of poolrooms, and the slacker to remain in idleness at home. Oh, so much has been said about the volunteers of the United States, England, Canada, and New Zealand. In 1862 the Southern States had to resort to conscription, and in 1863 the United States Congress passed a conscription act. All these volunteers, whether they served under Jackson and Lee or under Sheridan and Grant, rendered conspicuous service in their respective armies; but the point I want to invite attention to is that in both cases conscription had to be resorted to.

It is stated that the British Parliament never enacted a conscription law until May, 1916, and that some five million men volunteered, and that only about one and one-half million have been enlisted under this law. This does not show any objection to universal military service; but it is also stated that conscription is an odious term. It certainly would be a badge of disgrace if the men of military age were appealed to for two or three years to come to the defense of the flag of their country, and their ears were deaf to the patriotic appeals, and they were finally forced to enlist. If we pass this act, however, so that everyone comes in at the same time and under the same law, no one will have refused upon whom there is a military obligation to come to the defense of his country.

It has been said in debate that men conscripted in the Civil War, both in the North and in the South, did not make the best soldiers. I do not doubt it. Anyone would know it without looking into history. But it must be remembered that the patriotic sons, both North and South, readily joined the colors, and the conscripts were made up from the very dregs of the country. This is true in England. For two years every appeal known to the ingenuity of a patriotic people was made to secure enlistments. Of course, the very flower of the country enlisted, and it left the inferior classes to be conscripted from.

Again, you say that patriotism in the United States is not dead; that we are worthy descendants of noble sires; that we remember Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill, and Valley Forge, and that our people can be depended upon to respond to our Nation's call. Of course, this is a fine sentiment, but public sentiment in every community throughout this Nation would conscript every brave, patriotic, self-respecting boy in this land, as it has in all past wars.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I am much interested in the very able speech that the gentleman is making. I wondered, however, while I might not agree with him, whether the gentleman believed that under the volunteer system we could raise in Oklahoma all of our apportionment that might be made to us in a short time.

Mr. HASTINGS. In answer to my colleague, I have not the slightest doubt of it. I am arguing that if you make a patriotic appeal to my town, to the patriotic, liberty-loving boys and young men of that community or other towns in our State, they will at once enlist, but those to whom patriotism does not appeal and who do not respond to the obligations of the Government will be left at home among the unproductive class.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Which does the gentleman believe will make the best soldiers—the ones who volunteer or the ones who want to stay at home?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have already stated, if the gentleman had followed my argument, that I thought the patriotic young men would make the best soldiers. I do not believe that that ought, however, to relieve the other young men of the country from their equal obligations to the Government.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will permit, it was said in one of the best speeches on your side that has been made here to-day—by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]—that we ought to forget persons and consider only the interests of the country. If that is true, is not the country entitled to the best it can get?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not believe that the patriotic boys alone owe obligations to the country. I believe the rich and the poor, the high and the low, all owe the Government obligations; and if the gentleman had listened to me, I will say that they all ought to respond in this emergency to the country's call and come forth rendering their service in defense of the flag of this glorious country. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman think we can apply the same rule to the selection of officers, without regard to which one is the best man? Why not require that the men shall be chosen without any regard to fitness for position in order to distribute it?

Mr. HASTINGS. In civil life?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; the Army officers.

Mr. HASTINGS. Everybody knows that you must have military experience for an officer.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We want the best, do we not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Unquestionably; but we can not apply that to the great body of citizens in civil life, because they have not had military training.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. As I understand the gentleman's argument, there are two classes of soldiers, the patriotic soldier and what the gentleman terms "slackers." Under the selective system you do not expect to use all of both classes, else there would be no selection; you must pick out some from among each, and you say you do not want to take all of the patriotic soldiers and leave slackers at home. Is it the gentleman's idea that you can better bring the war to a speedy conclusion by fighting the battles of the country with slackers? Is it the idea of the conscriptionist that they are going to take the slacker and leave the patriotic boys at home?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I will answer that before I get through.

Every patriotic boy of my country would feel ashamed of himself, if enlistments were called for and patriotic speeches were made, to remain in the audience and look about him and see his friends and neighbors respond to his country's call and not offer himself to enlist. What about the boy or man to whom patriotism does not appeal, to whom patriotic appeals would fall on deaf ears? The nonproductive, idle citizens would remain at home and render no service to the State or Nation, while the patriotic, productive man would be taken in numbers from the various walks of life and made to defend the honor of his country, fight for the preservation of our institutions and for the Government, which guarantees protection to all alike—the rich and poor, the high and low. I can not escape the conclusion that there is an equal military obligation resting upon every citizen of this Republic, regardless of his station in life, and that in such an emergency as this everyone, in some respect, should patriotically respond to his Nation's call. Those best fitted should raise corn and wheat and oats and potatoes. Others should be in factories making hats, shoes, and clothing. Thousands should be in munition factories to see that all the necessary supplies are forthcoming. Others should be in the various industries of this country. In a war we should all be called to our Nation's service where we can best serve, whether in civil or military life, and we should sacrifice all upon the altar of our country. [Applause.]

Until I studied the pending bill patiently, I grant that I had deep-seated prejudice against conscription and that I had to fight to overcome this prejudice before I analyzed the pending bill with a clear vision.

I have always believed in a democratic form of government. I believe in equality of citizenship, equality of opportunity, and equality of obligation to the Government, both civil and military. We have provided a fund of $7,000,000,000 with which to conduct this war, and we are not going to raise this huge sum of money by voluntary contributions. Nobody believes this would be fair. No one has suggested it. Yet I submit that it is as fair to rely upon voluntary contributions to support this war financially as it is to rely upon voluntary enlistments. The wealth of this country should largely pay the financial burden of this great war, and it will pay it, but it will pay it by a system of taxation enacted by this Congress. Let us call it financial conscription. No one will feel disgraced because he is called upon to pay his share of taxes under an act of Congress, and no one should feel that there is any disgrace attached to his joining the Army under this bill providing for universal military service, which applies to all alike.

I deeply deplore this war; everyone does. But now that we are in it I have made up my mind to stand behind those in charge of it, and to aid in the enactment of all legislation that will raise the most effective Army in the history of this country. To adopt the majority report is to postpone conscription. This report begs the question. The Members who wrote it had no confidence in it. They knew that it was doomed to failure. The people of this country will not be deceived. If they had been certain of their ground, if anyone in this House feels that the volunteer system is going to be a success, and he thinks it is fair and should be enacted into law, then he would not be justified in providing a substitute in the same bill. When the substitute provision was incorporated, it was an admission that the other would fail, and that the selective system would have to be ultimately resorted to. In other words, it was conscription postponed.

In the meantime our people would be torn by dissension, the Government would be humiliated at home and abroad, our allies in this common cause would be distrustful, and the common enemy that we are fighting would be encouraged. The best way to bring this war to a successful conclusion is not to hesitate in the appropriation of an adequate amount of money, the raising of an effective Army, and the supplying of the Army and the Navy with arms and munitions. Let us strike now, before some of our allies are torn with internal dissension and a separate peace is made. Let us lend them heart and courage, and when this war is concluded let it not be said that the flag of our country was ever lowered in defeat.

I am not on the Military Committee nor have I had occasion heretofore to make a close study of military matters. It does not, however, need a military man to know that the selective draft system is a shorter, quicker, and surer method of raising an efficient Army. All the military authorities are for the selective draft system. The Secretary of War favors it, and all the Army men advocate it. The President, who is charged with the grave responsibility of conducting this war to a successful conclusion, after having for months conferred with those in a position to know, insists upon the universal military liability system.

In this emergency I am not going to weaken the President, but I am going to uphold his hands. I sincerely hope that this war will be brought to a successful conclusion in the very near future without any American boy being taken across the sea as a soldier; but I insist that if it becomes necessary in the defense of the lives of our citizens and the flag of this Nation to raise an army and some of our people of military age should be required to join it and render service, no loyal, patriotic American father or mother, can blame me if I vote for a law that applies to all without distinction. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, after 30 years of economic and military preparation the German autocracy seized on the assassination of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his duchess, heirs to the throne of Austria, by a pan Slavic patriot in Sarajevo, Bosnia, on June 28, 1914, as an excuse for starting a world war which had for years been premeditated and which Germany started August 1, 1914. From the very beginning the German Government has trampled under foot every principle of international law and every rule of civilized warfare. In violation of a solemn treaty obligation she invaded Belgium and contemptuously referred to that treaty as a scrap of paper. She devastated the country and murdered women and children and said it was due to the exigencies of war. In her submarine warfare she has even sunk Red Cross boats without warning. Her accredited agents in the United States have been responsible for dynamite outrages. The Zimmermann note to Mexico and Japan is an indication of how far Germany will go in her desperation. If the European war in which we are now an ally succeeds in eliminating the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs, those modern representatives of medievalism in government, it may be worth all the blood and treasure that has been and will be spilled and spent in prosecuting it to a successful issue. I had hoped that we could have maintained to the end an honorable neutrality and kept out of the war, but it was not to be. We stood insult after insult and violation after violation of our rights by the Imperial German Government until our attitude was misconstrued and Germany thought we were too proud or too cowardly to fight. We most certainly demonstrated to the world that we are a patient and long-suffering people and that we will only resort to war as a last recourse. But that has always been our policy. We have never prosecuted a war but in defense of liberty, human rights, national honor and national integrity. When necessary we will always fight in defense and in offense for any of them. In ancient times it used to be said that Carthage could fight to its last dollar, but Rome would fight to its last man. The United States will fight for the right to its last man and its last dollar. [Applause.]

There are worse things than war. No people ever attained liberty but by the sword, and no people ever retained liberty any longer than they possessed the power, the ability, the courage, and the patriotism to defend it with the sword. Our country was born of blood, was baptized with blood, and was saved and cemented by the shedding of blood.

While the desire for liberty is as old as the aspirations of the human heart for higher and better conditions, the liberty we enjoy is a new thing in government and dates practically from the Revolutionary War. It is the result of the best thought and the best efforts of the best minds that have inhabited and benefited the earth by right living and exalted thinking. It cost unnumbered precious lives and untold treasure. It is our obligation to transmit it to posterity as pure as we received it from the founders and preservers of the Republic, who suffered so much and who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor that they and we might be free. Freedom is not the natural state of man. It can not be conferred on a people by a constitution, by statute law, or by a declaration of independence. A republic is the highest expression of the evolution of government. It took our branch of the human race thousands of years to develop to the government-by-the-people stage of civilization. Such a government can only be maintained by a moral and intelligent and a courageous people who are willing, when necessary, to fight and to die in defense of the nation's rights and honor and independence and in defense of human liberty. We are in such a war now.

For the German Government and the frightfulness of German militarism I have the utmost abhorence, but for the German people I have the highest regard and sincerest sympathy. They are a moral, frugal, home-loving, God-fearing people. Some of our best citizens are Germans and of German descent. It is but natural that when the war was confined to Europe they should have sympathized with Germany, but now that the United States is in the war I feel certain, knowing them as I do, that 99 per cent of our citizens of German blood will be loyal and true to their flag and their country—the star-spangled red, white, and blue and the United States. [Applause.] In these trying times, when democracy and autocracy are engaged in a life-and-death struggle, we are Americans all, in heart and mind and soul and thought and deed. We will all do all in our power to assist in bringing the war to a speedy and successful conclusion, but in the excitement caused by the war the peoples' representatives must be careful not to enact legislation that will create a centralized autocratic power that may be dangerous to American institutions and to American liberty. I voted for the resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government. I voted for the appropriations for the Army and Navy and for the $7,000,000,000 bond issue to prosecute the war. I am willing and ready to vote for more when necessary. I want to see the war prosecuted to a successful termination at as early a date as possible. To accomplish that we must raise and equip an army as expeditiously as we can. There are honest differences of opinion as to how this can best be done.

Personally I believe we should and could raise a volunteer army of 500,000 or 1,000,000 men quicker than we could by conscripting them, and we should immediately, in the same bill that provides for volunteers, adopt the Swiss system of universal training and universal service, modified to meet the different conditions caused by the great extent of the territory of the United States. This is not conscription. It is a recognition of the principle of universal obligation divested of favoritism, and it retains the home unit in the Army. Every great commander from the begnning of history has recognized the superiority of a volunteer to a conscript. They always call for volunteers for any extra hazardous and dangerous enterprise.

The volunteer and the conscript both have to be trained after they enter the service before they can make good soldiers. But the patriotic, willing volunteer can be trained into a good soldier much quicker than can the unwilling conscript. Neither Canada nor Australia has resorted to conscription, and I do not think we should do so without giving the volunteer system a chance in the same bill in which we provide for conscription if necessary.

I shall vote for the committee bill, but if that is voted down I shall vote for the bill as it is presented to the House for final passage, even though it should, contrary to my judgment, eliminate the volunteer system and provide for raising an army by the selective draft.

All of the wars in which our country has been engaged have been fought to a successful issue by volunteers.

During the Civil War, at the beginning of 1862, we had 637,000 volunteers under arms, and the Secretary of War discontinued recruiting. Under the act of March, 1863, 1,369,343 soldiers joined the Union Army, and of that number only 61,947 were drafted men. After six months' training and service no better soldiers ever trod the face of the earth than the men in the Union and Confederate Armies. I can not sit quietly in my seat and permit them to be traduced and their achievements belittled by theorists.

There is at the present time in the War Department a card-indexed list of 11,000 veterans of the Spanish-American War who have passed the physical and mental examination for officers on the reserve list of the Army. There are living to-day 245,000 veterans of the Spanish-American and Philippine Wars, over 100,000 of whom are under 40 years old, and there are in the United States 100,000 Greeks who saw service in two Balkan wars. At least 100,000 of the veterans of those wars would undoubtedly volunteer if given a chance, but under the selective draft they would all be exempt from the draft and prohibited by their age from enlisting in the Regular Army, [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am quite sure that very few people here will agree with me, but that will not prevent me from saying what I intend to say. The situation seems to be somewhat confused not only in the minds of the Members of Congress but in the minds of the people. It is very likely that the people are behind the President, but they are so far behind him that they do not know exactly where he stands right now, and they do not quite understand what he is calling upon them to fight for. One man out of every twenty thousand of fighting age has enlisted since the 2d day of April. Does that mean that out of every 20,000 men there are 19,999 cowards, or does it mean that the great masses of the people fail to understand the sudden change which has taken place in the international policy of the country? You must realize that the great masses of the people refuse to volunteer because they have not grasped the full significance of what has happened, because they have not grown up to the new international policy of the President, because they do not understand what it means to be asked to fight for democracy in Germany or Austria-Hungary and Turkey and Bulgaria so as to fix the boundary lines between contending European nations. Because they do not understand this change of international policy men talk about conscription, about coercion, about force, and duress. Is not this very fact, that up to the present moment 1 only out of 20,000 has volunteered a conclusive argument against the policy of conscription? Is not an opportunity to volunteer a sort of a referendum?

On the 6th day of December, 1915, I introduced a resolution calling upon the President to convene a congress of neutral nations and that the following be made the basis of international peace: The liberation of oppressed nationalities, a referendum for Poland, Alsace-Loraine, and Finland, the establishment of an international court of arbitration, concerted disarmament, and the adoption of the commercial boycott as a substitute for war and as a means of punishing recalcitrant nations. That was on the 6th day of December, 1915. The Committee on Foreign Affairs had an interesting hearing, which lasted two days, but nothing was done with that socialist resolution. It was a socialist resolution laying down the basis of international peace. What do we find on the 2d of April, 1917? The President of the United States not only adopts that resolution in toto, but asks the people of the United States to fight for it, so that I am the conservative and he is the radical. I merely talk internationalism, while he wants you to fight for it. What does he say? He says:

> We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included—> for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Notice that word "peoples," the plural, which may be a suggestion of the breaking up of the German Empire—

This noble proclamation of internationalism is not understood by the people. They do not quite know what the President is talking about. They have heretofore not been called upon to fight for the liberation of any oppressed nationality anywhere in the world. Is not that really the trouble, and can it be cured by conscription? Can it be cured by compulsion? Can it be cured by forced recruiting? Is it not a question of a wider knowledge, of a deeper understanding of things? As between the minority and the majority report, like between most propositions in this Congress, a Socialist finds himself between the devil and the deep blue sea. I find myself in that position very often as between you Republicans and Democrats. There is no really essential difference between the two reports. What does the majority report say? We will compel you to serve if you do not volunteer. What does the minority report say? We will compel you right now to serve. You are deceiving yourselves, gentlemen; you are trying to embalm your own conscience. You are putting to sleep your own doubts. You know that you are really advocating conscription, but you throw the burden of it on the President so that you will be safe in your districts. [Laughter and applause.] I voted against the war resolution. I would vote against it to-day, in spite of the press and in spite of the whole world, if my vote were the only vote; and I would vote to-day for the revocation of that resolution. I did not vote, however, against the bond issue for the simple reason that my sympathies are in the main with the cause of the allies, and I believe that we should render them every form of noncombatant aid. I do favor the loaning of billions of dollars, if necessary, to the allies, but if you help them, let your help be real and genuine. What do you do? You loan them money, and then take it back from them in excessive profits. The shipping interests, according to an article in a conservative paper—the New York Times—make as much as 1,600 per cent profit on ships, and when you give a fellow a dollar and then charge him sixteen times as much for the article you sell to him you really only give him six cents, do you not?

I would not only loan money, not only help with food and every form of material, but I would protect them against exploitation by American capital. I would protect them against exploitation by the munition interests. I would seize all the munition factories and make them Government property and squeeze the profits out of the munition business for the protection of the people of the United States as well as for the protection of the allies. [Applause.] I would take hold of the basic industries of the country and put them on a national basis, on a democratic basis, and lay the foundation for a democratic management of industries, one thing that is inevitable and that is bound to come. I would conscript wealth and not men. We talk about German efficiency. Do you people realize what this fight means? Do you know that before 1914 Germany had 10,000,000 of men trained to fight, and do you really believe that you can raise an army large enought to become a factor on the European battle fields? Why, you are wasting time here. By the time you raise your army the war will be over. How will you transport a million and a half men? You will have to build several dozen bridges across the Atlantic Ocean or you will have to do what my ancestor did when he struck with his staff the Red Sea, and in that way permit your army to walk across the Atlantic Ocean. [Applause.]

And then it is wrong from the standpoint of international peace for the American people to encourage the idea that the war should last another year and a half. You will never be called upon to fight, and the reason the people do not volunteer is that they fear that they may be called upon to fight in the trenches, fight for something they do not understand. They do not know a thing about international diplomacy. Most of the people do not know whether Hamburg is in Switzerland or in Palestine. They are not going to fight for intangible things. Had Germany been foolish enough to send a submarine to fire a few shots at an American port the people of the United States would have been aroused, but you can not arouse them by international ideas, by the ideal of international peace, which is my ideal, except that I would not shed blood for it. I believe it can be obtained only by a wider knowledge, by a deeper sympathy, by more education. Germany is strong not only because she is following Napoleon, who was the first to take advantage of the conscript system and then march triumphant over Europe, Germany is powerful not only because she has a conscripted army compelled to fight, forced to fight, and it is, by the way, that very conscript army that destroyed the effort of the social democracy for peace, but Germany is powerful because she occupies contiguous territory with uninterrupted railroad communications. Out of this war there will come in all probability a stronger Germany, because the really sick man of Europe is Austria-Hungary. It will be Austria-Hungary that will be broken up and the German part of Austria-Hungary will ally itself to Germany.

The President asks us to become revolutionists and organize a revolution in Germany. Well, there are better Democrats in Germany than there are here. Germany has millions of social Democrats. They are doing their work for democracy. When they spoke for international peace they were told to stand by the Kaiser, and some people tell us here to stand by the President, whether he moves forward or backward, whether he is right or wrong. He calls upon the people of the United States to become revolutionists. Did you ever hear of conscripting a revolutionist? They talk about conscription as being a democratic institution. Yes; so is a cemetery. [Laughter.] Everybody is a conscript in a cemetery. [Applause.] It is the democracy of the cemetery and the equality of the slaughterhouse. [Applause.] The volunteer immolates himself on the altar of liberty for an ideal, for an aspiration, for a principle. He fights, and in fighting for an idea a man lives. There is nothing nobler than to fight for something when it is a matter of choice, of impulse, of fervor, of enthusiasm, when it springs from your heart, from within your own breast. That is the case with the volunteer, with the man who gives his life for what he believes to be a cause worth fighting for. The volunteer is a rebel, a fighter for freedom, a martyr. A conscript is a lamb led to the slaughter, a victim. Is not that true?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will yield a little later, when I develop my argument. I will yield to the gentleman in a few minutes. I said the war will not last long enough. It is wrong for us to encourage the thought that it will. New Russia was called upon recently to assure the world that she did not contemplate a separate peace with Germany. A separate peace between new Russia and Germany would have been a calamity to the world, and the Russian social democracy announced that they would fight for universal peace, although this war was not of their making, but they would continue to fight for universal peace provided no indemnities and no annexations were demanded.

The German social democracy insists now that the German Government should waive all claims to indemnity and annexation. The President says we want no indemnity and no annexation. What are we fighting for? These are the questions that disturb people's minds, the minds of intelligent men who are confronted with the problem of volunteering. They want to know why. They want to know what for.

The European peoples will be liberated not by an outside force, but by the force of the revolutionary elements of Europe. In every country of Europe the people will demand an accounting, and an explanation, and a reason, the why and the wherefore of this war. The wave of rebellion is coming. That is why I look upon this talk about raising an army and deceiving the people into the belief that you are not conscripting them because you give them a chance to volunteer before they are conscripted as so much wasted time.

Tell the truth! The truth is that both bills mean conscription. And the majority and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs yielded to the pressure of the White House and have surrendered their judgment in good old Democratic style. Yes; whenever the President sneezes the Democrats on the floor of this House wipe their noses every time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. In case the number of men required would volunteer there would not be any conscription under this majority report, would there?

Mr. LONDON. Of course, if there should be sufficient volunteers there would be no conscription. That is true. It is a little better than nothing.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from New York and his socialistic friends are against conscription. If Congress should pass a volunteer bill would there be a wild rush from the Socialists to fight for their country?

Mr. LONDON. There would not be a bigger rush from the Socialists than from the membership of this Congress.

Mr. JAMES. I want to say that a good many Members of this House have enlisted once, and will be enlisted again.

Mr. LONDON. The only man that I will believe will enlist will talk to me in uniform.

Mr. JAMES. Then you will never have a Socialist talk to you.

Mr. LONDON. The Socialists have been fighting for democracy while every corporation lawyer in the ranks of other parties has been serving the capitalists against the working people. We have been the fighters for liberty throughout the world. We have been the fighters for international peace. Our men and women have voluntarily gone to the jails, to exile, and to the scaffold fighting for democracy, and it is cowardice on the part of anybody to accuse the Socialists of lack of courage.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that the United States in taking the stand she has is going to fight for the protection of the lives of women and little children?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, but the President is nobler than that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. LONDON. I did answer it. The President speaks for the people of the United States, and he does not speak in a spirit of revenge. Oh, no. He says that we shall fight this war without rancor, without selfish objects, seeking nothing for ourselves. The gentleman has not grown up to the President's policy. [Laughter.]

Is there any other question? I will extend my remarks by coordinating these different subjects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand the gentleman to say that he thought this war would be over at the end of six months.

Mr. LONDON. I do not believe you can organize the Army in six months.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You think the war will be over before the Army will be organized?

Mr. LONDON. I think by the time this Army is organized the war will be over. I am quite confident of it, because I have faith in the awakened democratic forces in Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY]. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I happen to be not a recent convert of the doctrine of universal military service. I welcome those whom I find in the ranks to-night for that democratic institution. The best answer that I can give to the critics of universal military service is that in our work for the Nation in a war sense we should consider ourselves not a confederation but a nation. I take it for granted that the biggest objection that comes to the conscription idea is the fact that men can not be associated in units for the purpose of fighting, and that one man who knows another in a particular locality or community may for the moment be dissociated from his fellow. That is too sentimental a proposition for me in a military sense. I believe that war is a cold, merciless proposition, and to be successful should be devoid of too much sentiment. There is not any question that the volunteer proposition is predicated on sentiment. That proposition is built upon those fine and delicate tendencies that we would look for in pacificism and not in militarism. Efficiency and democracy are associated with the conscription idea, and I wish to say here to the Members to-night that I am unreservedly in favor of any proposition that entails upon the citizenship of the country equal service. [Applause.]

Citizenship does not lie alone in taking what a republic offers. It does not lie alone in gathering the fruits of comfort and of luxury and of good wages and good times. It comes rather in the acknowledgment in the hearts of men that they owe a service, a great service, to the country to which they give their allegiance, and especially to a country of this kind, the greatest republic upon God's footstool. [Applause.] In a crisis such as confronts us, a citizen's obligations are greater than his privileges. In the minority bill we correct the mistakes of the past, and we seek to be guided by the lessons of the present great conflict in Europe.

I will refer for a moment to this statement, and I believe that it can not be contradicted: "Twenty thousand regular troops at Bull Run would have routed the insurgents, settled the question of military resistance, and relieved us from the pain and expense of four years of war." That is what we paid at that time for a policy of unpreparedness. That is what we paid at that time for a policy of puling sentimentality, for the regard of one man toward another, for that inefficient conduct which goes to create and foster a sentiment rather than to produce results.

Let me refer to another instance:

The slow increase of the Continental Army shows that Congress was committed to a dual military establishment—one class of troops being, Continental or regular, the other militia. In the former the gradual extension of enlistments to two or three years enabled the men to acquire the discipline which ultimately proved the salvation of our cause. The natural disposition of men to seek the easiest and shortest service permitted them to enlist in the militia in preference to the Continental regiments, and thus the only force that could be depended upon to cope with the British, both offensively and defensively, was always from one-third to one-half below its prescribed strength.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I regret I can not. My time is too limited. That is dealing with the Revolutionary War. I will refer now to the War of 1812. These things are so important and significant and have to do so much with what we lost at that time through an inefficient policy and the policy of unpreparedness that I wish to incorporate some extracts in these remarks of mine. I read:

The failure of Congress, at the beginning of the war, to declare in favor of territorial recruitment and obligatory service affords another result equally striking. The Army voted in January, 1812, was 35,000; the number of inexperienced officers ultimately called out and whose average pay was at least four times that of the private soldier was 33,481.

Instead of falling upon the 5,000 British regulars who held Canada at the beginning and crushing them in a single battle, we allowed them to baffle every attempt at invasion, and to prolong the war until our loss in killed and wounded numbered 5,614.

In contrast with our reckless extravagance in employing more than a half million of men, the largest force of British regulars opposed to us was 16,500.

These figures, $198,000,000, which do not embrace the millions paid for pensions since 1823, may be accepted with slight variation as the immediate cost of the war.

Had Congress from 1808 to 1811 applied one-fourth of this sum to the maintenance of an army of 15,000 men, so organized as to have been capable of expansion by the aid of voluntary enlistments and obligatory service to double or triple its numbers, there is little reason to doubt that Canada would have been ours and the war brought to a close on a single campaign.

Canada would have been ours, and our flag would have waved from the far North to the Gulf of Mexico. It had been the dream of many an American spirit. Think of that great loss, think of that great sacrifice, through unpreparedness!

Now men shudder at the name "conscript." We need not be afraid of names. My Socialist friend, Mr. LONDON, says it is the conscription that leads to the democracy of the cemetery. Well, brave men need not be afraid of death, no matter where it occurs. But I plead for that democracy which entails equal service upon all, and I plead with all the vigor of my manhood, with every man in this Chamber, with every man throughout the country, for the equal-service principle. The man whose son is summoned to the colors, to stand by the honor of the country and to preserve its sacred institutions, is right when he says that that same obligation should rest equally as well upon the shoulders of the son of the man next door and of his neighbor. [Applause.]

What better argument do we want than that the best blood of the Nation should not be drained? Is it not futile to take the cream, if you please, of the population and leave the skimmed milk? We will be better off and, if my Socialist friend from New York is a good prophet when he says that the war will be over in six months, we will have as the result of our preparation a splendid lesson in military preparedness, 1,000,000 men standing erect, having learned the lesson that military preparation gives—that leaven with which to build up a new country and to instill into the hearts of our citizens a greater, a bigger, a broader patriotism; yea, more, a deeper devotion to the flag, and a readiness to sacrifice one's life for one's country. [Applause.]

Now, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the consolidation of our heterogeneous elements into a more composite whole must be the result of our war with Germany, otherwise we will have fought largely in vain. A greater and more united Nation reflecting democracy's hopes, and centering the eyes of all upon a common flag should result and be handed down to generations yet unborn as a glorious heritage. The war was clarified by the elimination of autocratic Russia and the substitution of democratic Russia. Only smiles were provoked when we associated the Czar with democratic ambitions. President Wilson's address of April 2, 1917, vitalized the war and charged it with the living electric force of democratic thought. "Make room and clear the path for a world democracy" is his slogan. As a result kings are having nightmares, and crowns are rated at a lower figure. The rumblings of to-day will become the revolutions of to-morrow.

How glorious to read of the great reception in Petrograd to the grandmother of the Russian revolution after her 27 years of exile in Siberia. Where royalty was formerly entertained in the special rooms at the railroad station she was acclaimed by the people. The fruits of the early revolutionists were evident, and their sacrifices were glorified.

France has always thrilled us with her inborn love of democracy. Our debt to her for her aid in our Revolutionary War for freedom will never be paid. Her timely aid in men, money, and ships made possible the chapter ending at Yorktown. I was gratified to hear my good and learned friend, Mr. MONTAGUE, of Virginia, speak up so resolutely for France in this Chamber a few days ago.

He left one thing unsaid: The splendid service rendered by the Irish soldiers commanded by Count Dillon under Rochambeau; another Irish regiment commanded by Capt. Walsh likewise did their part, both at the siege of Savannah and at Yorktown. I speak of the great number of Irishmen in the French Army under Rochambeau, in addition to those enrolled in the militia and continental forces. For 100 years from the capitulation of Limerick to the days of the French Revolution the Irish exiles had fought for France. History teems with their gallant deeds. I need but mention Fontenoy. Gen. Anthony Wayne, the son of an Irishman, and Stony Point are inseparably linked. Gen. Daniel Morgan, another son of an Irishman, and his great victory at the Cowpens will never be forgotten. Gen. Henry Knox's hard travel to Lake Champlain for guns for the Revolutionary Army will always stamp him the possessor of Celtic blood and the daring so dear to the heart of Washington.

To the name of John Barry, the Irishman, will be forever attached "The First Commodore of the American Navy" and the commander of the first vessel of war that captured a British war vessel. The name of Gen. Richard Montgomery, of Donegal, Ireland, will forever ring in the ears of patriots as the man who gave his life for the revolution in escalating the Heights of Quebec before the Declaration of Independence was given to the world. So France and America are linked in this war for democratic ideals. What shall we say of Great Britain? The past is not the present. The future is made brighter by hope and not despair. I know England has liberal-minded sons who would do justice to Ireland. I know her statesmen have made generous improvements in the land laws of Ireland and given an impetus to a peasant proprietary. These reforms are but a modicum of justice. What horrible incubus grips her Government to-day in withholding a full measure of self-government to Ireland?

The American people love liberty; they want it not alone for themselves but for other peoples throughout the world. They long to see the day of Belgium's restoration; they will shout with very joy for Poland's reincarnation. We pray that everywhere the sovereign power will be lodged with the people, and that kings and their empty ceremonies will be set aside. Great Britain has a great chance to popularize this war. Let her be as democratic as the United States and France; let her be fair to Ireland. Forthwith give her freedom, and an admiring world will applaud. If, perchance, self-government should be denied Ireland until the close of the war, let me as an unadulterated American and a lover of liberty and freedom express the hope in this American Congress that when the representatives of the belligerent nations shall sit at the table to arrange the terms of peace it shall fall to the lot of our representatives to say a word for that Emerald Isle which has been oppressed for centuries. Let that word and action taken by America's representatives be the means of realizing the wish of that youthful patriot, Robert Emmet, who asked that his epitaph be not written until Ireland had taken her place among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we have agreed to adjourn at 10 o'clock to-night, and in view of the fact that I intended to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and that he could not finish his speech by 10 o'clock, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

FALLS CITY, NEBR., April 24, 1917.

Hon. ASHTON C. SHALLENBERGER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Conscription for Army service unpopular and should be used only as a last resort for national defense. Conscription for European service exceedingly unpopular. My associations such that I know the sentiment of the rank and file. No measure so unpopular during my lifetime as drafting our boys for European service. Let those go who are willing to volunteer is the unanimous verdict.

JOHN H. MOREHEAD.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that the pending bill (H. R. 3545) be considered in general debate under the same agreement as heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, and that general debate shall proceed under the rule we have been proceeding under for two or three days.

Mr. MANN. That means that the bill will not be read for amendment to-morrow?

Mr. DENT. No.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman does not now ask to close general debate?

Mr. DENT. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 23, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, assumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, because I am going to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator permit a suggestion by the Chair?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would be very glad to have it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is that he submit the unanimous-consent agreement and then have a roll call to disclose the presence of a quorum. It might not be necessary to call it twice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be glad to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed agreement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m., on Friday, April 27, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that at 5 o'clock p. m., on that calendar day, will vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 1871, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, April 27, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] are necessarily detained on account of business in connection with the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Oregon has presented a proposed unanimous-consent agreement which will be read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have changed the day from Friday to Saturday.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, April 28, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that at 5 o'clock p. m. on that calendar day will vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 1871, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day, April 28, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if he would be willing to modify his request, so that five minutes might be used upon any amendment presented at any time. That has been the way in which the Senate recently has made these unanimous-consent agreements. An amendment might be presented which would lead to just a few minutes of explanation, and yet it might come after 5 o'clock. If the agreement could be so changed that we would begin at the first hour named to vote upon the amendments and upon the bill, and allow five minutes on each amendment, I think it would be better. I am not going to object to the unanimous-consent agreement, however.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has some suggestion to make along the same line that will be satisfactory to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to point out the difficulty I see about this unanimous-consent agreement. I want to say that I will not object to it; I would be perfectly willing to vote right now, so far as that is concerned; but if we are going to fix a time by unanimous consent I think we ought to provide so that amendments will have some discussion. This consent provides that after 1 o'clock the bill and amendments may be discussed for 5 minutes by a Senator, but whether amendments have been discussed or not they must be voted on at 5 o'clock, without further discussion.

I would suggest that we remove the limit of 5 o'clock and agree to vote upon the bill and amendments on the calendar day. Then, if all the amendments are not disposed of by 5 o'clock, we can go on until 6 o'clock or 7 o'clock until they are disposed of, but we must dispose of them on that calendar day. There are going to be many quite important amendments that are going to be presented and that ought to have some little consideration. I simply make the suggestion if we are going to limit the time after which there can be no debate to make it later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, most of the speeches that I have been advised of have been made—that is, the longer speeches—and I assume that if we take until Saturday night, every phase of the bill with all the amendments can be thoroughly discussed. I have proposed to do that after consulting with my friends on the other side of the Chamber as well as on this side.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make this suggestion to the Senator: In the proposed agreement the real debate upon amendments is confined between 1 o'clock and 5 o'clock. When the general discussion goes on there will not be very much attention given to a discussion in reference to particular amendments. Does the Senator think that between 1 o'clock and 5 o'clock is ample time for the consideration of amendments that have been presented and printed? As the Senator knows, there are going to be quite a number of important amendments presented upon which a good many Senators will want to express themselves when the amendments are really before the Senate for consideration. That is the reason why I suggest that instead of 5 o'clock a later hour be named.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What time, then, would the Senator suggest?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would suggest the calendar day. Then we will have all the evening up to 12 o'clock at night. That would suit me better. I am willing to stay here as late as necessary on that calendar day to dispose of the amendments. As far as I am concerned, I would prefer that course.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest that the amendment which is likely to lead to the most discussion is the volunteer amendment proposed and that has been discussed since Saturday pretty generally. As the Senator says, there are amendments which will evoke some discussion but I think nothing in proportion to the volunteer amendment. I can not see why we can not reach a vote by Saturday evening.

I have no objection to the amendment to the agreement suggested by the Senator from Georgia. That would warrant a five-minute discussion on the several amendments.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? The Senator said the amendments have been pretty thoroughly discussed. The Senator will admit that they have not been discussed by a very large number of the membership of the Senate. I am perfectly willing to facilitate the adoption of any rule which will bring us to a vote after this measure is discussed. I have no desire to occupy any great length of time. I propose myself to discuss this measure for such time as I think is reasonable and necessary. I think the time I will take will be comparatively short.

What I want to call the attention of the Senator to is this: This body adopted a rule by which it could close debate; that is, it could set a time for a vote. If that rule were now invoked by unanimous consent, debate would continue for 96 hours. Under the proposed agreement of the Senator the debate will continue for only about 12 hours, if we adjourn at the usual time—6 hours to-day and 6 hours to-morrow; and if one Senator takes up four or five hours of time, the time of other Senators will necessarily be very much limited. There is no method by which we can arrange the time. Every Senator must wait for the completion of another Senator's argument and then endeavor to secure recognition from the Chair. He has no knowledge of others who may desire to speak. There is no rule by which we regulate those matters.

While I am perfectly willing to give consent to fix a time, I want to know whether the Senator is going to agree that the Senate shall remain in continuous session until the time for a vote, so long as any Senator desires to address the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is, after 5 o'clock?

Mr. FALL. I mean all night, if necessary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would be very glad to do that.

Mr. FALL. I will agree to it with that understanding, that if any Senator desires to address the Senate the Senate shall not adjourn or take a recess until the hour fixed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. That is to be done at the request of one Senator?

Mr. FALL. At the request of any Senator, upon objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would be very glad to do that. I will be pleased that the Senate shall remain in continuous session until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. FALL. That is embodied in my suggestion, that if a Senator desires to speak, which means if he objects to a recess or an adjournment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be very glad to do that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am just as earnest in my desire to get a vote as the Senator from Oregon, but it occurs to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Washington is an entirely proper one; that is, instead of the hour being fixed at 5 o'clock, to vote on that calendar day. Then, beginning at 1 o'clock, we will be able to debate any possible amendment that might be proposed during the last hours of the discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order to get some sort of an agreement for a vote, I am willing to extend it for the calendar day. That will make it midnight.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The legislative day?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the calendar day, the Senator from Washington suggests.

Mr. FALL. I understand the Senator is willing to embody in the unanimous-consent agreement that the Senate shall not adjourn or take a recess until the vote is taken, if any one Senator desires to speak?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not quite catch the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. FALL. There is so much confusion I can understand that the Senator can not catch my suggestion. I understand that the Senator who offered the unanimous-consent agreement is ready to accept the amendment suggested to the effect that so long as any one Senator announces his desire to speak the Senate shall not take a recess or adjourn until the hour fixed for the vote?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, so far as I am personally concerned, I should be glad to promise on my own behalf that it would not; but I can not control the Senate.

Mr. FALL. If that is not a part of the agreement, I should very much prefer—and I will sign the agreement right now—to invoke the rule. I will be one of 16 Senators or will agree to make it unanimous, to invoke the rule for 96 hours' debate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that I will be glad to embody that in the agreement, and I should be very glad to have the Senate remain in continuous session.

Mr. FALL. So long as any Senator desires to speak.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest that, whether embodied in the agreement or not, if the Senator having control of the bill chooses to ask the Senate to remain in continuous session, the Senate will stand by him.

Mr. FALL. I should hope so; but I want to be assured that that will be the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Oregon will yield to me, I wish to say that I was out of the Chamber temporarily when the proposed unanimous-consent agreement was read. Will the Senator allow it to be reread for the information of the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Embodying the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]?

Mr. McKELLAR. Embodying the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before the agreement is read, let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose that the bill that is now pending in another body comes over here before we vote upon the pending bill, under this unanimous-consent agreement, could that bill be substituted for this bill? If it can not be, it seems to me that an arrangement ought to be made so that if the House bill should come over to this body it can be substituted for the Senate bill, in order that we may act upon that, and not have the House send their bill over here and then we send a bill over there, and have the two Houses as far apart as they were when they began.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Washington would have that agreed to as a part of the unanimous consent, of course?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will add, as a part of the unanimous-consent agreement, if it is not already a part of it—and I doubt whether it is—that when the House bill shall come over here it may be substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With the object of having the debate terminated at the time proposed?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And then such action could be taken either on the House bill or the Senate bill as the situation may develop.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So as to get the matter in conference. I would not want that there should be any doubt about it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt that if the House bill comes over here we could substitute it for the Senate bill. I think that that is the substance of the agreement, but it might be written out in the form of an amendment to the proposed agreement by some Senator and offered right now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is correct, but I want to have that clear.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask that the proposed agreement be now read as it stands?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the agreement as nearly as he understands it.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, April 28, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that before adjournment on that calendar day the Senate will vote upon the bill S. 1871 through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on the said calendar day, April 28, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that so long as any Senator announces his intention to speak upon the bill or any amendment thereto no motion shall be entertained by the Chair on said calendar day to take a recess or to proceed to the consideration of executive business or to adjourn.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, that is not the suggestion at all. It was not proposed to limit the time when a motion for a recess or adjournment could be made until after 1 o'clock on Saturday, but that limitation should be made from the time the agreement is entered into.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That the limitation should apply right now.

Mr. FALL. That was the suggestion that was accepted by the Senator. The suggestion, Mr. President—and I will repeat it so that the Secretary will get it—was that we would agree—and we will grant the unanimous consent now cheerfully—that we will proceed with the consideration of this bill until a final vote, the hour for the vote being fixed, and the limit of debate on amendments thereto being provided, and it is also agreed that there shall be no adjournment or recess from this moment until that final vote is taken, so long as any Senator announces his desire to speak.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is as I understood the suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. How about executive sessions?

Mr. FALL. The suggestion would also apply to executive sessions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Question!

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the agreement apply also to any other business?

Mr. FALL. It would apply to any other business that would interfere with the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to except one matter if I may. I should like to have it understood that one bill, which is very important, may be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Mexico do the Secretary the kindness to come forward and indicate to the Secretary the form which the suggestion which has been made should take?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, there is already an exception asked to be made to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, and if we make one, we will make forty.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going to object; but I want to say to the Senate that I shall ask the consent of the Senator from Oregon and unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill that has heretofore passed the Senate and already passed the other House. We desire to get together. It is a matter that the representatives of two great countries have considered and asked us to pass at once. It relates to the recruiting or enlistment of citizens of other countries in the United States. We can dispose of it in a moment. I repeat, the Senate has already passed the bill, and the House has passed a separate bill. Of course, it is desirable that the two bodies get together in order to pass the measure at once, if we can. Therefore, I should like to have an understanding that that bill may be called up and passed. I know there will be no objection to it, and if the matter can be brought up we can easily settle it; otherwise, it will be difficult to settle. I have a message from our friends asking that it be passed. If I thought there would be any objection on the part of any Senator, I would not make the request; but, I repeat, I think the bill can be passed in a moment, just as soon as it is called up. I should like the Senator from Oregon to agree that that may be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to make that exception, but my experience with this distinguished body is that it is pretty difficult to get a thing through without discussion, and so I hope the Senator will not insist on his request. No harm will be done by waiting until Saturday.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a message from the Attorney General, who is anxious to have the bill passed immediately. I think it ought to be passed, and I shall ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill. Of course, if consent is not given, I must yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not want to be put in a hole. The rule provides that if the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into it can not be set aside for any purpose except after 24 hours' notice, and then only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not that true only in case there are any Senators desiring to speak? If at any time no Senator desires to address the Senate, then I see no objection to the Senator from North Carolina asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill to which he refers, and it is not necessary to put it in the proposed agreement at all. In other words, if a Senator desires to speak we can not adjourn, but if there is no Senator who desires to speak we can adjourn or take a recess.

I think that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator could ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill he has indicated.

Mr. OVERMAN. When no Senator desires to speak, I said I would probably call up the bill and ask unanimous consent for its consideration; but if the Chair rules I can not do so; of course it would be impossible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will request the Secretary to again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, or the part of it at the end, to see whether it applies to the situation suggested by the Senator from North Carolina.

The SECRETARY. After the agreement fixing the vote on the calendar day of Saturday next and limiting the speeches upon the bill to 10 minutes and upon amendments to 5 minutes, the following words occur:

And further, that from this hour on, if any Senator announces his intention to speak upon the bill, or any amendment thereto, no motion to take a recess, to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or to proceed to the consideration of any other business, shall be entertained by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is all right——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course the agreement is to apply from half past 12 to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a Senator has suggested that we should only take a recess, instead of an adjournment, from now until this bill is disposed of. I can assure the Senator that I will always ask for a recess instead of moving to adjourn. I do not think it is necessary that that should go into the agreement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if the intent is that any Senator can prevent a recess or prevent an adjournment merely by announcing that he intends to make a speech?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that is the unanimous-consent agreement proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it means that if a Senator desires to speak at that time no such motion can be made, but it does not mean that if he desires to speak at some other time such a motion may not be made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It says that if any Senator announces that he desires to make a speech on this bill then we can not take a recess or adjourn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of it was to give ample time to enable Senators to address the Senate and to discuss this bill. Some Senators fear that there may not be enough time to discuss it at length unless the Senate remains in continuous session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If a Senator desires to address the Senate, then he can do so; but if no Senator desires to address the Senate at a given time, then the Senate can quit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand the Chair to rule that I can not call up the bill to which I have referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair does not so rule as the agreement now stands.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest to the chairman of the committee, who has submitted the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, that, if the last clause is accepted, then under the previous rulings of this body, no matter what emergency might arise or however great it might be, the Senate would be powerless to act. I suggest to him the propriety of adding that "this proviso may be set aside by unanimous consent," so that if an emergency arises and every Senator is agreeable the difficulty could be met.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, there is not any question about the fact that, as the agreement now stands, by unanimous consent anything may be taken up.

Mr. REED. I do not think that is in the agreement.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what the Vice President has ruled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the proposed agreement.

Mr. FALL. I am perfectly willing that it shall be modified.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, let the entire proposed agreement be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the entire agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, April 28, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1871, a bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and that before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon the bill S. 1871, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on the said calendar day, April 28, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that from this hour on (the hour of 12.30 p. m., calendar day of April 26, 1917) if any Senator announces his intention to speak upon the bill or any amendment thereto, no motion to take a recess, to adjourn, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or to proceed to the consideration of any other business shall be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is entirely satisfactory to me in that form. I think I was under a misapprehension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair himself was originally.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I want to inquire from the Chair, or from some other source, in order that both the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and myself may adjust some personal arrangements, whether, in the event of the debate exhausting itself, say, to-morrow, by unanimous consent the Senate could proceed to vote upon the bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is agreed that the vote shall be taken not later than the time specified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote could not be taken before 1 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, is it the understanding that if general debate should be concluded the Senate could not vote upon any amendment to the bill before 1 o'clock on Saturday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The Chair will be compelled to state to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the Chair reads the proposed agreement aright—and it has been somewhat mutilated and interlined—but if the Chair reads it aright it provides that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. of April 28 the Senate will proceed to the consideration, and so on, and that before adjournment on that calendar day it will vote.

The Chair believes, if the discussion of the bill should be exhausted before that time, that at any time between 1 o'clock and midnight on Saturday the Senate can proceed to vote.

Mr. KNOX. But not before?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not before 1 o'clock on Saturday; no.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and others. Question, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] for the courtesy of having the floor for a few minutes at the present time.

Whatever may be the merits of the two plans proposed for raising an army, whether by conscription or by volunteering, there is no doubt, I think, in anybody's mind that conscription is the method considered by the warring countries of Europe as far and away the more effective. There are two ways of looking at the war and our reasons for entering it. One is that we have entered the war because of the insults and injuries we have received from Germany, which insults and injuries we are bound in honor to redress. If this is our only reason for fighting—and I do not believe that it is—then we can make war in any way that we choose and to the extent that we choose. When we deem that these insults and injuries have been properly redressed we can withdraw from the war at our own discretion and need not consult the other countries fighting against the central powers about doing so. If this is our only reason for fighting it may be that a volunteer army will fill our wants. It may be that our honor will not require us to send troops abroad to fight at all; that our breaking relations with the central powers, the protection of our commerce, and the sinking of a few enemy submarines will be sufficient. As in this sort of a war we should be entirely independent of the allies, so they would be entirely independent of us. They could at any time make peace and leave us to carry on the war by ourselves.

The other way of looking at the war, I think the right and only way, the way approved by the President in his great address to Congress, is that we, like nearly all of the rest of civilization, are fighting not alone to right the personal wrongs that we have received but because civilization can not and will not tolerate the intentions of the central powers and the methods employed by them to carry out these intentions. Should we thus join with the rest of civilization we take our place alongside of France and England and the other allies. Their war is our war, and no peace can be made that does not include us. Our obligation, then, is in every way to cooperate with the allies, and to aid them to defeat our common foe.

This war, however it may have started and whatever may have been the reasons that brought this or that nation into the conflict, has now resolved itself into a great organized effort on the part of most of the civilized world to resist German conquest. It is this great cause for which they are fighting that binds together countries whose interests are as different as those of England and France and Russia with a tie that can not be broken, even by the insidious and advantageous separate offers made by the German Government to individual nations of the allies. It is true that the immediate cause of England's entering the war was the violation of the Belgian treaty. It is true that Russia went in because of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia, just as it is true that we have declared war because of the destruction of our ships and the murder of our citizens; but it is equally true that every man, woman, and child in France and England—and I have recently visited those two countries—realizes that the cause for which they are now fighting is far greater than the redress of the wrongs of any individual nation; is, in fact, the cause of civilization against barbarism. I venture to say that the same feeling obtains in Russia and Italy and the other allied countries. So, if we are fighting, as they are fighting, for this greater cause, I say it behooves us to use every means in our power, every last resource of men and of treasure, to make certain that this cause shall prevail.

I was in England and France a short time before the severance of diplomatic relations with Germany, and I returned to America shortly after the break took place. I found three questions which puzzled the people of these countries: First, why, in view of the lofty ideals set up by this country, we had not joined with the rest of civilization against the foe of civilization; second, why we could not see that unless the allies won the war we ourselves must inevitably be the next German objective; and, third, how it was that a self-respecting nation could put up with the affronts that we have put up with. In talking with a prominent member of the British Ministry, in company with Mr. Frank Simonds, just before I left England, he asked us what, in our opinion, would constitute an act of war in the minds of our countrymen. Would the sinking of an American freighter without loss of American lives be such an act, or the sinking of a British ship with the loss of American lives? It never occurred to him to ask about the sinking of an American ship with the loss of American lives. And that last straw did break the camel's back, and we have declared war. When we gave the German ambassador his passports I found the most intense satisfaction in France and England over our entrance into the war, for such was considered to be the inevitable consequence of the break. Many people thought that it meant the beginning of the end of the war. Not on account of any actual immediate assistance that we might give, but on account of the moral effect. It was thought that the entrance of our country into the war at this period would show conclusively to Germany that there was no possibility of ultimate victory for her, and that realizing this her fighting spirit would break. Whether or not this will prove to be the case the whole world is now watching to see. It is what we do right now, what proofs we give to the world right now of what we intend to do in the war, that will determine this moral effect.

The question comes down to this: Do we give to the world the best promise of future military strength if we adopt the volunteer system, which in the eyes of experienced Europe is a proven failure, or do we so give it if we adopt the plan of conscription, which they know to be effective?

That we can send sufficient troops to the trenches at the present time materially to change the military situation abroad we know to be impossible. We are raising vast sums of money to help the allies. This does not mean that they will be able through this financial assistance to increase their armament or to do anything more than they are now doing or planning to do. Their every resource is now being used, or in course of preparation to be used, to its utmost capacity regardless of the cost. It does mean, however, a reassurance as to the future which will have an incalculably greater effect. In the same way the allies are not at the present time faced with a shortage of men, but just as financially we assure them for the future, so in this matter of men, the feeling that in the future they can count on us will give immeasurable comfort to the allies and a corresponding blow to the central powers. Proof of our intention to provide these men is the very best assistance that we can now give.

I found, especially in France, a very strong feeling that the moral effect of American troops, however few at first in number, fighting in France under the American flag would be enormous. The idea of an American legion and, they added, Theodore Roosevelt marching down the Champs Elysees on their way to the trenches, created tremendous enthusiasm in France. I hope that American troops will be sent to France. I hope that they will be sent, even though but a handful, in the very near future. As an earnest of what we propose to do, their coming will have a far-reaching effect commensurate with their numbers. I hope above all that we shall adopt the plan of conscription which will show, as nothing else can show, our undying resolve to fight this fight to the bitter end, and will hearten up the allies, who are fighting our fight, as nothing else can hearten them up. We have met the financial situation right gloriously. Let us show that we are ready to give up not alone our treasure but our life blood for the great cause in which we are finally engaged.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am just in receipt of a letter which I regard as of sufficient importance to justify me in calling it to the attention of the Senate. It is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. He says:

As you, of course, know, the President approved yesterday the bill unanimously passed by both Houses of the Congress authorizing an issue of $5,000,000,000 of bonds and $2,000,000,000 of one-year certificates of indebtedness, "to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes." The financial operations thus authorized are without parallel in the history of the country, and they, as well as the conditions arising out of the war which has been thrust upon us, must be met with vigor, energy, and organization. Financial operations of such tremendous magnitude and import as those upon which we must now enter can not be accomplished by mere optimism or casual confidence. It will take hard and intelligent work all along the line to secure the required results and, at the same time, to maintain the financial stability of the country with unabated prosperity.

We have the resources and the spirit to master the great tasks ahead of us, but without proper organization the potentiality of our resources is culpably diminished. Organization must be our watchword until all the resources of the country—financial, material, and otherwise—have been brought into a proper and thoroughly reciprocal relation. This is our immediate, as it must be our most appealing, task, if we are to assert the power of America effectively on the fighting fronts in Europe.

One thing of immediate and pressing importance is to further strengthen the Federal Reserve System so that the colossal financial operations of the Government may be facilitated and the commercial interests of the country be undisturbed. The amendments to the Federal reserve act, unanimously recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, are of infinite importance at this time. They have been carefully considered with relation to present problems, and to those which must arise out of the conduct of the war, and the entire board is impressed with the imperative necessity of strengthening the Federal Reserve System in the manner proposed in order that there may be no doubt about its ability to meet any test the future may impose upon it. May I beg, with all of the earnestness that I can command, that these amendments be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment? I am taking the liberty of writing to you on this subject because I know how vitally the interests of the country are involved in this legislation and how seriously the future will be jeopardized if there shall be any failure to act promptly and completely in the premises.

Mr. President, I shall not at this time ask any action by the Senate, but I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask consent that at some very early time the Senate may dispose of this question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma indicate what these amendments are?

Mr. OWEN. They are set forth very completely and fully in the report, which has been printed, and the italics show exactly what the changes are. The Senator can very quickly run over it with his eye and appreciate the changes. The main purpose of them is to facilitate the entry into the system of State banks, where the State laws permit, and to have a tendency to drift into the Federal reserve banks gold which is now floating unused in the pockets of the people. Those are the principal things.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator that I think it is a very important amendment. Unfortunately, however, in my State it will have no effect, because under the laws of my State a State banking institution can own no stock in any other corporation, and of course we could not own stock in the Federal reserve corporation. I think, however, that the amendment is an important amendment. If it opens the door to a concurrent and united membership in the Federal Reserve System of all of the banking institutions of the country, it goes in the right direction.

Mr. OWEN. We are trying to accomplish that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have been very slow to say that. In fact, I did not share the views that were entertained by the Senator from Oklahoma at the time of the passage of that act; but we are now in a time which calls for very serious reflection, and whether we have not builded better than we knew is not for me to say. I am rather inclined to think that we may have done so.

Mr. OWEN. I am holding the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]; otherwise I should be very glad to make some further comments on this matter. I shall be glad to do so to-morrow if I have a convenient opportunity.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for his courtesy.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

SPEECH OF MR. SHERMAN, BEGUN APRIL 25.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, by the ordinary canons of the military authorities who support this bill, the German cavalry ought now to be stabled in Westminster Abbey, and Prussian helmets ought to be policing the boulevards of Paris. Why this result has not been had I wait for those military authorities to explain. The best-drilled military machine the world ever saw was suddenly, on the 3d day of August, 1914, thrown against the defenseless frontier of the French Republic. The neutral country of Belgium was invaded as a necessary short step toward reaching French territory and the English Channel and thereby invading the British Isles.

For more than 40 years the Prussian soldier has been in the making. Hardly was the question of French indemnity settled after the Franco-Prussian war until it began. The echo of Prussian cannon had hardly ceased in the streets of Strassburg and Sedan nor had the question of indemnity been settled around the council table of the representatives of the two nations lately at war until the German soldier began to be trained for future military operations against whomever he might be ordered to attack.

It is not the first time in the history of the world, Mr. President, since recorded time has kept an account of these affairs that some military nation has risen to conquer the world. It is the dreary repetition of an ambition to subjugate and rule. I hope, in the providence of God and the wisdom of the sublimated experience wrought out by the sorrows and misfortunes of mankind that there may come a time when the Republics and constitutional governments of the world may unite that this may not again be.

From the earliest time, when the Chaldean shepherds watched the stars and became the first astronomers, through the days of the Assyrian Empire, the Medes and the Persians, the Babylonians and the Parthians, and all the great military powers of central and western Asia, with the Greek and the Roman in their day, there have risen up from time to time nations who essayed by the prowess of their arms and by the strength of their military organizations to dominate the world.

The Prussian is not the first of the human family who has undertaken to carry his Empire everywhere and to subdue every civilized power that had territory to annex or spoils to attract. From the days when such military powers fought the peoples who could not defend themselves, from the days when Nineveh sank in ruins and Cyrus conquered Babylon, it was the same manifestation of a great military power directing its energies and the government of men to the development of a great fighting machine that might destroy the peoples of the world and make the whole of the civilized globe subject to their arms.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] stated an undying truth both in civil government and in military defense. No great people, no great republic that has ever depended upon its volunteer force for its defense has ever perished from the earth.

I have not forgotten the lessons of the historians, military and civil. The historian is but the newspaper man of the centuries. He records the imperishable events that have molded human affairs and that have been the great peaks marking the epochs in human history that were vital to the perpetuation of government and the preservation of nations.

Germany to-day, or when she began this war, had approximately 60,000,000 of population. From 1873 she had trained her troops. It was my fortune in 1871, when a boy 13 years of age, to work in the harvest field where both French and Germans were my companions. The Alsatian coming from the annexed territory of France when the war broke out, fled from his country, crossed to Switzerland, and came to my part of the country in Illinois. The German was already there. They fought in the harvest field anew and again the war between France and Prussia. From the day that war ended this mighty machine has been formed, ruthlessly, heartlessly, and destructively.

The term "ruthless submarine warfare" describes nothing new. The whole military system of Germany is ruthless. If mere militarism could form men into individual fighting units, combine them in all the organizations known to military science and could conquer the world, the allies to-day would be lying prostrate at the feet of a conquering foe.

France had no great standing army. She had universal training. She had lived in the shadow of the threatened cataclysm from the time the treaty of peace was signed in the seventies. She knew that some time her wheat fields, her coal mines, her iron, and her cities, and the great seacoast that she possesses, both on the channel and the ocean, would be the object of predatory attacks from an enemy on their eastern border. Every mother had taught it to her child. Every great leader of the French Republic had talked it for years. Every one cognizant of French affairs and the protection of their national life always knew that at some time this would come. Still they did not maintain a great army and a great navy. They had universal training, as we ought to have had it long ago. Her territory was a part of the proposed conquest by the military power that coveted their country. The French Republic is waging a defensive war for the right to exist.

In Great Britain, her fleets and her navy were the strength of the British Isles. She has always been a sailor from the earliest times. Since Drake followed in the wake of Columbus she has been a great maritime nation. So she has been strong on the sea.

Her army when this war began was a mere nucleus. She did not even have enough drill sergeants to take the volunteers that came to the different recruiting stations of England. In spite of Kipling's poem of the drill sergeant, they drilled the Egyptian, the East Indian, they drilled the natives of far distant lands to which England gave law and order, but was never able to arouse the martial spirit at home nor even deemed it necessary to maintain a great standing army.

What was the result? Naturally when the war came she was unprepared. I shall not follow in detail her steps; it would serve no useful purpose at this hour in our national crisis. Some of her army officers are here with others who are in places of great responsibility and power. They are telling us of their mistakes. Why tell us what their country has never done?

How old is England? Ten centuries have passed since Alfred the Great first welded her provinces and her shires into a compact empire. It is a thousand years, Mr. President, since the Saxon flayed the Dane that invaded Northumberland and nailed his skin to the church doors of England, still to be seen in the time of old Pepys, the diarist, secretary of the English admiralty.

In the thousand years of that time England has never violated her traditional policy. Rome lived for twelve hundred years. England is a thousand years old, dating from King Alfred, in 900 A. D. The Assyrian Empire was eleven hundred years old when it perished. We are in the swaddling clothes of nations. We talk of our age of 142 years since Lexington and Concord. Who knows how long we will last in a world-wide conflagration? We are an infant in the kindergarten of human affairs.

Still England with her thousand years, with her civil revolutions, with her conquest by the Normans, with Kings in exile and one beheaded on the streets of London, with domestic revolution after revolution and foreign wars without number, has survived and kept her traditional policy of the superiority of the civil over the military with the innate national impulses that have always marked her in her days of peril. She has resolutely set her face against the maintenance of great standing armies. Her walls have been the sturdy heart that beats beneath a Briton's bosom. Like the Delphic oracle of old that told the Greek on the second invasion by the armies of Persia that the defense of Athens was wooden walls, which they interpreted to mean their fleet, England has built her walls upon tidewater and depended upon her navy as her first great line to meet a public enemy. Nor has her confidence been in vain. From this source she has maintained her public defenses and survived at times when she faced a world in arms.

It is true some English authorities now in our country tell us she made a mistake in calling for volunteers. Let it be so. If I were an Englishman as I am an American, I would not call England's volunteers a failure, when, with France, they have met the best drilled army in the world and turned them back from their invasion. England has made that mistake for 10 centuries. England has not been a conscriptive country. Her conscription acts of January, 1916, and May, 1916, are like our draft law in March, 1863. They were intended as much as anything else for moral effect. It is intended to notify even those who have not the public spirit to volunteer that unless they do the Government will exact from them an involuntary service. That was the value of the draft law of 1863 in our country. It was not the conscripted men, fewer than 67,000, who actually went into the Union Army that gave us our defense, it was the moral effect upon some who might not otherwise have volunteered.

I have before me, Mr. President, the most disagreeable task I have performed since I have been in the Senate, and that is at a time like this to differ from the Chief Magistrate and from the military authorities of my country. I know what it means so to differ. I know, sir, honest critics who give their opinion are usually regarded as unfaithful to their country's cause. Nevertheless, criticisms must be made.

In ancient Persia it was a rule that the King's counselors should give him their best judgment on his proposed public acts. Every one who criticized the King was required to go out and stand on a golden tile in the floor of the throne room. If he did not criticize him and the King thereby made a mistake, he was executed for not giving the King advice. If he took his place on the golden tile and criticized him, he was beaten for presuming to differ from his sovereign. So one way it was death, the other it was stripes.

So the critics of the present administration's policy presented in concrete form in this bill stand on the golden tile, and political execution is threatened if we do not advise as we do upon various public questions or we shall be scourged with many stripes for presuming to offer advice to our sovereign.

I do not know, if it were not for the prospect that the country has of becoming "bone dry," but we might follow another custom of an ancient race. They always discussed everything of a public character rising to the gravity of this question before the Senate twice—once when they were sober and the next time when they were drunk. If they arrived at some decision when they were sober, they thought it might not have the proper enthusiasm and the power of execution that were formerly assumed to attend the use of alcoholic stimulants. So they postponed the final decision and all got drunk that night and reviewed the question which they had decided when they were sober. In this country we live in sluggish indifference until we fly into boundless excitement, under which we reverse ourselves completely.

The conscription movement is a campaign, Mr. President, born of printer's ink and the desire of s ocratic power. From smug indifference we have passed to the extremity of precipitate military frenzy.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the metropolitan newspapers have cried long and loud for war. Neither can I forget the fact that their reading constituency in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere of the large cities have not taken their advice and gone to the recruiting station. On the 9th day of April, 1917, by the record, nearly as many recruits were mustered in Muncie, Ind., with 35,000 population, as in New York City, with 6,000,000. Still, the Muncie newspapers had not been clamoring for war. For months the New York papers were chiding our Chief Magistrate and cartooning Congress, sleeping with cobwebs about their heads, because they did not instantly march upon the Prussian and annihilate him. Now their own reading constituency, I repeat, are so deaf to the voice of public duty that they are equally vociferous in asking for a conscription law to force their unwilling constituents into the military service in defense of the country.

I have sometimes thought it would be a wise rule if in this Republic no city were ever permitted to assemble within its limits more than a given population—say, 250,000. After that number was reached people might then be made to move into the country. A majority of our population gathered in large cities is a menace and marks the decay that ushers in national dissolution.

The vulnerable points of this Republic are the large cities. That much of the wealth, the genius, and the ability of the American people are gathered in the large cities is true. They are our Atlantic seaboard towns, our ports on the Mexican Gulf, and on the far Pacific shore. It is not amongst the country population, but it is in the cities where the treasure is gathered, where the wealth is stored, where large populations are found, requiring to be fed by the farmer, the stock raiser, the market gardener, and the dairyman of the country.

I can not forget, Mr. President, in this crisis of our affairs the unerring index finger of the past. Where a nation gathers the greater portion of its wealth, its manhood, its material resources, its stores of learning, its genius, and its ability to the great city the conquering legions came, the city was destroyed, and the nation perished from the earth. When Cyrus made his first great inroads on the Scythians he captured one of their chiefs, a nomadic head of the wandering tribes, and asked him where their principal city was. He said, "We have none; we live on the plains and on the boundless steppes of northern Asia; our people go to the ice sea," as he called it—the Arctic Circle. Cyrus failed to conquer them because there was no place to strike a vital point. He could disperse their bands, he could scatter their army, but he neither could starve them nor conquer them. They had no city to perish.

I had a letter from one of the court clerks in Chicago, telling me of 1,500 applications, in round numbers, in a single day for marriage licenses at the window of the license clerk. I never knew that Cupid and Mars ran together in such close union; and they never do out in the country, Mr. President, where you and I and many of us were raised. It is only in the city where you find such exhibitions.

There was one patriot, at least, as the story runs. His girl, to whom he was engaged, suggested that he might just as well get married and keep out of the service. "No," he said, "I have already enlisted, and I want but one war on my hands at a time." That has been made an object lesson—1,500 "slackers" in the city of Chicago in a single day crowding the marriage-license window in order that they may become heads of families. There are no such instances in the country towns. There are none out at the cross-roads in the great corn belt of the West. There the marriage ceremonies go along at about a normal rate, but, like other aggravated evils, you always find this condition in the metropolis.

I repeat, therefore, Mr. President, that the portion of the press that has ceaselessly agitated for war, now does not possess enough influence over its own readers to get them to enlist to prosecute the war that they largely have produced. We would have been at war two years ago if their advice had been followed.

Mr. President, for myself I can not abdicate my official powers of legislation for any Chief Magistrate, his Cabinet, nor any board of strategy or War College. I have not forgotten what happened in the Civil War, which I have heard my people tell when they recounted the days they spent in the camp and in the field. A number of desk generals, whose fighting was on paper, were here in this Capital. They are the ones who use gold braid not for war but for social functions. They are always in evidence everywhere. Grant once sent them a memorandum of how he would capture an important point. They discussed it far into the night and decided that it was impracticable and impossible. They broke up to go home, and as they got out in the corridor a yellow slip of paper was handed them by a telegraph messenger, saying that Grant had already captured the place and that no answer to his memorandum was necessary. He did the impossible; he was continually doing the impossible. Stonewall Jackson did the impossible until his lamented death. Albert Sidney Johnston did the impossible. They were trained soldiers, it is true; they were West Point men. So were Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Hancock and McPherson and the whole galaxy of generals who trained the Volunteers. They all gave willing and eloquent evidence to the worth of the volunteer.

I hope the statement will be omitted from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when the revised speech appears or the final RECORD is made up, that Shiloh was fought by political generals. My kin were on the Union side there and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had kin in that struggle. He lost his father in the gray dawn of the morning of the assault. Were they political generals? I think not, because Grant was there. In his memoirs he pays a tribute to both his volunteer and Regular Army officers under him. He started from my home town of Springfield, Ill., in 1861 with the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, which was raised in and about Mattoon, Coles County, Ill. He was a West Pointer. This Infantry company brought their officers with them from Coles County. Following the way in which volunteer regiments were organized in those days, they chose their own colonel and subordinate officers. They were a roystering lot, and many of them regarded it a sort of fishing camp instead of a military camp.

Thursday, April 26, 1917.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will resume at the point where I left off yesterday and as briefly as I can conclude what I have to offer on this question. I am as impatient of delay as the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and others who are anxious to vote on this bill. I assure Senators that I shall take no undue time here in what I have to say.

Last night, when we recessed, I was referring to the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry. I stated, I believe, where it was raised. All of the volunteer regiments chose their own officers; they selected their colonels and subordinates; and they had done so in this case. The colonel was unable to obtain discipline. That is not unusual among volunteers. However, he was to blame himself, as appears from records that are unquestioned. He resigned. State Auditor Jesse K. Dubois was in the office of Gov. Yates—the elder Yates—at the time the question of selecting his successor was under consideration. The governor asked Mr. Dubois if he knew some one fit for colonel. Mr. Dubois said there was a West Point graduate in the adjutant general's office engaged in caring for papers connected with the organization of the Illinois volunteers, then being prepared for service in response to the first and second calls of President Lincoln. The first call was issued on the 15th day of April, 1861, calling for 75,000 men. It is well enough to note that in response to that call more than 91,000 volunteers offered their services, an excess of 16,000. The second call, for 500,000, came on the 22d day of May, 1861. About this time a number of regiments were being raised in the western country. The governors of the loyal States were all quite busily engaged in taking care of the necessary details.

The adjutants general of the loyal States, of course, were giving attention to the military part and preparing the organization. They sent for the West Pointer, an inconspicuous-looking person, and asked him if he would take charge of the regiment. He said he would. He went out in the northwestern part of the city of Springfield, near where a school building now stands, where they were encamped. The outgoing colonel introduced him in a few words. He expected a speech from the new colonel appointed by Gov. Yates. All he did was to look the men in the face a moment. Some of them were sitting on the grass; some of them were engaged, a surviving member of the regiment tells me, in playing the familiar western game known as mumble-peg. He looked at them a moment and said, "Men, go to your quarters." He turned to his tent and disappeared. He issued an order in a short time that in the morning the regiment was to start for Quincy from Springfield, Ill., on foot. The new colonel was Grant. He had come down from Galena and volunteered his services.

In the morning they started. I adverted very briefly to the personnel of this regiment. They were a happy, careless lot in part. When they started for Quincy on foot there was some insubordination. This is not found in the histories of our country; it was related to me by a survivor of this regiment now living at Mattoon, Ill. He said one of the members of the company insisted the Government ought to furnish transportation. He declined to walk. The transportation was not forthcoming. He sat down on the grass where Lawrence Avenue, Springfield, Ill., now is, and said he would remain there until the Government furnished him adequate transportation. Grant was informed of the hiatus in the procedure. He detailed a soldier to bring in a couple of trace chains off a horse that was harnessed and about to be attached to an ammunition wagon. The chains were forthcoming and he ordered them attached to the insubordinate private, hitched him to the tail end of the ammunition wagon, and ordered the march to proceed, which it did. After being dragged some 20 feet this husky patriot decided that the walking was better than he had anticipated even. After that there was no further trouble. They marched to the Illinois River, where Meredosia, Ill., now is, and subsequently reached the city of Quincy.

These men were volunteers. They were rendezvoused at Cairo, Ill., the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, and shortly afterwards were incorporated in the proper division. Grant remained as colonel of the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry until the 7th day of August following, when he was transferred to another division by order of the War Department.

I wish to state in this connection that the record of the Twenty-first Illinois, after this inauspicious beginning had a much better ending. They were raw volunteer recruits. They were not conscripts. They were a part of the alleged volunteer failures of this country. Here is their record in the regimental history compiled of all the regiments that saw active service in the Civil War.

Col. Ulysses S. Grant; Lieut. Col. John W. Alexander, killed in battle later. They participated at Stone River, Tenn.; Chickamauga, Ga.; Gays Gap, Tenn.; Iuka, Miss.; Chattahoochee, Ga.; Kenesaw, Ga.; Atlanta, Ga.; Franklin, Tenn.; and Nashville, Tenn. The regimental historian attaches a note in which he says:

A peculiar interest attaches itself to the Twenty-first, because it was Grant's old regiment. The men in that command little thought that the stranger assigned to them as their colonel was destined to become the grandest figure in the war. The recruits rendezvoused at Mattoon, where they were mustered into the State service, May 15, 1861, by "Capt." Grant, and on the 24th of June the regiment was mustered into the United States service by Capt. Pitcher, United States Army, with U. S. Grant as colonel. Grant continued in command of his regiment until the 7th of August, when he was promoted, and entered on the career which was to culminate in grandeur at Appomattox. The regiment served in Missouri until May, 1862—

And so forth.

After that, it gives the history which I have briefly taken from the tabulated statement.

I refer to this regiment not because of any particular merit it has above any others from that State and from many of the Western as well as other States of the Union. I name it in order to "point a moral and adorn a tale" that is very closely related to the Twenty-first Illinois and its colonel. I read from Grant's Memoirs, volume 1. It is an authority. A hundred years from now or more, Mr. President, I hope this will be a textbook in the public schools. I tired in my youth of reading Cæsar's Commentaries on the Gallic War. These are commentaries on the Civil War of our own country. Cæsar died a military dictator; Washington died a farmer; Grant died a private citizen, after completing the last manuscript copy of the memoirs, the first volume of which I hold in my hand. These memoirs are the life stories of a man as modest as he was great. They teach something most classical schoolbooks do not.

After reaching Springfield, Ill., from Galena he says the only Members of Congress he knew were Washburne, of the Galena district, and Philip Foulk. He knew only then Senator Douglas from his own State. He saw a good deal of Gen. Pope.

Of Gen. Taylor, of the Mexican War, he speaks, because Grant had been in the Mexican War. I remember that in the suburbs of Mexico City, at Cherubusco, they still show the cupola of the little stone mission where Grant mounted his little supply of artillery to get a good range at them and fire down in the stone inclosure around a church 300 or 400 yards away, and rout the Mexican forces out. It is referred briefly to by him in his Memoirs. So he saw something of service then, and knew Gen. Taylor. Gen. Taylor said on one occasion to Grant that he ought to go into the United States service.

I now quote:

I told him I intended to do so if there was a war. He spoke of his acquaintance with the public men of the State, and said he could get them to recommend me for a position and that he would do all he could for me. I declined to receive indorsement for permission to fight for my country.

Going home for a day or two soon after this conversation with Gen. Pope, I wrote from Galena the following letter to The Adjutant General of the Army.

I read this with a preconceived purpose:

GALENA, ILL., May 24, 1861.

Col. L. THOMAS, Adjutant General, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Having served for 15 years in the Regular Army, including 4 years at West Point, and feeling it the duty of everyone who has been educated at the Government expense to offer their services for the support of that Government, I have the honor, very respectfully, to tender my services, until the close of the war, in such capacity as may be offered. I would say, in view of my present age and length of service, I feel myself competent to command a regiment, if the President, in his judgment, should see fit to intrust one to me.

Since the first call of the President I have been serving on the staff of the governor of this State, rendering such aid as I could in the organization of our State militia, and am still engaged in that capacity. A letter addressed to me at Springfield, Ill., will reach me.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT.

That is the letter. The following is the text of Grant's comments concerning this letter:

This letter failed to elicit an answer from The Adjutant General of the Army. I presume it was hardly read by him, and certainly it could not have been submitted to higher authority. Subsequent to the war Gen. Badeau, having heard of this letter, applied to the War Department for a copy of it. The letter could not be found and no one recollected ever having seen it. I took no copy when it was written. Long after the application of Gen. Badeau, Gen. Townsend, who had become Adjutant General of the Army, while packing up papers preparatory to the removal of his office, found this letter in some out of the way place. It had not been destroyed, but it had not been regularly filed away.

I felt some hesitation in suggesting rank as high as the colonelcy of a regiment, feeling somewhat doubtful whether I would be equal to the position. But I had seen nearly every colonel who had been mustered in from the State of Illinois, and some from Indiana, and felt that if they could command a regiment properly and with credit, I could also.

I read that with the purpose in view, Mr. President, to show that Grant entered the service in 1861, not because he volunteered and sent his letter to the War Department, but was compelled to serve his country in a volunteer regiment that was raised for the Union Army or not at all. He entered it because another colonel could not enforce discipline. He obtained recognition not because anybody here in this Capital availed himself of his offer, but because the governor of a distant State gave him the opportunity to enter the service in that way.

From his appointment in May, 1861, with this insubordinate regiment he started, landing at last at Cairo, at Island No. 10, at Columbus, at Fort Donelson, Fort Henry, Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka, and so on through until the transfer came, and Congress created the position of lieutenant general, and finally he was placed in command of the Army that brought the conclusion at Appomattox.

But he began with a volunteer regiment. It was not until after the bloody baptism at Shiloh in which were men from the Western States who had volunteered, like the Twenty-first Illinois, that Grant was able to convince the authorities in Washington that there was in him some of the fighting blood that makes the soldier that wins battles and brings us speedy peace. If it had been left to the military disciplinarians at Washington to discover and use this lowly volunteer, he would have remained in the Mississippi Valley. Gov. Yates, of Illinois, gave him his chance to serve the country as a volunteer officer, and Grant needed nothing else.

Mr. President, this is still a government of the people acting through its established channels and administering its public affairs by law. This is no time for a military dictatorship in the United States. Our country is not invaded. It may be. When it is we can act accordingly. Civil authority is still supreme. The courts are open, process can be served, judgments and decrees can be rendered, and the ordinary civil authorities can administer justice and protect life and property adequate to every civil purpose.

This bill is sought to be justified by the pressing public emergency. The emergency now is no greater in fact than it has been from the 3d day of August, 1914. The shadow then first fell across the world that to every observing man who had read history and knew the tendency of the power responsible for this war that we were approaching a time when some public defense would become indispensable. A state of indifference ensued. Now, those who once derided preparedness have passed from apathy to hysteria. One is as inefficient as the other for permanent results.

It is due to the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate to give him credit for the pertinacity and intelligence with which I have heard him urge on the floor of the Senate nearly ever since I have been here the military training so indispensable either in peace or war. His was the lone voice in the wilderness. He elicited little response. Whatever may befall us his prescient warning must relieve him of responsibility.

I announced more than a year ago that I was willing to vote for universal military training. It is said that this is an absurdity, unless at the same time one favors universal military service which means conscription in the form provided in this bill. I do not so understand it, according to my limited processes of reasoning. Universal military training, if it had been put into operation in 1914 or 1915, would have given us the ability at this time to produce trained men, whether volunteers or conscripts. This is now our chief need.

I think, however, there is some undue importance attached to the mere term military training. I have seen law students trained in the best law schools of our country; I have seen surgeons come from the colleges; I have seen architects study until they were licensed by the board of some of the largest States of the Union; I have seen the architects build houses that fell down. Some surgeons failed the first time they undertook to practice on a major operation. I have seen lawyers become frightened at the trial table when on trial for the first time until they lost their wits and their case at the same time.

You talk like you could train a soldier by taking him in a camp and putting him in a tent and letting him sleep out doors, eat Government rations, drilling him, instructing him to handle a Government rifle, work artillery and a machine gun until at last you have made a soldier out of him. You have, as far as technical training will do so.

There is only one way to find whether there is a soldier in him or not, and that is the time that comes to every soldier if he is to be useful when he is under fire, and that test can never be met until he has seen actual service. His training, if he has in him the element of a soldier, will help develop him, but it will not make him a reliable force until he has actually been under fire; and that can not come from mere theoretical training. An army of slackers is a melancholy hope for our defense.

I think some things have been forgotten in this discussion. Congress has power under the Constitution by virtue of which this Nation lives, first, to declare war. That we have done. It has, second, power "to raise and support armies," to "provide and maintain a navy." The power to declare war resides in Congress. The power to raise and support armies is in Congress. The power to provide and maintain a navy is in Congress. Are any of the powers, or all of them, vested in the President, in the Cabinet, in the War College? They are not. The power, by the very instrument under which we sit in this body, is in Congress to raise and support an army and to provide and maintain a navy. If that be so, are we not doing so to-day? We are attempting under this bill to raise and maintain an army. It is not that the President has power to raise and support an army, but that Congress has the power. The newspapers, the criticisms, the endless correspondence by wire and by postal facilities that come to my office—I think I have over 3,000 which I can not answer until Congress has adjourned—all have the same burden. It is, "Pass the bill presented by the President." Do they argue it? No. "Support the President; pass the bill presented by the President, the Cabinet, the War College, and the General Staff." They vary, but they are all to the same effect—"Pass the bill presented to you by the Executive." If that was the intent of our Government, if that was meant by the fathers at Philadelphia when they wrote our Constitution, they would have written it so clearly that we would not cavil on what it meant to-day. They did not do so. There are no such powers vested in the President now.

For myself, I never permitted an Executive to vote me. Locally most of my difficulties in my own State arose out of the fact that in 12 years' service in the legislature of that State I never permitted a governor, Democrat or Republican, to order me what to do or how to vote while I was a member of a legislative body. This question is not a question of politics. It is a question of constitutional duty and power. The President of the United States is my President as much as he is the President of the majority side of this Chamber. If he were a Republican he could not come into this Chamber with a bill and tell me to vote for it. I will use my own judgment on a legislative matter so long as I hold a seat in this body. If my constituents do not think well of my judgment they have the power to reject me at the proper time and place. I act here with a full sense of my responsibility, and I propose to take the responsibility myself. I will not vote to put into the hands of any President I ever saw the power to raise and support armies. The supreme law of the land has vested that in Congress.

I have written many letters to the War Department in the last four years, and not in a single letter have I asked the War Department to do anything. Likewise with the Navy Department. I have written letters introducing the bearer as a man of honesty who could be trusted, who was worthy and of good character, as one they might safely talk what they pleased in his presence or to him; but as to requiring that he be given military or naval appointment, I have not done so. I am not qualified to do so.

When an army has been raised the President is the Commander in Chief. He exercises that great power through the appointment of proper military officers. Likewise he does so with the Navy. He is responsible for the proper results. I will give to him the utmost latitude in the performance of his military and naval duties. If the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, after an army shall have been raised and a navy shall have been provided under the powers of the Constitution, I have no right, moral or legal, to interfere with him in the performance of his official duties. I have no right to evade the duty of voting to raise and support an army; the President has no more right to tell the Senate how our army shall be raised than I have to tell his as Commander in Chief how he shall use the army as a fighting instrument after it shall have been raised and put under his command.

In all the wisdom of the multitude of editors, of resolutions passed without number by patriotic bodies, whose motives I do not question, they have failed to grasp the elemental principle that this is a Government of the people in this country, and not the Government of a department. It was made a Government, Mr. President, with a division of powers. In that division of powers there fell to this body, with the other House, the power to raise and support an army. The Constitution does not say that the President shall order us to raise and support an army, that he and his advisers shall write a bill and order us to pass it, but that we shall raise and support an army. When that is done, the army is placed by the same mandatory provisions of our Constitution under the President, as Commander in Chief, as the great military force of the Republic. Then it is for him so to utilize it is to produce the necessary defense of the country. After the army is raised I have no right to interfere with him, nor would I by any act of mine to do. If I have no right to interfere with him in employing the Army and the Navy as a fighting force on land and on sea, then, reciprocally, he has no right to intrude himself into this Chamber and tell any of us how we shall vote on raising the Army. That is our business; and I propose for the one vote I have in this body to make it my business.

I am responsible to the immediate constituency I have the honor in part to represent. I know whence comes all this vast array of evidence presented to us in various ways. I know the signers of the greater part of these letters. You can not deceive me on the voice of the people. They shout Congress will be destroyed unless their clamor shall be obeyed. "Vox populi, vox dei." Yes; as Francis Leiber said in his Civil Liberty and Self-Government, "It was vox populi in the days of Pontius Pilate that sent the Savior to the cross." I am not a blind devotee of the voice of the people. I wish to know who the people are whose voice penetrates this Chamber, and I think I do.

Mr. President, out in our western prairies I know a good many people in many of the States, especially in my own. All of my earlier associates from the time I was able to work at the humblest occupation until I left the farm, when I was 24 years of age, were farm boys, woodchoppers, boatmen, ditchers, those who grubbed in the forest and who made the clearings for the first opening of that mighty wave of immigration that came from the Eastern States to the frontier. I saw it all. Out of those in my own country there are five lawyers in the world to-day. One of them is the best lawyer there is in the northwestern country. Two millionaires went out of that crowd. I am not jealous of them; I am glad they made the money. I do not want to divide with them. I do not want to say, "Away with them and their possessions; let us confiscate them." They turned their activities and their minds to money making, while some of the rest of us did not follow that line, and so we have not anything. But those were my boyhood associates. They were humble men in humble walks of life in the beginning. They were the unfit in their youth. They are to be conscripted now while the favored ones escape. They were the children of humble men; men who wrested a reluctant living from the soil that had been trampled by the buffalo and the red man for centuries. They cut the sod for the first time. It had never been turned by the plow of a civilized being. They lived in that hardy way, and there, as in many of the States bordering on ours, where in the vast stores of timber the lumber trade had its origin, the pioneers came, and they and their children and their grandchildren wrested it from the wilderness. There were no millionaires in those days; there was no class privilege; there was no master and servant; there were no favors shown. They were men who lived literally by the sweat of their own faces. Two brothers I know, members of that little group of my boyhood friends, who are now in the cabs of locomotives. I know another who is working on a cotton plantation in Texas and is getting $35 a month. I know of others who are still hired hands on farms. I know of two brothers, one of whom became the lawyer of whom I have spoken, while the other is still tilling a little 80-acre farm in southern Illinois. They both had the same kind of mind, the same understanding, the same wide world open to them. One is professionally of great ability, while the other is still the plodder on the farm. Some belong to unions and some do not. I never made any distinction between them. To me a union man is as good as anybody else if he behaves himself as well as anybody else; and if he does not, and breaks the laws, he is a criminal, just like any other criminal, in spite of the fact that he carries a union card. Mere occupation excuses no one for his misconduct. I have told those associates of my early life these things. I believe them, and I will tell them so long as I have breath in my body to tell them.

Who are the men, then, who send these communications to us? Are they those associates of our early lives on the farm, the ditch digger, the grubber, the boatman, the locomotive engineer? Not one of them. I can call the roll, and nearly every one of them is an employer of men or wants to be an officer or has a relative that wants to be an officer in the Army, to order somebody around, or wants to be a candidate for office and thinks he can ride on a popular wave. What is left are those who never have an idea until they read it in a newspaper. They rave in unison with editors and have brainstorms every time somebody suggests that now is the appointed time to go into convulsions. I have no prejudice against them, but I do not propose to become a victim of their manufactured crusade or to delude myself with the notion that they are the only people in the United States to whom I ought to listen. The men who are to be conscripted have no powerful voice here. I remember who they are, however.

What is this cry? It is that the volunteers will take the best men out of the country; will lead them to the line of battle, where they will be sacrificed. Let the others go, they say. Who are the best men in any community? I was associated with doctors for between four and five years every day of my life in a certain branch of the public service. We got up a school at one time, for it was quite a fad, you know, following on the heels of the system of eugenics. They said, "We will sterilize all the worthless ones, so that our species may not degenerate." That sounded well. It was thought to be a great reform. You know a great many people so like to be reformers, and here was something on which they might sing a song in varied keys. And so they sang lustily, Mr. President, until it reached the point of who should decide who the unfit were and who might become the sires of the hardy, desirable stock that were to be perpetuated. It was said, "Well, leave it to a board." Certainly, to a board. Everything is left to a board, just like it is here in this Government—leave it to a commission. All right. Who appoints the commission? The governor. With that a gentleman over in the corner, who was a corn doctor, arose—he had been denied a right to a license to administer relief—and said, "I am opposed to the governor's naming a commission, because he might think I was one of the unfit." Who is to decide upon the unfit who are to go to the front to stop Prussian bullets? Who is to decide that under this bill? You wish the President to decide it. Well, now, he has not the time to decide it all. To whom will he delegate this power? To the War Department. Secretary Baker does not have time to do it all. He will delegate it to an Assistant Secretary, and it will be parceled out until, like the river that goes out in the sands of the desert, it disappears. No one will know where or how it has gone or whom to approach in separating the fit from the unfit. The singular thing is that the unfit in spirit, at least are to be the conscript armies of the Republic.

In other words, here is what it is: It is the same bureaucratic government that now, in times of peace, afflicts this Government until it is nauseating; not this administration in particular. I am general in my statement. It has been true of administrations here for at least 20 years; and, for one, I will not vote to perpetuate or to add to it.

Who will determine at last who are the worthy ones that are to stay at home, and who are the unfit or the unworthy that shall be drafted by selective conscription into the service, taken into a camp, and sent to France? How will we decide that? It has to be decided in some way. Leave it to the War Department, the provost marshal, who will apportion the country out into districts and subdistricts, and get down at last to the voting precinct. That will probably be adopted as the rendezvous or recruiting station where finally the issue will be settled.

What will happen? Here comes a farmer. Well, he is going to raise potatoes and beef and corn and wheat. Leave him at home. Certainly. Next, who is this man coming in here from a country village of 200 or 300 people? He is the town fisherman. He is the fellow that all the dogs and children love as their very lives. That is characteristic of them. Did he ever do anything? No. I have in my mind's eye just such a fellow. He was the boon companion of my childhood. He could catch more fish and steal more pups than anybody else in the whole township. I simply worshipped at his shrine. He knew all the good fishing holes along the Wabash and its branches. He lived to a green old age. He rivaled the Jewish patriarchs in years. He lived almost exclusively on the proceeds of his wife's washboard. Somehow those fellows live a long time. The good die young. I would not make any invidious comparison on the age of Senators. Some of them live to be quite venerable, but it is owing to their settled habits here, and the very great longevity that is attributable to holding Federal office. Nevertheless, it is perfectly evident that these gentlemen who belong to the union of the Perennial Sons of Rest live forever. The Great Father only knows why He ever let them come to this world. They eat three meals a day and get them somehow, and thereby add to the high cost of living. But they are here. No law has ever been enacted to kill them, and this is the first bill I ever saw that proposed to take them out and shoot them under the guise of military service, so as to save the fellow who is some account.

We agree about the town loafer. Let me push the analogy a little further. I would not give a cent for a law unless I know how it applies. Why, I remember some of the French constitutions, after the Bourbon Kings ceased to rule. Read their constitutions. I have them all—the translations; I can not read them in the original. They are the finest documents that were ever put on paper. They are instinct with liberty, fraternity, and equality. They talk without stint of abstract rights. I caught Thomas Jefferson poaching when I read them. He got his Declaration of Independence from the French encyclopedists and Magna Charta of King John's time. He is entitled to credit for modifying and adapting it to our conditions and making a great document for the English-speaking race out of it. But old Thomas cribbed a good deal of it bodily from the French revolutionists and England's charters.

Such principles at first were on paper; it required many years to reach a successful practice. This bill is on paper, but how will it work? I am going to apply it. I have a friend who is getting $30 a month. I was raised with him in boyhood. He is getting $30 a month because it is all he is worth. He has so gravitated in this jolt wagon of human life, as we journey from the cradle to the grave, that in the shaking-down process he has reached the $30 level, and he will stay there because he is as old as I am. Apply the process to those of military age. Take his young counterpart; send him; make a cook out of him, or something else. Take the town fisherman's children; take his boys that are from 20 to 30 years of age; what are they doing—following in the footsteps of their beloved father—certainly, take them.

Here is the machinist coming from the same crowd of boys, with a wage of, say, $200 a month. Take him? No; we must have him in a shop. Leave him there. All right. Conscript the $30-a-month man, and what do you do with him? Give him $15 a month as a soldier. Take him away from his family; put him in a camp; make a soldier out of him at $15 a month. Let his wife and her children take care of themselves. Well, that husband or son does not amount to much. They are just common sort of people. Yet their affections are as strong and their sorrows as deep as the genius or the millionaire. No matter, the man of affairs, the real nice people, must be kept home and the unrefined conscripted. The American race is recruited from the lowly. Every so often it breeds out at the top and must be supplied from the humble ranks of life; but I suppose, in the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds and the rise and fall of empires, that the common mortals are not to be considered. But one of them goes at $15 a month; you make a soldier out of him. The high-priced one stays at home; he still draws his wages. The common laborer, at $30 a month, is conscripted and serves his country at $15 a month. The $200-a-month man stays with his family and earns his wages and takes no risk.

This is called equality of service. It is so democratic, it is so fair to make everybody—to use the language of the English captain who testified before the committee—"do his bit." This is the democracy of sacrifice. Take one man who is getting $30 a month, cut him to $15 and send him into the service; leave the other at $200 a month at home with his family, with his salary, holding his place, and the other one conscripted under the terms of this bill at $15 a month, and you call that democratic equality! That is the way it works.

Selective conscription is the most obnoxious form of conscription; it opens the way for favoritism and discrimination. I never saw a bill that proposed to sort out the alleged most unworthy of the country and make of them an army to defend the Republic out of those who are alleged to be mostly unfit for anything else.

If a man is not worth anything in private life he will be worth precious little as a soldier. It is said that the men of affairs, the good men, will all be volunteers, and consequently they will be killed off. It is the good men in the world that work themselves to death, that crowd sanitariums, that die or are disabled with nervous prostration. The busiest, fittest men seem to be short lived in the business world. The sluggards live. The parasites of human society live. They flourish until, like the century-living crow, they have taken the last morsel they can absorb in their time. Why not kill them? If that is the right way, pass this bill; you will take all of that alleged unpromising crew to make the armies of the Republic.

Who will apply this? The War Department. It will take, by a selective conscription, those men that, it is claimed, are the best able to go. Somebody has to judge of that. It is like this eugenic meeting I spoke about a while ago; when you go to applying it, then comes the test and then the criticism begins, and I prefer to make the criticism now.

"Oh," it is said, "you must take the advice of the Secretary of War, of the bureau generals." I am going to make a prediction, that there is not a single general or military expert now in Washington who, when this war is over, will be a military hero and have the glad acclaims of the populace dinning in his ears as he passes down Pennsylvania Avenue after the treaty of peace is concluded. That is the fortune of war. You do not make generals nor admirals in Washington; you make them on the field of battle and on the sea. You do not make them here by military balls and favoritism; you make them in the camp and in the extremity of conflict, when the minds and souls of men rise to the level of the great emergency; they never can be found until the emergency has been met and passed.

I am asked to abandon my constitutional power of one vote, or the voice that I have in this body, and take the advice of the President and those men on how to raise an army. I expect, after the army is raised, and hereby pledge myself, to support that army in every needed way. I am now exercising a legislative power. That power is vested in this body by the organic law of our country. I shall not permit the gentleman of military experience only to tell me how to vote to raise an army. After he is in the field with the army we raise, it will be equally as presumptuous for me to tell him how to fight his battles. We are fighting now a legislative battle. I do not regard the advice of a military man on how to raise an army as any more valuable than I would regard my own advice to a general as to how to conduct military operations after I have raised the army, and he, by proper authority, has been made the head of it.

Who were these men in private life before it all happened? My sources of information, the grounds upon which I vote here, are just as satisfactory to me as those given me by the authorities. We have had as much or more experience in legislation than the Secretary of War. We have had more than the Secretary of the Navy. In matters of legislation in civil life I take no advice from those gentlemen as to my duties in the Senate. I take no advice from the editors of newspapers as to my duties in the Senate. I will meet them at the proper time and place. If they wish now to play the dictator, let them do so. I know as much about how to vote in the Senate as the editor of a metropolitan newspaper, and I propose to follow my own judgment. My lights are my own.

I adverted very briefly yesterday to the fact that, with all the influence of the metropolitan newspapers, they can obtain no recruits in the large cities at all commensurate with the population of the cities as compared with the population outside. Several editorials that have been clipped and sent to me say, in substance, that a vote against the conscription bill is a vote for the Kaiser; that the motives of those who vote against the bill are the same as those of the alien enemies who are plotting to destroy our country. That is an easy argument to make. It signifies no exalted mentality and carries no weighty reasoning processes. Anybody possessing the power of speech can say it. It is not the token of a great editor. It seems like the barren lucubration of an exhausted mind. I shall, for my part, continue to use my lights rather than to be influenced by inflammatory resolutions and by frenzied editorials.

Here is what the President asks, among other things. This is the bill of particulars:

(1) Complete bureaucratic government.

(2) Conscription. The conscription is military, naval, industrial, financial, and intellectual. The intellectual conscription is in the espionage bill, under which, as written, it is my deliberate judgment that a person could not leave the Senate Chamber, even with civil government in full operation, go out upon the platform, and say even what I am saying here this afternoon without danger of being arrested by a United States marshal and fined, jailed, or sent to the penitentiary. We are not in a state of war, as far as our domestic affairs are involved. Every civil process known to government and its institutions is in uninterrupted operation. No occasion for declaring martial law exists.

After making these liberal demands under the second head I have named, the third is he opposes the joint congressional committee on the conduct of the war. He wishes power to name all officers and select all privates, not by draft but by a process of discrimination.

I am going to say what I wish. If the amendment that is designed to substitute the volunteer feature for the conscription plan shall not be adopted, in that event there will be presented here the conscription bill as the only measure of raising an army. In that emergency I shall vote for the conscription bill, but under no other conditions. After that is done, how may we expect it to operate? We already have proof of it, and I am going to say what I think now. Gen. Wood has been assigned to South Carolina to vegetate, and Dr. Grayson has been created a rear admiral under a process of judicious selection. Is this the perfected fruit of selective conscription? When you begin at the heads of departments or of the officers, it is the only visible evidence up to this time we have to light our footsteps in this discussion. If that is a part of the process, then the term "political generals and admirals" is accurately applied.

I respect the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] for what he said yesterday. He said if Roosevelt wished to raise a division, he would vote to give strength to his arm and let him and his volunteers become a part of the fighting force of the country. There is no partisanship in that.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupt the Senator merely to remind him that if this morning's dispatches are reliable something like 123,000 applications have already been received by those representing Col. Roosevelt, anxious to join him and form part of the division which he proposes to raise under the volunteer system.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and twenty-three thousand?

Mr. THOMAS. That is the statement in the Washington Post of this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not read the morning paper. I am very glad to have the Senator from Colorado add this to the discussion this afternoon. It is both timely and material.

If the day the declaration of war was made by the joint resolution the President had issued a call for volunteers, we would have definitely known at this time whether volunteers in sufficient numbers during the war would have offered their services. If a man now goes to a recruiting office, he faces one of two alternatives, either entering the National Guard of the State for three years at least in the service and three years as a reserve, making six years, or seven years of Regular Army life.

Why did recruiting stop last June? From sometime in June up to July recruiting stopped. If you find the truth from the War Department, it was because the Army had then all the recruits they could drill or take care of. There would have been no argument if the proclamation had been issued for volunteers. That would have answered itself. If no volunteers had come, we could have demonstrated it on the floor of the Senate and we would have voted, I would have voted for my part, for a conscription act.

Fort Sumter was fired on the 12th day of April, 1861. It surrendered on the 14th day of April, 1861. On the 15th day of April Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for 75,000 volunteers. He convened in the same proclamation Congress in session on the 4th day of July, 1861. He did not call for conscripts; he called for volunteers. They were for three months' service. The second call was May 3, 1861, for 500,000 men to serve for six months, one year, two years, and three years. To the first call for 75,000 men 91,816 men responded. To the second call, in May of that year, for 500,000 men, 700,680 men responded. The third call was July 2, 1861, before Congress convened, at a time when there was no special authority vested in President Lincoln, other than as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, to issue such a proclamation. Congress did not convene until the 4th day of July, but on the 2d of July President Lincoln issued a call for 300,000 men, and the response was 421,465 men. The fourth call was issued for nine months' service. That was made August 4, 1862. It called for 300,000 men, and 87,588 men responded. The credits in the overenlistments in the other calls, by looking at the tabulation, will account for nearly all of the deficiency on this call. The fifth call was made for three years' service, October 17, 1863, for 500,000 men, of whom 369,380 were furnished. The sixth call was made on March 14, 1864, of 200,000 men, and 292,193 were furnished. This was in excess of the number required. The seventh call was made July 18, 1864, of 500,000 men, and 386,461 were furnished. The number was reduced by the excess of credits on previous calls and enlistments. The eighth call was made December 19, 1864, of 300,000 men; the quota assigned to the various States was 284,215, and 212,212 were furnished.

I now read from the report of the Secretary of War dated November 22, 1865, on this subject:

> Although experience had shown that troops raised for a short term were more expensive and of less value than those raised for a longer period, these troops did important service in the campaign. They supplied garrisons and held posts for which experienced troops would have been required, and these were relieved so as to join the armies in the field. In several instances the three-months' troops, at their own entreaty, were sent to the front and displayed their gallantry in the hardest battles of the campaign.
> The troops disbanded were chiefly Volunteers, who went to the field to uphold the system of free government established by their fathers, and which they mean to bequeath to their children.
> A foreign war would intensify the national feeling, and thousands once misled would rejoice to atone their error by rallying to the national flag. The question of time in which armies could be raised to quell insurrection or repel invasion is therefore the only question relating to troops.

This is signed by Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War. He had seen four years of service as head of the War Department, and he says the only thing is a question of time—paying this splendid tribute to the volunteer soldier of that war.

He continues:

> When Lee's Army surrendered thousands of recruits were pouring in, and men were discharged from recruiting stations and rendezvous in every State. On several occasions when troops were promptly needed to avert impending disaster vigorous exertion brought them into the field from remote States with incredible speed. Official reports show that after the disasters on the Peninsula in 1862, over 80,000 troops were enlisted, organized, armed, equipped, and sent into the field in less than a month. Sixty thousand troops have repeatedly gone to the field within four weeks. And 90,000 Infantry were sent to the armies from the five States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin within 20 days.

These were not, and it will not be contended could be, seasoned soldiers, but it shows the volunteer spirit produced men and produced them in adequate numbers. The only answer to that is that it produced the kind of men that ought not to be sent out into the field and camp to die of disease or in battle. I have answered that according to my view, that this is a process of selective conscription in order to build up an army out of what is alleged to be the most unserviceable part of our population. It is a novel argument that the inferior man shall be the unit of our Army.

On the face of the bill it admits it, and the process of deciding who the most worthless or those who can be best spared is left at last to the arbitrary, unbridled will of the power vested in the President or the War Department. I am not ready to establish a process of discriminative conscription and semimilitary and political dictatorship of that kind. It is just as important to me to preserve civil government, to keep intact our American institutional liberty, as it is in the world-wide war to destroy the autocracy of the Prussians. If we are to fail, if our institutions are to be lost, I would rather they would be lost to a foreign foe than by our own abandonment of the orderly processes of free government.

Congress alone can levy taxes, provide revenues, and appropriate in money bills the required sums to maintain the Army. These are the great war powers of Government: To declare war, to provide and support an army, to raise and maintain a navy, to levy taxes, to appropriate money.

Incident to raising an army it is a question as to whether it shall be by volunteering or by conscription. That is a question of civil government, a question that relates to the power of Congress to legislate and the exercise in their discretion of that power. Therefore I will not, so far as my vote is concerned on this question, surrender that into the keeping of any Executive of the Republic.

It is said that the volunteer system has always been a failure. It was an alleged failure in the Revolutionary War, and still we became independent. It was a failure in the War of 1812. Still we established our rights on the open sea. It is said that the War of 1775 ought not to have lasted eight years; that it ought to have ended in eight months. Against what power? England. What was England doing the world over between 1765, along when the revolutionary troubles first began in this country, and 1783, when the treaty of peace came?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator speaks of our having won in the War of 1812 and settled the differences between our country and Great Britain. Is it not the fact that when the treaty of Ghent was signed it was on the supposition practically that America had been whipped, and that we did not win the War of 1812 until the Battle of New Orleans; and, further, that the treaty of Ghent did not settle anything that was in controversy between the two Governments?

Mr. SHERMAN. It may not have been in the treaty. There is many a thing not written in a treaty that has been thoroughly respected by the belligerents. England has never sought to impress an American citizen who has been naturalized, although of English birth, from that time to the present. I care not what may have been written into the treaty settling the War of 1812; as a matter of fact the right has never been insisted on from the time the war ended up to date.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was never insisted on after the Battle of New Orleans, but they might have insisted on it if we had stopped with the treaty of Ghent.

Mr. SHERMAN. They could insist on it yet, but it is unlikely.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. I call attention to the fact that the Battle of New Orleans was fought by 1,500 American volunteers against 15,000 British regulars.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will permit me, the question the Senator from Illinois was discussing was not the question whether they were volunteers who fought at New Orleans. I only called the Senator's attention to the statement made by him that we won the War of 1812. I say, when the treaty of Ghent was signed we were practically whipped.

Mr. REED. I do not claim that my remark was pertinent to the particular inquiry, but it is pertinent to the question which we are discussing here in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Capital was taken and the Capitol burned in 1814 in that war, a part of the public buildings destroyed, some of the public records, because we did not have proper military forces to defend our own Capital. She is selfish, and no philanthropic motive prompted her to end the war. That we met some reverses does not argue that we ought to conscript our soldiers in 1917 in order to prevent the same thing from happening again. A conscript can not be drilled into a soldier any sooner than a volunteer. The melancholy and humiliating spectacle on the Canadian border referred to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] occurred. It may not be in the school history, but it occurred. It was as likely to happen with conscripts as volunteers. Men who so act will perform the same way, however they enter the service. I refer now to another spectacle on the Canadian border.

In 1813 and 1814 Napoleon's star began to wane. The great European struggle centered in and about Dresden in Germany. He was defeated. It was renewed, terminating in the Battle of Leipzig. After the Battle of Leipzig all Europe saw the coming fall of Napoleon. The Battle of Leipzig saw him turn on the way to Elba, following on his first abdication. When this was evident, the veterans of the British Empire were released. England and her allies became paramount in The Peninsula. Great Britain's armies were relieved. Some who had fought under the eye of Wellington were sent to the United States. They were in the British forces that fought at Lundy's Lane within the roar of the cataract; the volunteer soldier redeemed the disgrace mentioned by the Senator from New Jersey. He redeemed it in a pitched battle against British veterans of the Napoleonic wars.

The Battle of Waterloo was not fought until the 18th day of June, 1815. The treaty of peace was made in December, 1814, before the Battle of New Orleans, the 8th of January, 1815. England knew the war was over for the domination of Europe by Napoleon. She had then no fear of the Napoleonic wars to induce her to make peace with us. Read the history of that time. The English historian says they did not insist upon any harsh terms in the treaty, because it was generally understood that no good purpose would be served by writing anything into the treaty that would have been burdensome or humiliating to the United States or that would lead to a prolongation of the war. There was nothing to be gained by it.

There was at the same time, written not in the face of it but in the diplomatic and political history of that period, the further knowledge that the French people were still to be reckoned with. That had something to do, no doubt, with the favorable terms of the treaty of peace signed in December, 1814. She knew the longer the war continued the more capable our military forces became and the more difficult peace became.

It can not be said the volunteer soldier has not served capably in every war of our country. The military element will become paramount over the civil if conscription becomes the rule. Speaking of the Revolutionary soldiers, Webster's matchless sentiment rises irresistibly to our minds:

> While actual danger was yet afar off, they raised their flag against a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome in the height of her glory is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the whole globe with her possessions and military posts and whose morning drumbeat, following the sun and keeping company the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

Volunteer soldiers met a force that was worthy of any patriotic effort. They met it successfully and achieved their independence. The fact remains, whatever criticism may be offered.

I wish to read very briefly from Civil War military records, and then I shall close. I feel like apologizing to the Senate for taking so much time, but some of these things I must say now, because I shall make no further remarks hereafter. I have been here since the 2d of April and I have not occupied three minutes of the entire time of the Senate, and I hope not to be required to occupy it again. I wish to read from Fox's Regimental History, on page 139, on the volunteers. I will make it very short. Of these volunteers the one that leads is the Fifth New Hampshire. It was organized in October, 1861. It went through more pitched battles and suffered greater losses than any other regiment in the Civil War. It was at Fair Oaks, at Malvern Hill, at Antietam, at Gettysburg, at Chancellorsville, at Petersburg, and, in all, in 18 pitched battles. They were a volunteer regiment, entering the service in October, 1861.

Fox's Regimental Losses of the Civil War says of the Fifth New Hampshire:

> The rolls of this regiment were incumbered in 1864 with the names of conscripts and mercenaries; 420 of them deserted, most of them before joining the command.

Following them in the order of this regimental history are the Eighty-third Pennsylvania, the Seventh Wisconsin, the Fifth Michigan, the Sixty-ninth New York, and the Ninth Illinois. Those were all volunteers. For hard fighting they led all the heroic host that carried the Union to victory.

I wish further to read from this history on page 49, first, the number of volunteers in the Civil War. It is said that the volunteer has always been a failure. I want to know where he has failed. Can you train a conscript any sooner than you can train a volunteer? I want somebody to answer on the floor of the Senate. Can you make a soldier out of a conscript, willing or unwilling, any sooner than you can make a soldier out of a volunteer?

The volunteers in the Civil War were 2,067,175 men, total.

The Regulars were 67,000.

The colored troops were 186,097.

A total of 2,320,252.

It will be seen, therefore, that the great body of the troops in the Civil War were volunteer troops. Did that destroy the American people? Were so many of them killed that our race degenerated? Hardly. From it came the best disciplined, hardy, law-abiding men of that generation.

I wish to add one more quotation from page 532, speaking of the diminution of the active forces in the various services in the field:

> Another serious cause of depletion was the remarkably large number of desertions. The reported desertions during the war numbered 268,530. The Provost Marshal General estimated that 25 per cent of these were wrongly reported; that these men were absent unintentionally or unavoidably—and placed the number of actual desertions at 201,397. Of this number, 76,526 were arrested and sent to their regiments.

I have no doubt that what follows is a scandalous thing to put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not willingly place it there. If the attack had not been made upon the volunteer soldier, I would not have placed it there.

> The desertions were most frequent in the Regular Army, 16,365 men having deserted from that arm of the service during the war, a loss of over 24 per cent, while in the volunteer service the average rate was 6 per cent.
> Desertions were frequent among the drafted men, for their service was compulsory; but there were not many of this class in the ranks. The Union Army was essentially a volunteer army. True, a conscription act was enforced, but its provisions for exemption were so lenient that the number of drafted men actually held to service was only 52,068—a small number as compared with the total enlistment. In addition to the drafted men held to service, there were 75,429 conscripts who sent substitutes.

In this, Mr. President, there is a record that is of value. The desertions in the Regular Army were 24 per cent and in the volunteers of the Civil War they were 6 per cent. It is proposed, however, deliberately by an act of Congress to adopt the plan that produced more than four times as many desertions in time of military service than that of voluntary service. In the light of this experience it can not be said that the volunteer system is a failure.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say at this time, and I assure you that I have not willingly made these statements. As stated yesterday evening, to me it has been a disagreeable task. The criticisms offered against an administration in time of war are always misconstrued; they are always turned against the critic. I propose to take the chances on it. I have voiced my protest against a conscription plan. I have said that in my judgment this is a matter for Congress to settle. I will not permit the Executive to settle it for me. I will not permit an Army officer, however wise he may be in military matters, to settle it for me, for it is a civil question only. This measure goes to the method of raising an army, and that is for Congress to decide.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it is my purpose to take comparatively a short time in the discussion of this measure. I realize, as do others, the emergency feature of it and the importance that such action as Congress shall take shall be taken as early as possible, in order that the Government may proceed actively and immediately to raise such armed forces as may be needed.

Mr. President, it is evident to all that the real issue in the debate upon this measure is very important and far-reaching. It is in some respects "a parting of the ways" upon a long-established principle as old as the Government itself; and in the light of its historic and unquestionable failures I am one of those who believe that antiquity is its only argument and that its advocates have failed to show any merit in it except unbroken use. For the first time in the life of our country, in the beginning of a war, Congress is seriously considering the policy of abandoning in part the volunteer system of raising an army for the defense of the country and of adopting the plan of a selective draft for that purpose.

It is not surprising therefore, Mr. President, that many able and patriotic Senators upon this floor find themselves opposed, and in some instances vigorously opposed, to changing a policy so deeply entrenched in the sentiments and traditions of our people, and expressing their unwillingness to embark upon a new plan for such a purpose so contrary to their time-hallowed prejudices. They tell us truthfully that in the beginning of each one of our wars the Government has issued its call for volunteers and consequently this one should be no exception. It must be admitted that they have the advantage of custom and usage upon their side, and therefore the burden is upon the advocates of the change to show its superiority over the old system.

The issue is, indeed, plain. There should be no confusion nor acrimony in finding its correct solution. The friends of this measure believe that the vital arguments are on their side of the question, and that the experience of this country, as well as of other countries, has proven the volunteer system of raising an adequate army an undeniable failure, whose lesson should not be unheeded by us in our deliberations at this critical time.

It was a failure in our War of Independence. If there ever was a time when the volunteer system should have been sufficient to raise enough men for defense, it was then, when the colonists were engaged in a struggle for their lives, for their homes, and for their national existence. In 1777 when Washington and his few faithful followers were enduring all the terrible hardships of the winter in Valley Forge, when the fate of the cause of independence was trembling in the balance, and while the Continental Congress was still dilly-dallying in its futile efforts to raise volunteers, the two leading States, Virginia and Massachusetts, found it necessary to adopt the heroic method of resorting to a draft. Washington fully realized the inadequacy and danger of the volunteer system, and in his letters to Congress and to individuals he frequently complained of it, and warned them of the necessity of the draft.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BECKHAM. I should prefer to go on with my speech at present, and later will yield to the Senator.

In a letter to a friend in April, 1778, the great heart and indomitable spirit of Washington seemed to be oppressed with an unaccustomed degree of pessimism and despair when he said:

> Men may speculate as they will; they may talk of patriotism; they may draw a few examples from ancient story of great achievements performed by its influence; but whoever builds upon them, as a sufficient basis for conducting a long and bloody war, will find himself deceived in the end. * * * I do not mean to exclude altogether the idea of patriotism. I know it exists. * * * But I will venture to assert that a great and lasting war can never be supported on this principle alone. It must be aided by a prospect of interest, or some reward. For a time it may, of itself, push men to action, to bear much, to encounter difficulties; but it will not endure unassisted by interest.

Under the strain in which the Father of his Country found himself in those perilous times, he may have underrated the virtue of patriotism and expressed an opinion on the subject less favorable than he held when conditions seemed more hopeful. But there is no doubt in the mind of anyone who has read the military history of that war that Gen. Washington had reason to feel greatly discouraged, and at times almost hopeless, about the difficulties of securing enough men to fight even a defensive war against the British troops. That war, like all other wars in which our country has been engaged, could have been successfully ended much sooner than it was and at much less sacrifice to the people if the draft had been adopted originally in all of the Colonies.

Let me quote a part of another letter written by Washington, addressed to the President of Congress, dated August 20, 1780. It reads:

> It is the true policy of America not to content herself with temporary expedients, but to endeavor, if possible, to give consistence and solidity to her measures. * * * Experience has shown that a peremptory draft will be the only effectual one. * * * To one who has been a witness to the evils brought upon us by short enlistments, the system appears to have been pernicious beyond description, and a crowd of motives present themselves to dictate a change. It may be easily shown that all the misfortunes we have met with in the military line are to be attributed to this cause.
> Had we formed a permanent army in the beginning, which by the continuance of the same men in service had been capable of discipline, we never should have had to retreat with a handful of men across the Delaware in 1776, trembling for the fate of America, which nothing but the infatuation of the enemy could have saved; we should not have remained all the succeeding winter at their mercy, with sometimes scarcely a sufficient body of men to mount the ordinary guards, liable at every moment to be dissipated, if they had only thought proper to march against us; we should not have been under the necessity of fighting at Brandywine, with an unequal number of raw troops, and afterwards of seeing Philadelphia fall a prey to a victorious army; we should not have been at Valley Forge with less than half the force of the enemy; destitute of everything, in a situation neither to resist nor to retire; we should not have seen New York left with a handful of men, yet an overmatch for the main army of these States, while the principal part of their force was detached for the reduction of two of them; we should not have found ourselves this spring so weak as to be insulted by 5,000 men, unable to protect our baggage and magazines, their security depending on a good countenance, and a want of enterprise in the enemy; we should not have been the greatest part of the war inferior to the enemy, indebted for our safety to their inactivity, enduring frequently the mortification of seeing inviting opportunities to ruin them pass unimproved for want of a force, which the country was completely able to afford; and of seeing the country ravaged, our towns burnt, the inhabitants plundered, abused, murdered with impunity from the same cause.

There is no need, Mr. President, to give any further statements about this matter from the great leader who, notwithstanding such difficulties, by force of his unconquerable spirit and patriotism, held together the slender and diminishing forces of the Colonies until the arrival of substantial help from France, and finally secured for us the independence of this land. Under that system of relying upon volunteers the American armies shrank from 89,000 in 1776 to 29,000 in 1781. The views of Washington upon the subject of volunteers in that war apply to the present just as forcibly as they did to the conditions then.

I need not take up the time of the Senate in discussing the failures of this system in raising troops in subsequent wars of the country; but right here, Mr. President, I have from the work of Gen. Upton a brief account of an event in the War of 1812, which shows conclusively—in fact, it is one of the best examples of—the inferiority of volunteer troops over trained Regulars. This event was the battle, if it may be dignified by that term, of Bladensburg. Gen. Upton says:

> July 12 and 17 Gen. Winder was authorized, "in case of actual or menaced invasion of the district under his command," to call out the entire Maryland quota of 6,000, as also 2,000 from Virginia, 2,000 from the District of Columbia, and 5,000 from Pennsylvania—in all, 15,000 men.
> On the 24th of August the army described by its commander as "suddenly assembled without organization," or discipline, or officers of the least knowledge of service, numbered 5,401, of whom 400 were regulars, 600 marines, and 20 sailors, the remainder being volunteers and militia.
> The same day the army thus hastily assembled was as hastily formed in order of battle at Bladensburg, where, in the presence of the President and the Cabinet, it was attacked and routed with the loss of but 8 killed and 11 wounded.
> The British force, which landed at Benedict, on the Patuxent, numbered 3,500, of which only a part of the advanced division of 1,500 were engaged.

That the volunteer system has been a failure in every war is a fact, I believe, beyond dispute and established by the military history of those wars. It is well known that in our Civil War both sides began the struggle relying upon the volunteer system of raising troops, but were compelled subsequently—the South in 1862 and the North in 1863—to resort to the draft as a necessary means to carry on the war.

In my opinion, Mr. President, it is necessary for this country, if engaged in a war of serious proportions, to resort to the draft at some time in order to secure sufficient men for its armies. If that is true, is it not infinitely better to begin with a draft at the outset and not wait until we are compelled to adopt it through necessity? In our Civil War there was much feeling developed between the volunteers and the conscripts on account of the use of the two systems in the same war. The volunteers were disposed to look down upon the conscripts, and that prejudice against the words "conscript" and "draft" exists to this day.

No man can now tell how serious this war may be for us. We all, of course, indulge the hope that our allies have reached the point where they can break through the lines of the German Armies and, with our economic, financial, and moral support alone, crush Prussian militarism and reestablish peace upon an enduring basis. That might be true, but we would make a grave mistake in proceeding upon that pleasing prospect. It is not by any means beyond the range of possibilities that the success of the allies in this war and the success of democracy throughout the world and the maintenance of the safety and liberties of our people may yet depend upon the substantial assistance of the American Navy and the American Armies. German autocracy, so powerfully organized and so complete in its control of the German people, realizes that it is engaged in a life and death struggle for its very existence. It will fight even more desperately and brutally, if possible, than it has yet done; and if by any sad chance it can resist and defeat the military forces of the entente allies, we might as well look the plain and unpleasant fact in the face and understand that her full energies and her powerful engines of war will be turned against us.

For many years there have been several alarming evidences that Germany had her greedy eyes directed upon this continent for purposes of conquest. The rulers of that country have well understood that this country, with its Monroe doctrine, stood in the way of their territorial expansion over here. Her Government showed an unfriendly purpose toward us at Manila, in Venezuela, in Santo Domingo, and at other places and times. It is no longer a secret that the conduct of the German naval commander in Manila Bay toward Dewey indicated a decidedly hostile attitude toward our fleet, or that his conduct was in line with the orders he had from the Kaiser and the German Government. Americans should not forget the prompt and friendly action of the British commander on that occasion, which probably averted an open break between the German warships and our own under the command of Dewey.

Our position of neutrality, patient and forbearing and impartial to the highest degree in the present war, has not been satisfactory to the autocrats in control of that Government. They have resented our sales of munitions to the allies, even though they knew that we were exercising an unquestionable and hitherto undisputed right in doing so. These desperate leaders, blinded by hate and consumed with the desire for conquest, have even resented the fact that this Government has not submissively acquiesced in the inhuman violations of all international law and the outrages upon humanity and civilization in Germany's conduct of the war. With the terrible privations and the staggering debts which she has piled upon her people, and with her brutal disregard of all the laws of nations or of ethics, we need have no doubt that if she should succeed in overcoming the allies and thereby getting a free hand, she would immediately begin her preparations for direct attacks upon us. Our great wealth would be an irresistible temptation to the conscienceless mind of the Prussian autocrat.

Along this line, Mr. President, I wish to refer to a statement made in an address in Boston one night last week delivered by our late ambassador to Germany, Mr. Gerard. The Associated Press report in the newspapers of April 19 said:

To show "the deep hatred" which, he asserted, Germany has held against the United States, Ambassador James W. Gerard last night disclosed facts which, he said, had been kept from the American people during the past two and one-half years. He was the principal speaker at a national-defense dinner given by the Pilgrim Publicity Association.

Mr. Gerard said that Admiral von Tirpitz in thinly veiled statements, and the German Reichstag and Prussian Parliament in open discussions, proposed the institution of unrestricted submarine warfare against England with the intention "when England should have been subdued by hunger to come over to the United States and collect the price of the war from us."

"I want to tell you," Mr. Gerard added, "that if we had not gone into this war Germany would have fulfilled its intention to come over here afterwards and attack us and would have done so almost with the applause of the rest of the world. I can tell you, also, that everything consistent with honor was done to keep us out of the war. Beyond that, I am sure, none would have us go."

If, therefore, these things be true—and I have no doubt of them—then the allies in the heroic and magnificent contest which they have conducted for nearly three years against German imperialism and militarism have been fighting our battles as well as their own, and it becomes us now to do everything possible with the whole power and might of this Nation to help these gallant allies who have fought so bravely and so nobly under circumstances greatly to their disadvantage. We are engaged in a contest not only on behalf of democracy as against autocracy, and for the peace of the world, but it might be for our own safety and the liberties of our people. We have a direct and a deep national interest in the success of the allies.

Let us hope that their recent victories may promise an early downfall of the German Government; but let us not for a minute allow that hope to deter us from making ample military preparations. Those of us who advocate the selective-draft provision in this measure believe in light of the past experiences in this country, as well as in other countries, that it is not possible to raise enough men for that purpose under the volunteer system. I doubt very much if 500,000 men could be raised under it. It would not surprise many of us if no more than one-half that number could be raised. Even if we should adopt the amendment proposed, providing for first raising 500,000 volunteers, and we should get that number, there is hardly a doubt but that if we needed more we would have to resort to the draft. Why not, therefore, adopt it in the beginning and put all on an equal footing?

I have great respect for the opinion of those Senators who favor the volunteer plan. There is no question whatever about their patriotism or their earnest desire to see an adequate army secured. They make a mistake, however, when they undertake to show that the adoption of the draft is a reflection upon the patriotism of our people or a condemnation of the volunteer spirit.

No one doubts the willingness of the vast majority of Americans to fight for their country if need be. Millions of American men will readily take up arms to defend the country if they believe that the country is in serious danger. That belief does not prevail in the minds of the great majority of our people at present, and they will not in any considerable numbers volunteer for service as long as the country seems to them to be reasonably secure. If German warships should bombard some of our coast cities and towns, or if a large German army was being loaded upon transports to come across the Atlantic to invade our land, then there would be a rush of volunteers that might fill the need, so far as numbers were concerned. It takes the presence, or the apparent presence, of imminent and immediate peril to arouse the volunteer spirit to any great extent. But, Mr. President, it would be too late for volunteers, untrained and unequipped, when the peril comes.

In the earlier days of our country, when most men were trained in the use of the rifle by reason of the primitive conditions under which they lived, and when the implements of warfare were few and simple, it did not take very long to form and train them into military units and make capable soldiers of them. But, as we all know, there has been a remarkable development and change in warfare since those days, just as there has been in all other lines of human progress. War to-day is very different from what it was at the time of our Civil War. The soldier of to-day has to be trained and equipped far beyond the training and equipment of the men who followed Washington or Jackson or Grant or Lee. Many of the best experts in military science say that 12 months is necessary to prepare, train, and educate a soldier for modern warfare.

We hear a great deal in this debate about the large army of several millions raised by England in this war under the volunteer system, and yet England found it necessary to resort to conscription. Senators on the other side of this question who use this illustration fail to explain the vast differences in the conditions existing in England from those in this country.

A narrow channel of water alone separates England from the most terrible and gigantic conflict in all the ages of the world's history. In the very beginning of this war, in the heroic work of English and French soldiers holding back the overwhelming numbers of the German invaders from the capture of Paris, the Regular Army of England was practically wiped out of existence. Frequent attacks were made upon her coast towns and cities; Zeppelins and other aerial craft dropped destructive bombs upon her cities, destroying not only valuable property but many lives of women and children. The ruthlessness and barbarity of their enemy gradually dawned upon the minds of the English people, and they realized that their danger was immediate; that their existence as a nation was at stake; that the greatest war power in all history was directed against them. Not since the Spanish Armada has England or the British people been in greater danger than they have been since this war began. Even under such conditions they had great difficulty in raising as many volunteers as they raised. A systematic campaign was conducted to shame those men eligible for service who would not enlist. Social and business ostracism was applied, and even with all of that, Mr. President, England finally had to resort to conscription.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that when volunteering was at a very low ebb in England the Germans made the first raid on their coast, and as a result of that raid there were 250,000 volunteers accepted within one week after it took place; and that was many times the number who had volunteered during the previous two or three weeks.

Mr. BECKHAM. I thank the Senator for the illustration to which he refers.

Senators on the other side of this question also refer to Canada and Australia as an illustration of raising volunteer soldiers and sending them to the aid of the mother country. It is true that much success was secured in Canada in the raising of volunteers, but it must be remembered that Canada and Australia were also in peril. Those countries knew that the overthrow of England meant, too, their overthrow and the substitution of autocratic German domination for the liberal democratic self-government which they have enjoyed under England.

We might be in danger, Mr. President, but the large majority of the American people do not now believe it. I hope they are right, but we must not fail to prepare for the worst. We must depend largely upon the judgment of those in power at this time upon whom the responsibilities for the successful conduct of this war must rest. The President, his Secretary of War, and all those men of military skill and wisdom around them urge us to authorize the Government to use the selective draft now. The two distinguished ex-Presidents, Col. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, both earnestly approve and indorse this method. These gentlemen—the President and the two ex-Presidents who have occupied that high position—have possessed better opportunities than we have to observe and to determine the best plan upon which an army can be raised. Their views and their ideas should have great weight with us. The responsibility rests chiefly upon the President. He should be given every reasonable power that Congress can give to make his great work a success. He is a man of clear vision, great ability, and devoted to democratic principles. He is the inveterate foe of Prussian militarism and autocracy. We should give him the necessary weapons which he asks to use in carrying on this war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

No one's feelings need be hurt with the idea that the adoption of the selective draft is a blow to the patriotic spirit of the volunteer. There is absolutely no foundation for such a statement. There are now, and have been for some time, ample opportunities for volunteers to enlist either in the National Guard or in the Regular Army. We have been informed that there are approximately 600,000 men needed to fill up to war strength those two branches of our military forces, and there is no reason why those who wish to volunteer should not enter either of those branches of the service. The selective draft, as provided for in this bill, will not work any hardship upon our young men. It will be applied by the Government with proper discretion, tact, and judgment. It is safe to say that a large majority of the young men selected under that system will gladly enter the service of their country. It will be so administered as to work no hardship upon peculiar and deserving cases.

There has been some disposition to criticize the officers and men of our Regular Army. This, Mr. President, I believe to be a great injustice. No body of men in this country are more patriotic than they, or readier to lay down their lives for the defense and honor of the country. These men form our first line of defense in the land forces. If bloody war comes they are the first to be sacrificed. They have given the best part of their lives to train and prepare themselves for such work, and it comes with ill grace for anyone to attack their motives when they advocate a plan for raising an army which many of us believe to be the only safe and certain plan for that purpose. The General Staff of the Army, composed of men of great learning and skill in military matters, have advised us to adopt this plan, and I believe that Congress in this crisis should not hesitate to accept it, backed up as it is by the General Staff of the Army, by the President, by his advisers, and by many leading, intelligent men throughout the country.

Mr. President, the principle involved in this discussion is broad and fundamental. It goes to the very root of the question of the citizen's relations to the Government under which he lives. It opens up for consideration, even in a general as well as a specific way, what service, if any, he owes to his country. Are those relations satisfied, so far as the citizen is concerned, by his mere payment of his proportionate part of the revenues collected for the support of the Government? If his country is in danger, is there no duty resting upon him to fight for it and even to die for it, if necessary? Many of the advocates of the volunteer system seem to take the position that a man should not bear arms in defense of his country unless he wishes to do so, and that it is wrong for the Government to compel him against his will. They grow so eloquent in declaiming about the rights of American citizens that they lose sight of the obligations of citizenship. We hear too much about privileges and too little about responsibilities.

Liberty that takes into consideration only the privileges and not the duties of the citizen can not endure and is not the kind of liberty our forefathers purchased for us with their blood. There is no country under God's shining sun whose people owe more to their Government than do the American people. We enjoy liberties, privileges, and opportunities not equalled by those of any other people on earth. If any able-bodied beneficiary of such blessings is unwilling to fight for the country that gives them to him when that country needs his services and he has no valid excuse not to do so, then I say he should be compelled, if necessary, to recognize his obligations and give his services in the defense of the land that nourishes and protects him. Upon no other principle, Mr. President, can this Republic, if danger comes—and it may be here now—be preserved. No braver nor more loyal people than the American people live in this world, and they will, I believe, overwhelmingly indorse the application in this measure of the patriotic principle of the universality of obligation and of service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from Kentucky really takes his seat I want to call attention to one statement, namely, the statement that after having tried the volunteer system in the Revolutionary War, and after that system had, as the Senator states it, practically broken down, we were compelled to resort to the draft in the Revolutionary War.

Mr. BECKHAM. I did not say that, Mr. President. I stated that two States resorted to the draft.

Mr. REED. Well, two States did try to resort to the draft, and the Central Government tried to resort to the draft; and in both instances the draft was an absolute failure and the Revolutionary War was fought and won by volunteers. I did not want the impression to be left that the volunteer system broke down and then two States enforced a draft and thus gained the troops that won the war, or that the General Government enforced a draft and thus got the troops to win the war.

Mr. BECKHAM. I said nothing which should have given the Senator that impression.

Mr. REED. Well, I tried at the time to interrupt the Senator, but he did not want to be interrupted. I do not want to put him in any light that is not correct, but the impression left on me at the time was that the Senator was trying to convince us that the volunteer system failed in the Revolutionary War and that the draft system saved us.

Mr. BECKHAM. Oh, no, Mr. President; I did not say anything like that.

Mr. REED. Well, if the volunteer system failed in the Revolutionary War and the draft system failed in the Revolutionary War, then what argument is there left to the matter? You are advocating now a system that failed in the Revolutionary War.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I would suggest that France helped to save us.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly, France helped to save us; nobody will deny that; but France did not win the Revolutionary War; France helped the volunteers of America to win it. Now, let me just fortify what I have said.

After calling attention to the various defects in the method of attempting to raise troops during the Revolution by the volunteer system, that they were only called for for a few months of time, and that the States or Colonies did not properly cooperate, and after calling attention to all the other difficulties that existed, Greene states that finally the States were required forthwith to fill up by drafts from their militia, or in any other way that should be effectual, their respective battalions of continental troops. Having no power to enforce its decree, this resolution of Congress had no more effect than its predecessors, but Washington's personal appeals, combined with the news of the French alliance, succeeded in bringing out enough men to carry on the war.

So it was not the draft that saved us in the Revolution. Moreover, while Washington spoke on many occasions of the desirability of having a permanent army and a trained army for the war, and complained because he did not have it, in like manner Washington complained that the people were not properly supporting the war; and yet all there was of the Revolutionary War was the degree of patriotism, great or small, that there was in our country; and it might as well be said that Washington had impugned the value of patriotism as to say that he had impugned the value of the services of the volunteers.

What Washington actually did was to complain bitterly that he was not being properly supported, and what really occurred was this: That in that struggle, every time there was a reverse of our arms, there was a lot of Tories who came out in the open and began to try to destroy the efforts of the patriots. We had no Government sufficiently fortified or established to maintain any kind of permanent military establishment, and volunteers were all that was possible, and volunteers won the struggle.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to an interruption?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. It is pretty difficult to determine what the result of the draft was in the Revolutionary War, as men were enlisted for such short periods and under such different conditions; but it is well worth noting that the States that undertook the draft furnished a much larger number of men for the revolutionary armies in proportion to their population than did other States. Massachusetts furnished twice as many men to the revolutionary army as any other State, although it was not the most populous State, and there were two or three substantially as populous as Massachusetts. I do not mean to imply necessarily that the draft was entirely responsible for that; but it is a rather curious coincidence that those States which did undertake the draft furnished a number of men larger in proportion to their population than others.

Mr. REED. Why, of course, the more there was of patriotism, the more willingness there would be of all those who were carrying on the war to say: "Everybody has got to come in and help." That is always true, and very naturally in Massachusetts. This war began in Massachusetts. That is where we had the "tea party." That was the center of the struggle for a long time, and it is to the credit of Massachusetts that she fought so valiantly in that struggle.

Mr WEEKS. The Senator should not overlook the fact that Massachusetts was only the center of the war for the first year; that no battle was fought on Massachusetts soil after the first year of the war.

Mr. REED. Oh, I do not mean, technically speaking, but the war was always fought in Massachusetts. I would say that the head and front of the Revolutionary War was in Massachusetts. It is entitled to that very great honor; and a very close second was Virginia.

Now, Mr. President, before I get away from that theme——

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I find that interruptions only lead to digressions, generally, but I must yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. BECKHAM. I was going to ask the Senator to explain why it was, if the volunteer system is such a good one to raise men, that the patriot armies dwindled from 89,000 in 1776 to 29,000 in 1781?

Mr. REED. Well, sir, I might answer that question by asking a great many. I might ask you with an equal sense of logic why the army of Napoleon dwindled just after the battle of Waterloo. The answer would be that Napoleon got whipped; and the answer in this case would be two-fold. In the first place, we suffered many defeats, and armies that are defeated are generally to some extent scattered and killed off; but the principal trouble, as the Senator must know, with his knowledge of history, was that the men in that war were enlisted generally in the first instance for only three months. They learned that that was a mistake, and then began to try for longer enlistments, and at last they were enlisting men for the period of the war. That was one of the things Washington clamored for.

In the War of 1812 we had a similar experience of the bad results of short enlistments. We repeated that experience again in the Mexican War, and we started the great Civil War with the same blunder; but in all these instances they came to learn that the only kind of enlistment that ought to be made was an enlistment for the war; and, accordingly, when the Spanish War came on, under the advice of William McKinley and other men of his type, the enlistments for that war were required to be for the entire period of the war. And so it was proposed in the volunteer bill which was enacted in 1914 that all enlistments in time of war should be for the period of the war. Thus, the thing which Washington declared had been the most inimical to the Continental Army, and that which all military experts agree was the most detrimental to our Army in 1812 and in the Mexican War and in the Civil War, was met and conquered; and yet, having been met and conquered, gentlemen go back and speak of the system as wrong, although the defect that was the cause of the trouble has been cured.

Now, let us see if Washington put his faith in conscription. Let us see if it is true that Washington denounced the citizen soldier. I read from Greene:

> The final word of Washington, as General in Chief, on military policy was given in the address which he sent to the governors of the States from Newburgh about six months prior to resigning his commission. * * * His opinion * * * was as follows:
> "The militia of this country must be considered as the palladium of our security and the first effectual resort in case of hostility. It is essential, therefore, that the same system should pervade the whole; that the formation and discipline of the militia of the continent should be absolutely uniform"—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, whom I esteem very highly, whether he thinks it is fair, in the discussion of a question of this kind, to charge to the volunteer system those troubles which were due to a failure to apply the system in the proper way; and if, those defects having been remedied, he does not think that a different situation is presented. I call his attention to the fact that the General Staff wrote the volunteer army bill of 1914 and certified to us that it would produce the very kind of army that is now demanded, and in writing that bill they provided the term of enlistment, and they provided against the defects that had been discovered in the past.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator, in answer to a question I asked him a while ago as to why the Continental Armies had dwindled from 89,000 in 1776 to 29,000 in 1781, gave two reasons; and I believe that the two reasons which he gave confirm and strengthen the position which we take that the volunteer system is a failure. He said that defeats prevented enlistment.

Mr. REED. No; I said——

Mr. BECKHAM. Pardon me. If the volunteer system of raising troops depends simply upon victories and success, that of itself proves it to be a failure.

Mr. REED. The Senator must not misquote me.

Mr. BECKHAM. I would not intentionally misquote the Senator.

Mr. REED. I did not say that it was defeats that prevented enlistments. I said it was defeats that dissipated the Army.

Mr. BECKHAM. Where were the volunteers?

Mr. REED. An army that was whipped naturally dwindled. Some of the men are killed, and some of them get put in prison, and some of them scattered.

Mr. BECKHAM. But could not their rank be easily filled by other volunteers?

Mr. REED. Oh, well, they could have been if there had been men to volunteer and if there had been patriotism; and I met that by telling you what the fact was—and it is a fact that we say under our breath, but readers of history know it to be true—that a very large proportion of the people at the time of the Revolution were in fact Tories.

Mr. BECKHAM. Continuing the answer to the Senator's question, the casualties from death and from wounds do not by any means account for this considerable dimunition in the number of troops. Now, the other reason that the Senator gave is even stronger confirmation of the position we take. He said that short enlistments were partly responsible, and that is true. Men enlisted only for three or six months volunteered, and when their time expired they exercised their right and went out of the Army without reenlistment. That volunteer spirit did not induce enough of them to reenlist, even though the Colonies were struggling for their existence. So I take it that the Senator has answered these questions for us by the explanation he gave.

Mr. REED. I am glad that the Senator is so well satisfied. Now, let me ask him a question.

Mr. BECKHAM. All right sir.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell me if conscription, which he admits was tried in the Revolutionary War, did not break down, and if it was not a failure?

Mr. BECKHAM. As I understand, it was applied for a while only in two States.

Mr. REED. I just read the authority that they tried it generally.

Mr. BECKHAM. They tried it in Massachusetts and in Virginia.

Mr. REED. The Continental Congress tried it. Well, it was a failure anyway, was it not? It did not get us anywhere, did it?

Mr. BECKHAM. Well, Mr. President, if the draft or conscription is a failure, then certainly volunteering would be a failure.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it does not follow.

Mr. BECKHAM. If you can not compel them by law to serve, how could you expect them to volunteer?

Mr. REED. Well, now, let us see about that. About how many men volunteered in the great Civil War on the Northern side? I gave the figures the other day—considerably over 2,000,000. How many men did you get by conscription? Less than 2 per cent. The conscription was a failure. Volunteering was a success. Will the Senator tell me of a war that this country has ever fought where conscription has been of any real aid? So it would appear that conscription, although it has been tried in every one of our wars, has broken down and has been a complete failure. It also follows, whatever defects may have developed in the volunteer system, that with all of its defects the volunteer system has won every war for us that we have ever had, unless you count the War of 1812 a defeat, and in that instance almost the single bit of glory we obtained on the land came from Jackson and his Tennessee volunteers. So you get down to the point, if you are going to argue upon what has been a failure and what has been a success, that in this country drafting has always been a failure, an ignominious, an inglorious failure, while the volunteer system has always succeeded even with all its defects.

While I am on the floor I want to reply to another observation. The Senator states that if this country was absolutely menaced by Germany and the troops of Germany were about to land, he thinks we could get some volunteers, but it would then be too late; he states likewise it would be too late to draft men, for they would be raw levies. So that illustration gets us nowhere.

We all admit that we ought to raise an army at once. The Senator and all of us are at one on that. We agree that the army should be of the exact size named in this bill. The sole question is whether when you desire to raise an army you shall stand here and say to men who come offering their services, "We will not take you." That is the sole question; that is all there is left of it. It is a question whether you are going to refuse men who come voluntarily and insist that the only men you will receive are those who come under a forced conscription.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association touching the espionage bill, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 25, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the convention of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association at the Waldorf-Astoria, Wednesday afternoon, April 25:

"Resolved, That the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing the daily newspapers, requests Congress to eliminate the press-censorship provision from the espionage bill now pending. The proposed legislation strikes at the fundamental rights of the people, not only assailing their freedom of speech, but also seeking to deprive them of the means of forming intelligent opinion. It is drastic, yet vague in its terms, providing the severest penalties for acts the criminal quality of which is to be defined hereafter. Under a delegated authority its possible consequences in restricting the liberty of the press are full of peril to free institutions. The censorship proposed is believed to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits Congress from 'abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.' An effort to suspend this constitutional guarantee, whether ultimately sustained or not, is sure to be followed by grave injury to the rights of the people whose one great safeguard in time of war is an untrammelled press. A voluntary censorship, suggested by the Government, is being carefully observed by the newspapers of the United States, and no loyal newspaper will knowingly print that which would give aid to the enemy. Any newspaper that willfully publishes information of military value to the enemy can and should be prosecuted under the law of treason. Established means of communication carrying messages ordinarily regarded as private will be used by an enemy for the transmission of information, and every proper purpose of the proposed legislation would be served by the control of outgoing messages by mail, telegraph, cable, etc., and by search of the effects of persons traveling from the United States to foreign countries. In war especially the press should be free, vigilant, and unfettered. The American people are entitled to a full and frank statement of all that occurs, whether it be good or bad. There can be no justification for a restriction that abridges the liberty of the press, for the people must have confidence that they are getting the truth. The defeat of this objectionable legislation therefore is most earnestly urged upon Congress."

The following resolution was also unanimously adopted:

"Whereas our country is in a state of war with Germany; and
"Whereas the responsibility for the successful and honorable prosecution of the war rests on the President; and
"Whereas he and the General Staff have devised and are advocating the passage of measures deemed by them necessary in carrying out the grim business committed to them, and these measures are now pending in Congress.

"Therefore we, the members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association assembled in convention, believing that duty in this hour calls for support of the President and for willingness to share in all responsibility which American citizenship imposes, whether in bearing arms in the present crisis or preparing to the end that future emergency may be averted, do hereby "Resolve, That we pledge our hearty and undivided support to the administration in its plans for military preparedness. And believing that the failure of the administration measures for the raising of land and naval forces would be regarded at home and abroad as a severe blow to the effectiveness of our arms, and would, in fact, result in giving aid and comfort to the enemy, we urge the Congress to pass without delay the bills supported by the War Department and indorsed by the President providing for the enrollment of all men capable of bearing arms in the conflict and any measures necessary for the future creation and maintenance of an effective military force."

HOPEWELL ROGERS,
President.
JOHN STEWART BRYAN,
Secretary American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The joint resolution is as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 25, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Washington, D. C.:

In compliance with the provisions of assembly joint resolution No. 23, by J. A. Pettis, of the sixth district, adopted by the California Legislature to-day, I am sending you a true copy thereof, in title and words as follows:

"Whereas in this hour of grave necessity many of our brothers are called upon to leave their usual employments and professions and enter upon the service of our country; and
"Whereas the offering of themselves for such service entails much sacrifice and real material loss; and
"Whereas the compensation allowed the American soldier even in times of war is inadequate and insufficient to meet his ordinary needs when in service or to permit him to contribute toward the care and comfort of those dependent upon him whose burden of suffering and deprivation is his greatest concern; and
"Whereas some relief of the existing conditions would have a tendency to strengthen, encourage, and sustain the soldier in the discharge of his duties and his dependents in their great sacrifices; and
"Whereas those loyal Americans not engaged in active service should be willing to lighten the burden of the soldier and take upon themselves some part of patriotic sacrifice: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly and senate jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California does hereby most respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to provide as expeditiously as possible a fairer and more adequate compensation for those engaged in active service in the Army and Navy of the United States."

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of Assembly.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENESEE COUNTY DENTAL SOCIETY,
Flint, Mich., April 17, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: To avoid causing you the inconvenience of a number of personal letters the undersigned, members of the Genesee County Dental Society petition you to use your influence in securing the passage of amendments which are being urged by the National Dental Association to the universal training bill.

The sections I refer to are section 17 and section 29 of this bill. The things we desire are briefly as follows:

First. A clause to recognize the contract or acting dental surgeon's service of members of the present corps. That is, the service rendered before they were commissioned be allowed toward promotion.

Second. Strike out paragraph 2, section 29, as this only affects these two corps, and in view of the importance of the dental surgeon's service is not fair to him.

Third. Provide a head for the Dental Corps with the rank of colonel, to be connected with the Surgeon General's Office. The increased number of dental officers should emphasize this.

Assuring you of our appreciation of any efforts you may make in our behalf, we are,

Yours, sincerely,
C. H. Matson, secretary; J. H. Beckwith, F. M. Annis, C. U. Walker, R. Nowack, E. A. Ross, M. C. Hutchins, R. Brown, C. F. Cantor, W. N. Miller, R. Lown, B. F. Miller, jr., L. E. Aldrich, F. M. Locy, E. C. Ryle, M. J. O'Neil, H. Mogford, J. H. Cunnington, J. H. Taylor, Wm. R. Davis, J. K. Paul, R. G. Fralick, H. I. Clark, A. M. Ritchie.

Whereas the Congress and President of the United States of America, having been forced to reluctantly declare and proclaim to the world that a state of war exists between the United States of America and the Imperial Government of Germany—a proclamation that was forced from them because of the broken promises, treaty relations ignored, the laws of nations trampled upon, the dignity and honor of the American Republic insulted, sneezed at, and held up to the world in ridicule;

Whereas the people of Grand Haven wish to express their sentiment as being fully in accord with our Government: Therefore be it

Resolved—

First. That we, the people of Grand Haven, at a great mass meeting, held in the Armory of Company F, Thirty-second Michigan Infantry, this 16th day of April, 1917, do hereby pledge our unqualified support, our lives, and sacred honor to aid our country in its hour of peril, and further stand ready to answer any call for duty that our country may require.

Second. We urge that Congress immediately enact into law the authority to fill the ranks of the Regular Army, the National Guard, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Naval Militia to a full war footing by means of a selective draft from the young men of the Republic of the ages of 18 to 25, inclusive, and that the same continue until such a time as our Government or State may by other process provide a reserve force, from which may be drawn by the Government or State the necessary recruits to maintain the Federal or State units up to war strength.

The following preamble and resolutions are presented at a general mass assembly of the citizens of Kalamazoo County, Mich., held at the armory in the city of Kalamazoo, April 19, 1917:

"Whereas our Nation has been forced into war in order to protect the lives and property of our citizens and to defend the principles for which our forefathers mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, and that the Nation now needs the assistance of every true and loyal citizen; and

"Whereas the Chief Executive of the United States has formulated and presented plans for increasing the Army and Navy to meet the important crisis before us, and has called upon our people to join in common cause in defending and protecting our rights and in carrying the blessings of freedom, which we enjoy, to others, even though they may now be our enemies, and that to accomplish these purposes there be provision made for universal military training and enforced military service; and

"Whereas Michigan has always rallied around the flag whenever the Nation has called for help, and it intends to do so now: Therefore the citizens of Kalamazoo County in mass convention assembled join together in support of these resolutions:

"Resolved—

"First. That our country needs the services in the Army and Navy of sufficient men to carry our banner to victory; that it also needs volunteers in civil life, who will care for those who may be injured or disabled in the conflict, and to aid the dependents of those who are on the firing line, and still others are wanted in our manufactories and on the farms and in the gardens, for the purpose of furnishing the necessary material and food for the military forces and our civil population, and that every loyal and patriotic citizen should act in accord with every other one to carry forward this work by the employment of their time, their money, and their energies and by making all necessary sacrifices.

"Second. That we are eminently proud to note that our Delegates in Congress were among the first in all the States of the Union to pass a resolution to stand back of the President in his plans for national defense.

"Third. That we are to-day all Americans, irrespective of where we or our ancestors may have been born. We can all trace our lineage from some foreign land, but the very fact that we, and those before us, left some other country and took up our residences here gives positive proof that we and they preferred the liberal laws and desired to enjoy the extended rights vouchsafed to us in this United States to anything which is offered by any other nation on earth and neither political opinion, religious belief, wealth or poverty, social distinction or otherwise, race or previous condition of servitude, should sway us from dutiful loyalty to our country.

"Fourth. We congratulate the noble men who have come voluntarily forward and offered themselves through enlistment for service at this time of the Nation's need, and we honor them and those who may hereafter join them for their patriotism and their loyalty. Our prayers are for their safety and our hopes for their speedy return to our midst. We who are left in the community of which they have been members pledge to them that we will not only do all we can for them during their absence but we will not be wanting in our hearty greetings and in extending them proper honors when they, with victory, march home again.

"Fifth. That we stand in unreserved and full support of the policies of Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States and Commander in Chief of our Armies.

"We believe the position taken by him for universal military training and for selective draft for military service, as approved by our Army leaders, is the correct and only proper mode of establishing in the shortest possible time an efficient soldiery; this, however, not to interfere with voluntary enlistment in the manner and for the purposes proposed by him.

"We not only pledge our support to President Wilson upon these questions but we offer him our aid in all legitimate ways that we may be able to serve to the end that we may be successful in the great task which is set before us, that our flag may not only continue to float unsullied over our own land, but that its folds may protect the downtrodden of other lands and bring new hope and inspiration to the people of all the earth."

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. FRANCE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very glad that my friend the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has reappeared on the scene. I want to say some nice things about him a little later. After delivering a very eloquent argument yesterday he disappeared, seeming to think he had entirely proven his cause; but he seems to have changed his mind and decided it needs a little more bolstering up, and he has reappeared upon the scene, and will probably have to reappear each day for several days to bolster it up more and more, for it needs bolstering.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know what the Senator means by saying I have reappeared on the scene.

Mr. MYERS. I mean he did not take any further part in the argument from the time he closed his speech yesterday until now.

Mr. REED. I was in the Senate until the moment of the recess last evening. I was in the Senate all of this morning except when I went out to get some lunch. I came in the Senate immediately after my lunch, because I had been notified that the Senator from Montana was to speak. I am now standing here, and am about to sit down to listen to what he has to say. I do not know why he should remark about my appearing and disappearing.

Mr. MYERS. I did not mean to charge the Senator with any dereliction in his attendance upon the Senate, but I meant reappearing in the argument. It is very unusual for him to keep out of an argument for 24 hours. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. REED. I did not catch the last of the Senator's statement.

Mr. MYERS. I say that it is a very unusual thing for the Senator to keep out of an argument for 24 hours. Now, if the Senator will sit still for a little while I mean to say some nice things about him.

Being a member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, I have given this subject some thought and I crave the privilege of expressing to the Senate some of the views to which my thoughts have led. I am the more impelled to do so on account of some statements made yesterday in the very brilliant speech by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which was a very able effort, a fine oration, but which, in my opinion, was very much marred by a large number of fallacies which it contained. I shall endeavor before I finish to call attention to some of those fallacies.

This country is entering upon the most gigantic task of its existence. It is engaged in war with the most powerful, the most relentless, the most resourceful, the most remorseless, the most militaristic, the most determined, the most persistent nation on the face of the earth. The German soldier is the best-trained soldier in the world and therefore is the best fighter in the world to-day, as I believe events on the theater of the war for the last two years and nine months have proven. The German military machine is the most powerful and best organized military machine that the world has ever known. The present German Army I believe to be the best equipped, the best drilled, the most efficient, and best fighting force that the world has ever seen. Germany is a dangerous nation to fool with. It is a dangerous nation with which to become entangled. Armed to the teeth, prepared for many years past, utterly disregardful of its treaty obligations, wholly disregardful of the rights of neutrals, entirely disregardful of the rules of international law and of the common and ordinary rules of humane warfare, it appears to be ready at any time with slight provocation or without any provocation at all to attack and endeavor to crush any power that may cross its path or thwart its purposes, regardless of right or wrong.

I believe the German Kaiser to be the most forceful military character in the world to-day, and I say military character because while not in the field in direct charge of his armies he is the inspiring soul and spirit of this war. If he should drop dead, I believe the war would end in a very short time. As an executive official in the conduct of war, I believe he will rank with Julius Cæsar, Alexander the Great, and Napoleon Bonaparte. I say this without any admiration for the man, his purposes, motives, or methods whatever, because there is nobody who feels greater antipathy to his principles, his motives, his methods, and his militarism than do I. I believe that if the German Kaiser had it in his power he would rather blow up the universe with everything and everybody on it than to suffer defeat in the war in which he is now engaged; and that, I believe, is a feeling which is not characteristic of him alone. Determination and persistence are characteristic of the German people. I believe there are citizens of Germany who rather than suffer defeat in this gigantic contest would, if they could, blow the world into smithereens and tidbits and end the existence of everything and everybody on it. I believe there are German chemists who, if they were able to invent explosive instruments large enough and powerful enough, would do that very thing rather than suffer defeat.

It is this powerful and determined force with which we are about to engage in combat. I am not one of those who draw a fine line of distinction between the German Government and the German people, either. I am not one of those who can see how we can be fighting the German Government without fighting the German people; how we can fight the German nation without having any war with the German people. It is my understanding that people compose a country, and that a country is pretty typical of its government. The people make the government, or at least submit to it. We are at war to-day not with an invisible, intangible government but with the German people, people who, I believe, in a large measure share the powerful determination of their Government to overcome all opposition at all odds, no matter if all other nations of the world grapple in deadly combat with them.

Many of the people of the German Empire celebrated the affair when one of their submarines sank the Lusitania, and we have had many instances of their intense feeling against the people of this country whenever our Government chose to assert its rights on the sea or in any way to interfere with German ideas of ruthless warfare, disregardful of all the rules of humanity. This is the people with which we are engaged in war to-day. They are powerful opponents, too.

If this war had been left to be fought out between the entente allies and the central powers, I doubt very much if the entente allies would have prevailed in the end. For a long time I thought they would, but for some months past I have seriously doubted it. I believe that had the war been fought to a finish between the original combatants, when the last trench was dug at the boundary of the German Empire, when the Germans had been driven upon their own territory and had made a stand on their own ground, had made their last stand, they could and would have stood all the onslaughts of the entente allies for an indefinite period. The war might have continued under those conditions for years, and, in my opinion, it would quite likely have been a peace without victory, a war waged to a point of exhaustion on both sides, where neither one would have prevailed. Of course now that we are engaged in it there must be peace with victory. There can be no other termination; there can be no other conclusion; there can be no other spirit with which we enter upon this world-wide combat.

There are many things that induce us to enter upon it with that spirit. We are not only fighting to maintain our rights on the highways of the world, the high seas, where we have a right to be with our commerce, but we are fighting for the democracy of other nations. We are fighting to make secure the democracy of other peoples of the world and to make secure to others some of the rights of liberty and democracy that we have so long enjoyed.

While it must be now a war to the finish, while it must be a war to end in peace with victory, and the victory on the right side, yet we have engaged in a large undertaking, and the war may last for a long time yet. Germany, reports indicate, has from eight to ten millions of men under arms, and the reports are that there are many other younger men coming to the age of bearing arms to take the places of those who are killed on the field of battle and to fill up the decimated ranks. If they are driven within their own lines and intrench themselves upon their own territory, it may yet resolve itself into a question of starvation, one of the means of modern warfare, and when it comes to that, unless we carefully husband our resources, unless we stop waste, and unless the food crops of Great Britain and France and the United States are increased, it may be a question as to which side must first feel the pangs of starvation. On that point I clipped from a newspaper this morning a significant telegram which, to my mind, is worthy of serious thought, and I will read it:

LONDON, April 25.

The British public was solemnly warned to-day by Lord Devonport, the British food controller, that the country's shipping was being depleted daily in large volume and that severe privations menaced the nation before the next harvest was reached. Lord Devonport's warning was issued in the House of Lords in response to a question by Lord Lamington as to what success had attended the efforts at voluntary rationing and whether the Government intended to resort to compulsion.

In a long reply Lord Devonport recited the extensive efforts being made by the press, pulpit, and schools, and also by local committees, to impress on the community the urgency of food restrictions.

He said that it might be described as a general election on a grand scale, with the view of soliciting the allegiance of every citizen, particularly the women, to reduce their consumption of bread. He continued:

"If our shipping resources were assured, we could undoubtedly carry on, but they are not assured. Our shipping is being depleted every day in large volume, and although our existence depends thereupon, it is at the moment a wasting security. As there is no immediate prospect of our locked-up shipping being released from its present occupation, we have to face this grim fact. * * *

"Unless we exercise sufficiency of self-denial in the consumption of bread, I tell you the blunt truth, we shall not get through to next harvest without severe privation and all that it involves."

There are many factors which render the duration of this gigantic contest of uncertain prolongation. It is possible that a separate peace may be made between Germany and some of the entente allies. It is possible that there may be at almost any time a separate peace between Germany and Russia. I hope not and believe not, but you never can tell what will happen in times of peace, much less in time of war; and if Russia should drop out of this contest the United States Government would have to take its place and even do more.

I clipped out of a morning newspaper this morning the views of a newspaper correspondent on this subject, one who has recently returned from the theater of war, and I will read, in part, what he says:

The United States must act at once to save Russia, for if Russia is allowed to slip out of the war this summer by making a separate peace, as she will probably be forced to do, even with a new rule by 12 most capable men hampered by German intrigue, American soldiers will have to take the places of the Russian peasants in the struggle, and the United States will have to pay in the blood of thousands of its men, just as the European nations are doing.

"Let Germany know that America will be able to furnish 5,000,000 men in 1918, 1919, 1920, and the war will be over in a year, and we won't have to send more than an expeditionary force to Europe," he said. "But if we raise a trifling army of 500,000 to 1,000,000 men, it is quite possible that the war will last at least three years, and we may lose a million on the west front alone.

"If Petrograd is taken, the greatest munition and manufacturing base in Russia will be taken, the Russian fleet in the Baltic would be isolated, the lines of communication between England and Russia will be threatened, and the trans-Siberian Railroad will be given a terrific burden," he said.

"The Government must commence striking at the enemy with every means which is at its disposal—moral, financial, economic, and military," he added

I indulge in these preliminary remarks on the nature of the contest in which we have engaged for the purpose of showing my belief that we must raise a large army, and that we ought to send troops to Europe to take part in the actual fighting over there. I believe that the 500,000 troops which are provided for in this bill will be only a beginning. I believe as soon as they are mobilized and the work of training them shall be begun there ought to be a levy of another half million troops, that that ought to be followed again in turn with a million more, and that we ought to raise two or three million men and prepare them for this contest; and we may have to raise 5,000,000 and more than 5,000,000 before we see the end of the contest.

I am glad to know, from the disposition manifested in Congress and from the message from the President on the subject of raising an army, that it is the disposition of the Government manifestly to send an army to Europe to take part in the fighting there, and that it is not to be on our part a war on paper only nor a war with dollars only, which would be un-American and a disgrace to our people and would blast the reputation of the American people and make the name of America a byword and a reproach for a thousand years to come and probably as long as time would last.

At this point I had intended to read with my very hearty approval a part of an address delivered some months ago in this city by Col. George Harvey on the subject of this country sending troops to Europe to take part in the war there. It has been read in the Senate before. I intended to read it for a different purpose and from a different motive, but I find I have it not with me, and, as time is slipping by, I will not send for it, and hence will not read it. I will say that the address expressed my sentiments at the time it was delivered, and it embodies my sentiments now. I believe it is the true spirit in which America ought to enter this war, and I am glad to say I believe it is the spirit which has been adopted by our people in entering upon the war.

In view of the huge undertaking we have before us, what is the best way of engaging it? What is the best way of raising an army? That is the question which is confronting us to-day. In the last generation I believe there has been a greater change made, and there has been more progress in the science of warfare than there has been in any other line of human endeavor. We may take the progress made in medicine, literature, education, commerce, the industries, manufacturing, agriculture—any of the pursuits of mankind—and I believe there has been more change wrought in the science of warfare, more progress made in it, than in any activity to which the hand of man is given.

Warfare is an entirely different thing now from what it was a generation ago. It is an entirely different thing from what it was when we waged our last war—the Spanish-American War. We can not now count upon waging a war by having men flock to the camps, the centers of training, as they did some generations ago, as the frontiersmen of Tennessee did when they turned out with their coonskin caps and squirrel rifles and offered their services to their Government. That was very loyal and patriotic in them, and they did good service in their day; but this war will not be won by coonskin caps and squirrel guns; that the old way of organizing volunteer forces of anybody who may come along haphazard and offer his services—and I suppose very few were refused—the old way of organizing a volunteer force and electing as brigadier general some country lawyer in Kentucky who makes the rounds of the circuit and makes speeches on the front steps of the courthouse on the opening day of the term of court, because he can make a good speech and can appeal to the sentiments of the boys, he expecting to use the position of brigadier general as a stepping-stone to being elected governor of his State and thereafter United States Senator; and electing as colonel of the regiment some likely young lawyer who is a good hand to get around among the boys, a good hand to slap fellows on the back, a good handshaker and mixer—that is not the fighting method of the people with whom we are going to war in Europe to-day. The present war in Europe is not being conducted on that plan. The system of waging war has changed, and the question with us is, What is the best way to raise an army to send to Europe to take our part in the war as one of the great powers, one of the foremost nations of the world? Concretely it is, Shall it be conscription or volunteers? That is the question before us.

How are we to determine that? I have a number of methods by which I have determined it in my mind. To begin with, our President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, his entire Cabinet, the entire War Department, all of the Army officers, the War College, the General Staff, the management of the Military Academy at West Point, the management of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, are all united in believing that conscription is the better plan, and they are earnestly advising and urging that plan. Of course we are not bound by that advice; nobody would suggest such folly; nobody would think of it; but we should take that into consideration and carefully weigh it along with all other factors in making so vital a decision. The undertaking upon which we are now embarking is so grave that I believe we should take into consideration any argument that appears to be based on reason and judgment which is presented to us, no matter from what source it may come, and should carefully weigh it in connection with all other influences before us in arriving at a decision.

I undertake to say that every modern military critic, every military author, who has written a book, a treatise, or a paper on the science of modern warfare has advocated conscription as the best means of raising an army in an emergency, in war time. I do not know of a single author who has written a book or a treatise on the subject who advocates volunteering in preference to conscription as a method of raising an army in war time.

If there is any such, it has not come to my attention; and I defy the opponents of this bill to produce a single volume by any modern writer on warfare which comes out squarely and argues in favor of the volunteer system in preference to conscription in raising an army in war time. If there is any, I have not heard of it. All of the military authorities of which I have heard strongly advocate conscription as the best method of raising an army in war time. Are we to pay no attention to these authorities? Are we to give them no consideration whatever? Are they worth nothing in deciding this momentous question? If I have litigation to conduct, I go to a lawyer; if I am sick, I go to a physician; if I want dental work done, I go to a dentist; if I want a horse shod, I go to a blacksmith; and I believe it is a pretty good rule when one wants information about how to raise and equip an army and how to conduct a war to go to military authorities, those who have made that subject a lifelong study, some of them being men whom we have educated for the very purpose of giving us their advice and information on the subject. They devote their lives to the study of this question; they study it not only in this country but they study it in foreign countries; they study it from the standpoint of the history of all the world from the beginning of recorded time.

As to raising an army, I believe it is one of the most substantial parts of waging a war. It is the beginning. You may say it is the foundation. If you go to build a house, you first lay the foundation, and then erect thereon the superstructure. Just so with waging war; the raising, equipping, training, drilling, and mobilizing of an army is the laying of the foundation. Where do we need expert advice more than on that important part of the work?

We have institutions at West Point and Annapolis where we train men for the profession of fighting, and unless their opinions are worth something to us, we might as well turn the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis into agricultural schools, and make our officers of the Army and of the General Staff landscape gardeners, or something of that kind, at which they might be valuable to us and might serve some useful purpose. So, I say, that all the expert advice which we have, all our experts in the profession of war, all those who belong to that department of the Government, so far as I am able to learn, very earnestly advocate conscription as the best method of raising an army in war times. We have that to begin with, and I think it is entitled to very much weight and consideration.

What next is my reason for saying that conscription is the better method? The examples that we have before us to-day. Every nation engaged in this great war in Europe is to-day working under conscription, as I understand—Germany, France, Great Britain, Russia, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Turkey—there is not one of those countries which is not working under the system of conscription or of some compulsory method of military service.

Great Britain was the last to come to it, of course. The others, according to my information, adopted it at the start. Great Britain did not adopt it at the start, but has since come to it; and I believe it is practically the unanimous opinion of all public men in England, to-day, in charge of the conduct of the war, that it was a mistake that conscription was not resorted to sooner in that country. They say so; they tell us that it was a mistake and that they wish they had resorted to it sooner. They say they now see where their mistake was made and how they would be better off if they had adopted conscription sooner. It may be that the temper of the British people was such that they would not have stood conscription without serious trouble at the outbreak of the war, because probably the majority of the English people were not directly and personally interested in the prosecution of the war at the beginning, and did not understand what it meant to them.

It has been said that conscription would have produced rioting in England. I do not know how that may be. It may be true that it would have produced riots had conscription been adopted at the beginning of the war. I have also heard some suggestions of rioting and rebellion against conscription in this country. We have heard something said about draft riots during the Civil War; but I undertake to say that if conscription is put in force in this country in this war rioting will be unheard of. The American people are too patriotic and loyal for such a thing.

It is true that there were some draft riots in New York during the Civil War, and there may have been a few in some other places, but I believe the principal riots occurred in New York City. However, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Civil War was a fight between brethren; it was a fight between Americans, and there were very many people in the North who were loath to take up arms against their brethren in the South. At the outbreak of the war Horace Greeley said of the seceding States, "Let the erring sisters go in peace"; he opposed any attempt at coercion, and there were many thousands of people in the North who were opposed to coercing the seceding States. They felt they would be taking up arms against their brothers, and very many were lukewarm in the prosecution of the war for a long time after it was started.

I believe if it had been made known at the beginning of the war that one of the results of the war would be the abolition of slavery there would have been hundreds of thousands in the Northern States who would have refused to have taken any part in the war or to take up arms against their southern brethren. So the conditions which prevailed then are not like the conditions to-day at all.

I recall no rioting to amount to anything during the Civil War outside of New York City, and in that city there was a large foreign population, which, I presume, was not much concerned in our internecine struggle and did not care much about shouldering arms and taking part in the conflict.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with great pleasure.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that the draft rioting in New York occurred entirely in the sections where the foreign population largely predominated.

Mr. MYERS. That is just what I was leading to. I had that in mind and had suggested it; but I thank the Senator for confirming it.

Mr. CALDER. It was in a measure also caused by the fact that at the beginning of the war those drafted were allowed to purchase substitutes; and it was not until the draft law was changed, giving to the conscript a very large bounty, a bounty equal to what a man would have to pay for a substitute, that the feeling in New York against the draft subsided.

Mr. MYERS. It is true there were a few draft riots in New York City, but the conditions are entirely different now.

During the Civil War there was more conscription in the South than there was in the North. There was more conscription in the Confederacy than there was in the Union. The Confederate Government resorted to conscription in the second year of the war, and started out by drafting every white male citizen between the ages of 18 and 35 years; but before the war was over the draft extended to every white male citizen between the ages of 18 and 50 years. So there was more conscription in the Confederacy than in the North, but nobody ever heard of any rioting in the South against conscription.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will permit an interruption for a moment, I want to say that I received this morning a letter from an old Confederate soldier, formerly colonel in the Confederate Army, a volunteer who went out in 1861, who says: "If we in the South had had sense enough to enact a draft law in April, 1861, instead of waiting until April, 1862, we would have whipped the Yankees in eight months."

Mr. MYERS. I never heard it expressed in exactly that way before, that they "would have whipped the Yankees in eight months"; I never heard so short a time mentioned; but I have heard men of excellent military knowledge say that if the Confederacy had resorted to conscription at the beginning of the war and had armed a considerable number of the slaves early in the war, as was contemplated later in the war, the Southern Confedercy would have established its independence and would have won that conflict.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator himself does not believe that, does he?

Mr. MYERS. I am not a military critic; I am not a military man, and it seems to me that it is unreasonable, and I may say absurd, for men who are not military men to set up their judgment against those who are military men and who make military affairs their life profession. As to my belief, I can hardly say I do believe it, because the North so far exceeded the South in population, money, resources, and ability to send to foreign nations and import men and supplies; but I believe if the Confederacy had adopted conscription at the beginning of the war and armed a goodly number of its slaves, as was discussed later, the gigantic struggle would have been prolonged probably several years. It might have been prolonged as long as eight years, as long as the Revolutionary War was.

I will say here that I am very glad that such was not the case; I am very glad that the Union was preserved, and that we to-day enjoy the beneficent benefits and blessings of a united country, which is, I believe, the best and greatest Nation of the earth, which could not be so if it were divided. I say that notwithstanding the fact that all of my kinsmen who took any part in that struggle fought in the Confederate Army to dismember the Union. I believe, though, that if the South had resorted to conscription earlier it would have put up a much harder and more prolonged fight than it did. I believe if the United States had resorted to conscription at the beginning of the Civil War that conflict would have ended far sooner than it did, and that many thousands of lives and much blood and treasure and property that were sacrificed in the vortex of war would have been saved to humanity to have been of some benefit to the world.

Speaking of military authorities, Gen. Upton says, in his work entitled "The Military Policy of the United States," that the Confederacy was tottering and about to fall in the second year of the war and could have lasted only a few months longer if the Confederate Government had not put conscription in force; and that by putting conscription in force it was enabled to carry on the war between three and four years longer and to tax the power of the United States Government to its utmost to suppress the rebellion. He proves that in his work to my entire satisfaction, and gives the reasons and the facts and the figures for his contention. It seems to me that his argument should be conclusive to anyone who will carefully read it.

Now, we are engaging in war with the greatest military machine in the world. I believe that it is justifiable sometimes to fight the devil with his own weapons, to fight the devil with fire, and that the best way to combat a military machine is to organize a little military machine of our own for the time being—and it may be that it should not be very little, either, before we get through.

I do not believe anybody will deny that the German Army has done as good fighting in the face of great odds in the last two years and nine months as has ever been done in the history of the world. There are no volunteers in that army. They are not depending upon volunteers. No; they make the individual a cog in the machine for the conduct of war; and, in my opinion, that is what we will have to do to win the struggle in which we are now engaged.

It is said that conscription is objectionable to the Anglo-Saxon people—I have heard that expression used on the floor of the Senate during this debate—that it is contrary to the sentiments, principles, and traditions of the Anglo-Saxon people. Yet it is my understanding that the German people are Anglo-Saxon; they are part of the Anglo-Saxon race or division of mankind, according to my understanding, and are the people from whom the English sprang in the beginning of their separate existence. Yet we have never heard of conscription being contrary to the principles of the German people.

Oh, it is said that conscription involves force, and that an American citizen should not be forced to do anything. I claim that force is back of all organized society. Organized society is maintained by force—the force of popular will, the force of public opinion, the force of public sentiment, the force of the will of the majority—but it is force nevertheless. Any government which does not have force back of it will not long maintain its existence. It need not be a tyrannical nor a despotic force. It ought to be the force of the popular will, of the majority, of the rule of the people, but it is force nevertheless. So force is not unknown to organized society in peace as well as in war.

Why, every function of our Government is sustained by force. A man is compelled to pay his taxes. He does not pay them voluntarily. I think very few pay them voluntarily, out of pure patriotism and loyalty. The majority pay their taxes because they have to pay them. Universal education, compulsory education, is maintained in nearly every State of the Union by force of law. Road work is done by force. Jury service is exacted by force. Every function of organized society has force back of it, and if it did not have force back of it, it would not amount to anything. So that conscription is no different from any other function of organized government when it has force back of it. The argument that force is objectionable might be applied to everything that is done under the power of organized government; if we have no force we will have no government.

It was force that preserved the Union in 1865. It was force that caused the seceding States to come back into the Union. Nothing but force sustained this Government in that great crisis, the greatest of its life. Had it not been for the prevalence of force, we would now have divided governments; and if the Confederacy had succeeded there is one thing about its theory of government that I never could fully understand—how the 13 States which constituted the Confederate Government would have been held together after they achieved their independence. There were 11 States that seceded. Missouri and Kentucky were admitted to the Confederacy by courtesy, because they made an attempt to secede, although not entirely successful, Federal troops interfering in the plans, and they were allowed representation in the Confederate Congress, representatives and senators; and if the Confederacy had succeeded, and those 13 States, on their theory of government, had established an independent government or confederation of States, I have never been able to see what would have held them together. It seems to me that any State which felt a grievance, which became offended, which did not like the way the joint government was conducted, would inevitably have seceded from the Confederate States, and that in time there would likely have been 13 little governments, each one separate and independent to itself; and that is one reason why I believe, in the providence of God, it is a blessing to the people of this country that the Confederacy—as much as I revere its memory and those who took part in it—did not succeed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. KING. While, of course, it is not pertinent to the very able discussion in which the Senator is engaged, he asked the question with respect to the tie which would have bound the States together if the Confederate States had prevailed. Does not the Senator find in the great resolutions known as the Kentucky and the Virginia resolutions, particularly the latter, the criterion to determine whether secession was permissible or not permissible?

Mr. MYERS. It has been a long time since I read those resolutions. My recollection of them is that the principal idea was declaring absolute State sovereignty and the right of secession. If there is any other prominent idea in them, I should like to have the Senator suggest it. I may have overlooked a point. I have not read the resolutions for a long time.

Mr. KING. I apologize to the Senator for diverting his mind from the theme engaging his attention——

Mr. MYERS. I would be glad to hear from the Senator from Utah on the subject.

Mr. KING. I do not think it would be proper now for me to elucidate my views with respect to the Kentucky and the Virginia resolutions; but certainly, with all due respect for the learned Senator, they are not susceptible of the construction which he places upon them.

Mr. MYERS. Did not those resolutions practically declare in favor of the doctrine of secession—that the State governments or sovereignties were superior to that of the Federal Government?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I do not think that that construction, baldly stated as the Senator has stated the proposition, is tenable.

Mr. MYERS. That has been my understanding of the intent and spirit of those resolutions. Resuming, I say that a government with no force back of it amounts to nothing at all and is no government at all.

I am inclined to believe that if a call for volunteers were made for the 500,000 troops that we are seeking to raise, in time—in a few months, probably—they would respond to that number, and we would be able to get them. There would be many things to cause delay. Young men would have to consult with parents, husbands with wives and children, and business affairs would have to be arranged, and I believe it would be a process that would take a few months, but I believe we would probably get the 500,000 volunteers. But if this is to be a great and prolonged war, as some anticipate, and as it may be, and as we ought to calculate, anyway, in entering upon preparations for it, how about the next 500,000 and the second 1,000,000 and the third 1,000,000 and maybe the fourth and the fifth 1,000,000, and perhaps even more than the fifth million that would be yet to come?

I do not believe that volunteering could be depended upon to that extent. In any war of any particular prolongation—the Revolutionary War, the War of 1861, and the present war in the case of England—conscription has been resorted to from necessity before the war was over. I anticipate that will be the way in the present war if it is to last as much as a year longer, and I doubt if anybody entertains very serious ideas of its ending in less than a year.

Now, if we are to get the first 500,000 soldiers by volunteers, as I am willing to concede, after a delay of some months, perhaps, it may be asked, as it was asked yesterday, why resort to conscription? Why is conscription any better than volunteering?

I will say that even if we could get the first 500,000, even if we could get the first 1,000,000 troops by volunteering, there are a number of reasons, in my opinion, why conscription is superior to volunteering.

In the first place, as I have said, I do not believe volunteering would last all through the war. I believe it would come to a premature end. I believe we would have to resort to the draft before the end of the war, and then you have the old-time discrimination and idea of odium that exists in the minds of some people as to those who are conscripted. I do not think it ought to exist. I do not think there is anything dishonorable about being conscripted. I think the man who answers his country's call in the form of a conscript order and goes to his country's rescue in its hour of peril and does a soldier's duty as a soldier is entitled to all honor. But in the minds of some—and I am told particularly those engaged in the Army and in Army circles—there exists some reflection upon those who wait to be conscripted; and that would arise in this war if we had part volunteers and in the end had to have part conscripted soldiers. Feeling sure that the war will last a year or more, I therefore believe that we ought to take the methodical plan and resort to the draft from the beginning, so that all will serve their country alike, so that there will be no caste distinction and no sneers, no slurs, no discrimination in the matter of those who wait to respond to the draft. The businesslike way, the methodical way, the sensible way, if you feel you are going to have part volunteers and part conscripts, is to resort to the draft in the first place and have them all alike.

In the second place, what I think is a far better and superior reason, I believe that the draft serves our country's purposes better in time of war. It puts the entire matter in the hands of the Government, which must be in control of the war. Now, you may decry militarism; you may regard military officers as satraps and petty tyrants; you may inveigh all you please against the war spirit; but in war times, in order to win, there has to be some controlling power at the helm of the Army. There has to be some hand at the throttle that controls. There must be absolute control. We all know that; and I believe it is better, right in the beginning, to make that control complete and put it into the hands of the Government to say who shall be called to the colors and who may best serve his country in some other way.

When you call for volunteers, if we call for volunteers in this war——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. KIRBY. Is there anything in this bill that even indicates that anything is to be done except to select men for the Army between the ages of 19 and 25?

Mr. MYERS. No; not that I know of.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what you call the selective system, leaving others for——

Mr. MYERS. Yes. It is the privilege, the prerogative of the Government to say between what ages they shall serve. Of course, if we get into a war where we have to raise men by the millions, and the war lasts four or five years, or even two years, we may have to raise that age of draft from 25 to 35 or 40. The Confederacy started in with 35 as the maximum age and ended with 50. It is for the Government to say, and the authorities say—it has been stated on the floor here—that a draft of men from 19 to 25 would raise several millions of young men for the service of their country, more than we could equip and put in the field at once.

Mr. REED. Approximately six millions.

Mr. MYERS. Yes. I was just going to call on the Senator from Missouri for the figures. He has them at his tongue's end. It would raise approximately six millions.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. It is understood that there are about 6,000,000 males between the ages of 19 and 25.

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Of course some of them would be incapacitated for service by reason of physical disabilities; I do not know what proportion.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, yes. The bill provides that those who have others dependent upon them for support may be exempted, in the discretion of the President, and provides for various other exemptions; so I take it that that provision would raise an army practically of unmarried young men with none dependent upon them for support—neither parents nor sisters nor younger brothers nor maiden aunts, nor anything of that kind. It would raise an army of young men from 19 to 25 having no one dependent upon them for support.

Now, as to ages, the history of all the world shows that boys from 18 to 21 years of age do the best fighting. They have always done the best fighting in all the wars of all time since warfare began, coincident with the existence of mankind. Why, it was boys, practically, 16, 17, 18, to 21 years of age who preserved the Union and won the victories for the Federal armies from 1861 to 1865. The ages have been read here. Why, it was boys who did the most gallant fighting and were found where the fighting was the hottest in Gen. Lee's Army from Bull Run to Appomattox and under Stonewall Jackson in his intrepid, brilliant campaigns in the Shenandoah Valley and western Virginia. It was boys who won all the glorious victories of the Civil War. It was boys——

Mr. GORE. They were volunteers.

Mr. MYERS. Yes. My friend the Senator from Oklahoma suggests that most of them were volunteers; but were those boys so craven and so stubborn that they would have fought any less valiantly if the Government had said, "Come on, boys; your services are wanted. Report at the drafting station"? Would that have diminished their patriotism and ardor?

Mr. GORE. They might not have gotten the same men.

Mr. MYERS. Why, they would have been bound to have obtained the same men. How could they have escaped?

Mr. GORE. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure for the purpose of explaining that remarkable statement.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Senator if he thinks an army of conscripted slackers would be equal to an army of patriotic volunteers?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; in large measure, because I do not believe that all conscripts are unpatriotic. I believe a man may be a conscript and may be patriotic. I am not one of those who believe that a man who was conscripted bears the brand of infamy on his brow and ought to be in a penitentiary instead of in the Army. Why, there was many a man conscripted in the Federal Army during the Civil War who was an honest man, good citizen, patriotic, and loyal, who made a good fighter and good soldier. He may not have volunteered at the beginning of the war because he may have had reasons which were amply sufficient. He may have had a family dependent upon him. He may have been engaged in business affairs which he could not abandon without great and unjustifiable sacrifice. There may have been many things which kept him out of the war. There was many a man conscripted in the Confederate Army who made a good soldier and did just as good fighting as those who rushed in at the first call for volunteers.

In September, 1915, there was a national Grand Army reunion held in this city. I was not here at that time, but I read of it and heard of it, and the old soldiers of the Grand Army, the gray and grizzled veterans, marched down Pennsylvania Avenue to the plaudits of admiring thousands of spectators. Is there anybody who would draw a line of distinction amongst those old veterans, as to whether they were volunteers or conscripts? What difference does it make? Is there anybody who believes that one is entitled to honor and the other should be the subject of dishonor? How are you going to inquire into the reason that caused a man not to rush headlong into the Army at the first call for volunteers, but to go willingly when he was drafted? How are you going to look into those reasons?

Why, when those old veterans marched down Pennsylvania Avenue the thousands who viewed them had only one thought, and that was: "These are the veterans who saved the Union and made our country what it is to-day." Did anybody stop to think, "Well, there is only a part of these men who are honorable men and who made good soldiers. Part of them were conscripts and are entitled to no honor upon this occasion"?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. REED. I take it, then, that the Senator thinks there is no difference or distinction which anybody ought to recognize or would recognize between the man who was drafted and the man who volunteered?

Mr. MYERS. I say that the man who responds to the call of his country, whether it be in the form of a call for volunteers or an order from a conscript office, and who does his duty, does a man's part as a man, does a soldier's part as a soldier, faces the enemy to the last ditch, bares his breast to the flame and shot and shell of battle, is a good citizen and is entitled to the respect of his fellow-citizens and is not entitled to the odium which has been heaped upon conscripts on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. REED. That is not just the question I am trying to arrive at.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I will try again to answer it, then.

Mr. REED. I am trying to get at this: So the Senator thinks there is no difference between the volunteer and the drafted man and thinks they are entitled to equal consideration at the hands of everybody? That is his position?

Mr. MYERS. The volunteer is entitled to some more sentimental consideration and admiration; but I do not believe that the conscript is entitled to condemnation, by any means, if he makes a good soldier.

Mr. REED. Oh, no one has condemned him.

Mr. MYERS. And very often the first man to volunteer is the first man to turn around and run away.

Mr. REED. That frequently happens.

Mr. MYERS. Why, all the Federal soldiers who ran away from Bull Run were volunteers.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I once asked an old soldier who was at the first Battle of Bull Run, "Did you run away?" He said, "Why, yes; of course. Them as didn't run away is there yet." [Laughter.] The volunteer has his shortcomings and failings as well as all other humanity.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator does not get the import of my question. I know he does not, because of the character of his answer.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I am willing to try it again.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that I am not trying to cast any aspersions upon the conscript. I am not trying to claim that the volunteer is always necessarily a brave man. I am not charging that the conscript never does his duty or alleging that the volunteer always does his duty. But I understood the Senator to say that as these old veterans marched down Pennsylvania Avenue nobody drew any line of distinction between the volunteer and the drafted man; that each had served his country and that each was entitled to the same, or substantially the same, respect. That was, I understood, the Senator's position.

Mr. MYERS. I said nobody would discriminate; that each was entitled to the veneration and admiration of his fellow citizens.

Mr. REED. Now, if that is true, and if we should call for volunteers and get the first 500,000, as the Senator concedes we might, and if later there should be calls for 500,000 more and they should volunteer, which the Senator concedes might happen——

Mr. MYERS. No; I doubt if we could get more than the first 500,000.

Mr. REED. And then if there should be subsequent calls and not a response, and then men were drafted, the Senator has argued that that would put into the Army two classes of men, and draw a distinction between those two classes of men, and subject one of them to a sort of obloquy.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; in Army circles, I said.

Mr. REED. And yet he tells us now that between the drafted men who marched down Pennsylvania Avenue and the volunteers who marched, no line could be drawn or should be drawn. I do not see how the two arguments stand together.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, they are 50 years apart. This obloquy, or class feeling, I am told, exists to some extent among the men in the Army while they are serving. After the battle is over, after the warfare has ceased, and the men who have borne the heat and burden of the day have won the vantage for their country, I think they are all entitled to respect and consideration.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator then does think there is a difference between the two?

Mr. MYERS. I am told there is some feeling against conscripts in the Army.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rises to a question of order. The Senator from Missouri will state the question.

Mr. STONE. The question is that there are a number of Senators who desire to address the Senate, and under the rule the Senator can not yield as he has been yielding. I ask that the Senator be permitted to conclude his address.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that I can yield for questions.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think it is unfortunate that that rule should be invoked just now.

Mr. MYERS. There is no rule against asking questions, and I have cheerfully yielded for questions and will continue to do so.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator desires to press that we will raise the question as to the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order having been made, the Chair is called on——

Mr. STONE. No; I am not raising it; I just make the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion having been made, it is for the benefit of the Senate and not directed to the Chair.

Mr. MYERS. I am willing for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to raise any point of order he desires and press any rule. I am speaking according to my understanding of the rule and shall stand on my rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that the Senator from Montana having yielded to the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Mississippi is at present interrogating the Senator from Montana.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was going to say, Mr. President, that I agree with the Senator from Montana that every soldier, whether a conscript or volunteer, who did his duty in the line is entitled to the respect and the gratitude of the American people, but as to their being regarded and held in the same esteem I am advised that there were Confederate camps in the South that for many years after the war would not admit a conscript to their membership, and I am not sure but that rule obtains to-day.

Mr. MYERS. But that old prejudice has worn away now.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It shows the ignominy which attaches to the man who served his country only after he was compelled to do it; and I hold that no patriotic American citizen will do that.

Mr. MYERS. It may be a very unjust ignominy. In June of this year there will be an ex-Confederate reunion here in this city, and there will be many thousands of ex-Confederate soldiers in attendance. Is there any Member of this body who would, if he could, separate them and distinguish between those who volunteered in the Confederate Army and those who were conscripts, and give honor, respect, and veneration only to those who volunteered?

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator asks me that question——

Mr. MYERS. I am asking it of anybody.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would not.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think there is any man who would. I know the Senator would not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Certainly not. I think they will come and receive the same courteous treatment. There will be no distinction made whatever. I have no word of condemnation for the conscript or the man who waits to be conscripted; it is not my province to judge, but it occurs to me, addressing it to the individual, that to be compelled to render a service which you owe to your country, to be driven as the Senator from Missouri said yesterday as the "quarry slave scourged to his dungeon"——

Mr. MYERS. I am going to refer to that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It seems to me if the Nation needs the service of the citizen, to render that service would be the first thought that would enter the right kind of a citizen's mind, and the man who does not feel that way about it is lacking in those elements of patriotism, I think, to be absolutely essential to the higher order of man.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator is not able to look into the heart of any man who did not enter the Confederate or Federal Army upon a call for volunteers and see what was his motive for not volunteering; but if he was drafted and responded and did his duty as a good citizen and brave soldier, the Senator is able to see that and——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can not see how he can respond to a draft or conscript. He is not called; he is simply caught by the scruff of the neck and dragged in. He is not responding or volunteering; he is simply being pulled in; and if he retreats or deserts, he is shot. A man does not respond to conscription; he simply obeys coercion.

Mr. MYERS. That expression about the neck is one that the Senator from Missouri used yesterday. I did not catch it then, and am not able to repeat it exactly, but as used it is one of the expressions for casting odium on the conscript. Now, if the conscript is ordered by his country to do a certain duty and goes and does it, I say he is entitled to credit, as is the man who is entitled to credit for duty well done, and that there should not be such opprobrium and slurring remarks, I will say with all respect, as some of the Senators on the floor of the Senate here are disposed to use about those who are drafted. It is unjust. I know it is not intended to be unjust, but it is unjust.

Mr. REED. The Senator evidently directed that remark to me.

Mr. MYERS. Because the Senator used the same remark yesterday.

Mr. REED. The insinuation is——

Mr. MYERS. It is no insinuation at all; I am not insinuating.

Mr. REED. Or the direct charge, then, is, whichever way the Senator wants it, that I cast odium upon the conscript.

Mr. MYERS. I say you used terms which are calculated to cast odium upon him or are expressions that cast odium, and I think it is unjust.

Mr. REED. My speech is in the RECORD, in cold print, and is there substantially without revision or correction. You can not find a sentence in it intended to cast reflection upon the man who is conscripted. I said conscription was a reflection upon a man who stood ready to come, but I did not say that the man who was conscripted was a bad man or a cowardly man. I said that a brave man willing to come ought not to be subjected to the humiliation of being compelled to come under an order.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator used the same expression about the neck several times the Senator from Mississippi has just used.

Mr. REED. To take a man by the scruff of the neck?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator never used that expression?

Mr. MYERS. I never heard it until yesterday.

Mr. REED. It is not in the classics, but it is a part of the Missouri vocabulary.

Mr. MYERS. There may be a lot in the Missouri vocabulary with which I am not acquainted. I do not claim to know all that some Missourians know.

Resuming my argument where I left off, there is one of two things certain. When a man is drafted he is either a man who would have volunteered or a man who would not have volunteered. There is no escape from that statement. That is self-evident. If he is a man who would have volunteered, how is he hurt by being told by his country to come on and report to the drafting station?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Instead of being permitted to come and to render his service as a voluntary offering to his country he is ordered, like a servant might be ordered; he is compelled to be put in the class of those who serve by compulsion rather than permitted to stand with those who are willing to serve their country from love of country. I think that is a very great hardship and a very great wrong.

Mr. MYERS. If that fact dampens his ardor or lessens his loyalty or makes him any less a good soldier, then his kind of patriotism is a very poor sort of patriotism in the beginning. If he can not have his own way, like a spoiled child, if he says, "I will not fight with all my will and all my heart and soul unless I can fight in the way I want to fight and when I want to enroll," he is a mighty poor sort of a patriot.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. I did not say he would not fight. I did not say he would not do his duty even though you humiliated him.

Mr. MYERS. There should be no humiliation.

Mr. REED. It has been so regarded for something like a thousand years.

Mr. MYERS. No man should be humiliated by being told to do his duty to his country.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma made a suggestion which pretty well covers it. A man who is willing to serve his country, a man who is ready to volunteer and is not permitted to volunteer but is drafted and ordered to respond may serve his country after he has been subjected to a humiliation that is unjust. It is like putting a husband who is entirely loyal and faithful to his family under bond to support his wife when he is ready to support her without any such coercion.

Mr. MYERS. If a man does his duty, there is no danger of his ever being put under bond to support his wife, but a man may do all of his duty and not be a volunteer in the Army upon a call for volunteers. There is no analogy whatever.

I say, if the man who is conscripted would have volunteered anyway he is not hurt and he should not object to being told by his country what to do; that is, if he loves his country and puts it above individualism and individual ambition, individual aspiration, individual selfishness and desire. Of course, if he wants to pose as a hero, as a man who jumps to arms at the first call and possibly be elected a lieutenant or a captain or something of that kind, wear a saber and epaulettes, then he may feel hurt that he was not allowed to volunteer; but if he puts his country above every other consideration on earth when the life of that country is trembling in the balance, when the life of that country is in danger, when his country is in the hour of her stress, then he will not object to being told where and how to serve his country. You will get all the volunteers anyway, and if they are good men, patriotic men, they will fight just as hard and just as faithfully and loyally as if they had been allowed to volunteer. If the man who is drafted would not have volunteered, then he ought to be drafted; that is the only way to get him; it is just and right that he should be drafted. So I can see no injustice done to anybody.

The opponents of this bill seem to proceed upon the theory that the citizens of a country owe their country no extraordinary duty in time of war. In extraordinary times, when the life of their country is at stake, when it is waging a war for its existence, they seem to think that every man ought to be allowed to do just as he pleases, to go and volunteer if he wants to, or to stay at home, or if he is more fit for some duty at home to say, "You must take me in the army; I insist upon fighting. I want the glory of the battle field"; that it is for him to say, that it is for each and every one of the 100,000,000 people of this country to say, just how they will serve their country in time of war, or whether they will serve it at all or not.

I will tell you my idea of a patriotic citizen, a good citizen. I will give you my idea of loyalty. My idea is that the man who, at the outbreak of war, says to his country as the prophet of old said, "Here I am; all that I am; my mind, body, intellect, heart, and soul are at the disposal of my country. I offer myself on the altar of my country. My life, if necessary; my services, my talents, my labor, my ability (if I have any), all in all, all that I am, all that I hope to be, I lay upon the altar of my country. Here I am; take me; put me where you will. If you choose to send me to the bloodiest grave of the bloodiest battle field of the bloodiest war that was ever waged, there I will be when the time comes. If you choose to send me to face sheets of fire and flame and shot and shell on battle fields raked with torrents of destruction, there I will be; if you choose to put me in the less heroic and less sentimental position of a mechanic, sharpening tools, making instruments of war; if you choose to have me work in a munitions factory, work on a farm, work at producing foodstuffs—if you choose to send me there, there I will go. I have no individual ambition to gratify; I have no individual desire to place above the welfare of my country. My country comes first with me in time of war; my country first, my country last, my country all the time."

That is my idea of a good citizen and a patriot—a man who is willing to serve his country in any capacity in which he may be told to serve it; who is ready to shoulder the musket or follow the plow; who is ready to obey the orders of the supreme power which must exist to conduct any war successfully. I say in that sense we should all be volunteers. If there are, roughly speaking, 100,000,000 people in this country, I say that every man, every woman, every child of the hundred million should be a volunteer and should offer to serve our country in any capacity in which the country may think each best fitted to serve it. If we will go into this war animated by this spirit, if we will go into this war as one in unity of purpose, spirit, and devotion, it will be won to the glory of this country and the triumph of justice in a great deal shorter time than if we should go into it in any other spirit. In support of that I quote the words of President Wilson, our President and the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. He says:

> We must all speak, act, and serve together.

How can we better do that than by each and every one of us saying, "Take me and put me where you will. If you want me to serve in the Army, tell me so; issue an order. If I am between 19 and 25 years of age and unmarried, with no one dependent upon me, and have no legitimate excuse for exemption, and if you think I am of the right age and material to serve in the Army, tell me so, and I will go. If I am over 25 years of age, or if I am a mechanic or a person with any technical knowledge, and you think I am not so well fitted to serve in the Army as are some others, then send to the war the others who are better fitted to serve than am I and I will accept my more humble but just as useful place without complaining and without grumbling."

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], for whom I have very warm regard and friendship, and who is a gentleman of very extraordinary ability, delivered a most brilliant speech in this Chamber yesterday in opposition to this bill. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is not only an orator but he is a rhetorician, and in doleful and lugubrious terms yesterday he painted a very sorrowful and sad picture of what the result would be if conscription were resorted to in this country. He said that very many of those who were drafted would be dragged to the Army as a galley slave is dragged to his dungeon; he referred to the wretches—the miserable wretches—who would be dragged to the county courthouse and there compelled to register and enlist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Montana forgive the Chair for asking, Does the Senator desire to continue further than the usual hour of half-past 5 o'clock?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator desires to continue further?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir; and I believe under the unanimous-consent agreement whenever a Senator has indicated a desire to speak, he has the privilege of doing so.

Mr. STONE. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, I think the Senator from Montana can continue indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was merely desiring to call the Senator's attention to——

Mr. MYERS. I will accept the invitation of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to continue indefinitely; but I will not speak four hours and a half.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has very nearly accomplished that feat already.

Mr. MYERS. It may seem like four years and a half to the Senator from Missouri, but I have been speaking less than two hours. I do not know why the Senator from Missouri is so impatient about my remarks.

Mr. STONE. I am not impatient. I have been listening with profound interest and instruction to the very excellent and eloquent address of the Senator; but I was simply meaning to say to the Chair what I did say, that the Senator has the right under the unanimous-consent agreement to proceed indefinitely.

Mr. MYERS. I am very glad to have the Senator's confirmation of that right. That puts me at ease. I have noticed the patient interest of the Senator from Missouri in my humble remarks, and I shall proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Montana will permit the Chair, the Chair merely interrupted the Senator so that the Senator could inform the Chair as to his pleasure; and thinking the Senator desired a recess to be had at half-past 5, the Chair only desired to learn the Senator's pleasure upon the question.

Mr. MYERS. My pleasure, Mr. President, is to continue; and if it be the pleasure of any not to hear me, of course they have the privilege of retiring from the Chamber. I shall not suggest the absence of a quorum.

Now I will resume. I have been trying, in my feeble way, to make an argument on this matter, but it has been pretty difficult. As I was saying, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], for whom I have very high regard, and who possesses very great ability as an orator and otherwise, in a most brilliant speech yesterday painted a very sad and lugubrious picture of what would be the result of conscription in this country. He referred to the young men who might be drafted as going into battle, cringing; he referred to the miserable wretches being dragged to the county courthouse and there compelled to enlist; he referred to many of them being dragged as is a galley slave to his dungeon. Now, if so disposed, I might ask if there are any of that kind of people in Missouri; if any Missourians are that kind of people; I might ask it, if I did not know better, but I want to know if the Senator was speaking for the people of his own State or others. He is commissioned to speak on the floor of this Chamber for the people of no other State. He is only commissioned to speak for the people of his own State. He should not characterize the people of my State in that way. Each State has two Senators here who are duly commissioned to speak for the people of their respective States. The Senator from Missouri is commissioned to speak here only for the people of his own State. I do not believe Missourians are that kind of people. I do not believe there are any of that kind of people in Missouri. The Missourians were not that kind of people when I lived in that State; and I do not believe they are now.

The people of that State are a brave and courageous people, descendants of those who crossed the Mississippi River in pioneer days and wrested a magnificent country from tribes of savage Indians. Following Daniel Boone, they kept one hand on the plow while they held a musket in the other hand. They kept their women and children in forts to protect them from the Indians. They plowed the prairies, felled the forests, built schoolhouses, churches, and homes, cities and towns and railroads. It was Gen. Doniphan who led an expedition to Santa Fe and opened up the great southwest trade of this country. In 1848 Missouri furnished a large quota of soldiers to the Mexican War. From 1861 to 1865 she furnished large numbers of soldiers to both the Federal and Confederate armies. At Springfield there is not only a Federal but a Confederate cemetery dedicated to those Missourians who fell upon that battle field. At Springfield, at Lexington, at Carthage, at Lone Jack Missourians met Missourians in battle, and on each side proved their manhood and their mettle. Missouri furnished Sterling Price to the Confederacy and Frank P. Blair to the Federal Army. I will not say that the Senator's remarks imputed any such ignoble qualities to Missourians. I do not say it. Of course I would not say that.

Mr. REED. Then, to what purpose has the Senator been speaking for the last 10 or 15 minutes? He starts out with the broad charge, in effect, that I had stated in my speech yesterday that men if drafted would all be cowards.

Mr. MYERS. No; I did not say "all." The Senator is mistaken. I did not say all of them; I said "many of them."

Mr. REED. Then he asks me who I dare speak for except the people of my own State. He then asks if I was so speaking of the people of my own State; then he launches into a eulogy of the people of Missouri, in contradiction of this base charge that I have made against them, and then exculpates me from having cast any reflection whatever upon the people of Missouri. So he travels around the circle, and I do not know how to answer that kind of talk.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will hear my remarks to the finish, he will understand my meaning better. If the Senator does not know how to answer, I do not suppose it needs any answer then.

Mr. REED. I do not, either; I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I will show the Senator, though, what does need an answer, I think. I exculpate the Senator from any such insinuation. I not only acquit the people of Missouri of any such imputation, but I acquit the Senator from Missouri of portraying them in any such character or holding them up in any such light. It is not, of course, in the Senator's heart to do so; but he spoke the words which I have quoted, and if they apply to the people of the whole country, then they apply to Missouri and all the rest of the States. However, I acquit him of any imputation that the people of the whole country or of any State in the country have any such qualities. Yet the Senator used the words. Why did he use them? I say that he used them in the excessive zeal of his overwrought feelings in fighting this bill. It was one of his flights of rhetoric, for which the Senator is famed and noted. I want to say that while the Senator delivered a very brilliant address and a very entertaining oration, so far as his argument is concerned, if you take the rhetoric out of his argument, it is a good deal like puncturing a balloon and taking the wind out of it; there is nothing left. The Senator's argument was full of beautiful rhetoric and strong terms, too strong, I think, for him to mean; too strong to seriously impute to his fellow citizens in any part of this country; and I do not think there is a man here who believes that there would be any such sad and disgraceful result as the Senator from Missouri has depicted if we should have conscription in this country.

I predict that this bill will pass and that when we have conscription the American people will respond nobly to the call of their country. I believe that when their country says "Come on, we want you, this one and that one, to go to the battle field, and we want others to remain on the farm and in the factory and the railroad shop and the munition plant," the people of America will respond with a patriotism and a spirit which will be worthy of their history and their traditions. There will be no riot, there will be no rebellion, there will be no hanging back and dragging of miserable wretches by the halter of the law, except perhaps in extreme and exceptional cases in different parts of the country. But I believe that the people of America will acquit themselves as they may be expected to acquit themselves, in view of the way they always have acquitted themselves in all the history of their Nation. They will respond with a spirit which will be worthy of the purpose for which they will respond, and that will be to secure to other countries and other peoples some of the blessings which for nearly 150 years have been vouchsafed to us by a kind and beneficent Providence. They will respond not only to fight for themselves but to fight in order to carry democracy and liberty to others and to make secure the democracy and the liberty of the world. They will go to Europe not only to die for their own country but to die, if necessary, for immortal principles which are superior to any country on the face of the earth; and those are the principles of democracy.

It is recorded in Scripture:

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

Some of those who go to Europe may die for the democracy of others, but if so they will die in a glorious cause which will redound to the honor of their own country as long as time lasts. It is written that during the French Revolution one man who was a victim was accorded the privilege of ascending the platform and giving up his life by the guillotine in the place of another man who had been chosen to be the victim, and as he went to his death he turned and faced the crowd and said:

The thing I am about to do is a far, far better thing than I have ever done. The death that I now am about to die is a far, far better death than any death I could ever have died.

Of those of our troops who respond to the order of their country to go to Europe to face the cannon on those dreadful fields of carnage, if they meet death there and are buried there, it can well be said of them: "They died not only for their country but for the rights, the liberties, the democracy of all people. The death which they died is a far, far better death than they could ever have died before, and that which they did is a far, far better thing than they ever did before."

By passing this bill, enacting it into law, providing that every man, woman, and child in this country shall be a volunteer and shall serve where his country places him, we have the privilege of writing upon the scroll of our country's history the brightest page that has ever been written there or probably ever will be written there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MYERS. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a memorandum, which has been sent to me by ex-Senator Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, touching this bill. It is very brief, and I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Montana.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

Amend the bill as follows, and the benefits of both volunteering and drafting are at once combined:

1. Let there be draft whenever men are wanted and there is delay to volunteer immediately.

2. When a draft is ordered, the date of drawing of names being fixed, and the quota of the district specified, volunteers having the qualifications required by the terms of the draft shall be allowed upon the quota and the actual drafting shall be for the deficiency only, if any, and taken from those enrolled who have not filed notice that they have volunteered.

Should the number of volunteers equal or exceed the quota in any given district as shown by the actual draft, the volunteers shall be accepted in preference to the drafted men in their order.

Volunteers must be enrolled in the district for which they are accepted.

Eligible volunteers not subject to enrollment may be accepted at any time in accordance with regulations by the President.

Thus no one need be drafted, and there is no threat or stigma incurred, because all enrolled and so liable equally to risk of impeachment, if there were any, of valor or patriotism.

In this way the impending draft secures immediate response of men and the whole community become recruiting officers at once and volunteers fill the quota.

I know how this works, for I have been through it during four years of the hardest State in the Union to raise quotas during the Civil War.

3. Substitute the full period of liability for military service for that in the bill, to wit:

Eighteen years to 45 years for 19 to 25 years, or much increase in the difference of ages.

It is a cruel blow to the potential prolongation and growth of national life to extirpate the period of romance from the lives of both sexes by casting the supreme burden of national defense upon our early manhood and womanhood, too, just because it is the most patriotic.

Suppose, as may now reasonably be anticipated, substantially the whole Army should be taken from this draft and there should be a corresponding gap of six years in the natural activities and functions of the transmission of national life from one generation to another as now performed by this selective element of our people; what would be left of the American Nation? Why, simply such as might be an inheritance of an inferior fatherhood and a forlorn and enfeebled motherhood, wan cheeked and wasted in withered forms.

Besides, we do not want an army of boys; we need the full proportion given of riper experience and sounder judgment among privates as well as officers which come only with increasing age.

HENRY W. BLAIR.

COLORADO BUILDING, April 26, 1917.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the large assemblage of Senators present is a conspicuous evidence of the profound interest they feel in the discussion of the grave questions before the Senate. This presence is in its way an inspiration. I am all the more impressed by it because of the fact that Senators rise from time to time to tell us early in their enlightening observations that they want to raise an army at the very earliest possible moment. Then they proceed to kill hours of time in hurrying to a vote on the bill. I hear Senators say, "I want to tell you my idea." I have heard that expression several times. Then those who did not hear it must plod through pages of wandering to find the idea.

The Senator who last addressed us spoke of my colleague [Mr. REED] in criticism. I wish in a very few words to say that my colleague is abundantly capable, as we all know, of taking care of himself. I wish to add that I believe, thank God, that the people of his and my State expect and desire their representatives in the two Houses of Congress to rise to the full height of their responsibility and duty as they severally see it. My colleague and I may differ, as we have differed, about some things—not many—but our differences have been honest and honorable differences, the differences of men clothed with great official responsibilities. I hope and believe that the people of Missouri expect this of each of us and all of us.

Mr. President, I shall not take 30 minutes of the time of the Senate to say what I have to say on the great question pending before us. I did not vote with the President for war; I shall vote with him for conscription.

I wish, however, to make my position on this subject plain. In a time of peace I would be unwilling to vote to pass a compulsory military service law. To me the principle involved in such a law is obnoxious. Compulsory military service is peculiar to monarchial governments. It is especially peculiar to continental Europe, where all the important governments, excepting France, have been monarchial from time immemorial. It is also peculiar to Japan. At least until very recently this compulsory-service system has had practically no support or sympathy with the people of this country. I have myself always coincided with that attitude of our people. I have always been unwilling to transplant this military system in vogue on the Continent of Europe to the United States and engraft it on the permanent policies of this country. We have in the past almost to a man denounced the military autocracy of Prussia, Russia, and other countries where this system of compulsory military service prevails, and we have seen and sympathized with thousands of stalwart young men who fled from their native lands to America that they might escape a military situation repulsive to them and toward which they maintained a hostile spirit. I have always until recently supposed it to be beyond things possible to so change the public sentiment of the American people in this behalf as to make it possible to transport this European system to our country and establish it here. But things seem to change overnight nowadays. It would be hard for me to so change the trend of my life thought on this subject as to believe that such a system to be established as a permanent policy would accord with the spirit of our institutions, or that it could ever become essential to our national safety.

It is hardly necessary to advert to a fact familiar to everyone that the conditions surrounding the United States are so different from the conditions surrounding European nations that there is no parallel between them. If we were surrounded by or contiguous to powerful nations with great permanent military armaments, between whom and this Government and people there were acute—I might say even possible—rivalries and jealousies, if nothing worse, there might be an argument, aye, a necessity, for maintaining a great standing army in the United States. But that situation does not exist, has never existed, and probably will not exist, at least for an indefinite future period. Mr. President, much might be said on these lines on this subject, but for the present I will pass it by with this cursory reference to the chief reasons to which I have adverted—barely adverted—as the ground of my opposition to the policy of conscription and universal compulsory service as a permanent policy of our Government.

Nevertheless, while expressing my opposition to that policy as a permanent policy, I wish to add that I would be very glad to see the younger men of the country in times of peace go through a substantial period of military training. I would gladly do anything within my power, which I deemed consistent with American principles and policy, to encourage the maintenance of the military or martial spirit among our people to a degree sufficient to have at all times in readiness an adequate force quickly available for any national emergency. For example, I would be glad to see a great military school, essentially similar to that at West Point, established somewhere in the West—notably at such a place as Fort Logan, near the beautiful city of Denver, Colo. I would have the cadets sent to this school selected not as West Point cadets are selected, by Members of Congress and the President, but selected from young men serving in the ranks of the Army or from the National Guard or from those who have been faithful or most efficient at training camps. I think this would furnish a great incentive to a fine class of ambitious young men to enter the military service in some one of its several branches. I would also be willing to appropriate most liberally to make training camps attractive to young men, and to reasonably guarantee them against loss during the annual periods devoted by them to this service. I would also be willing to appropriate liberally to encourage not only universities and colleges but the high schools of the country to incorporate military training as a fixed part of the school curriculum. Cooperating with the States, as far as practicable, I would have the Government supply, or aid in supplying, capable and efficient officers as commandants in these various schools and to supply adequate equipment for thorough training. Boys who took the military training as they took mathematics as a part of their education would go out from their schools with excellent knowledge of all the substantial elements of military life. They would no more forget their military training on the campus or field than they would forget their instruction in the classroom; indeed, I surmise that the spectacular features incident to their military training would make a more lasting impression on their minds and memories than the more sedate instruction received in other branches. Other like things could be suggested and adopted. To such expedients as these I would cheerfully resort to encourage and induce our young men to enter voluntarily upon the task of acquiring military instruction and training. I would make the service far more attractive than it has been.

I have also long been an advocate of the Government itself creating and controlling adequate means for fully equipping both its Army and its Navy; also, abundant equipment of all kinds should, as I have said, be at the command of training camps and training schools and of the National Guard. The Government should at all times have at its disposal a very considerable armament ready for instant employment. We should keep abreast and, if possible, in advance of the balance of the world in the character and quality of our military and naval equipment; and the Government plants should be always kept in a position to meet as quickly as possible any situation or emergency that might arise. If at the end of the war we should organize a military system along the lines I have indicated, I would have the utmost faith in its success. In a very few years we would be sending forth annually from these schools and training camps more than a million men, who could be quickly mobilized and made available for active and effective service. In 10 years we would have millions of men, the very flower of the land, fit to take the field whenever an emergency should arise requiring that service at their hands.

Generally speaking, what I have said fairly well expresses in a brief way my views as to a military establishment for the United States in times of peace. And I say this now, for I apprehend that after the war this question will come before us again, and for myself I wish at this time to make my attitude a matter of record.

WAR.

But war and peace are wholly different things. For years we have gone about the business of so-called preparedness in slipshod fashion. We have had no real military system of any kind worth speaking of. We have only drifted along indifferently. An autocratic military system is only something worse than no system at all. But we could establish a system that would be not only effective, but at the same time be in accord with our theory and principles of government and better adapted to our national life. This would take time, of course—time and careful thought—to work it out. But it should be done, and done at once; done as something real and permanent.

But now we are in war, and we must get ready for this war without delay; that is the immediate duty pressing upon us. We are no longer merely talking about war; we are actually in war, and in the greatest war of history. We must grasp that tremendous fact. In this emergency the Nation must bear its part honorably, bravely, efficiently. At least in this particular the honor of the Nation is indeed at stake. No man has any right to shirk. Every man must do bravely and patriotically whatever the Government requires at his hands. There are millions of American men and women who did not want this country to enter into this war. They believed, as I did, that it would be a mistake for our Nation to become embroiled in this foreign conflict. But the Government—that is, the President and the Congress, who are authorized under the Constitution to speak for all the people in this behalf—determined that it was the duty of the United States to go into the war. The Government believed that the honor and vital interests of the Nation demanded that this dread enterprise should be entered upon, and so the Congress declared war. That action was authoritative, decisive, and final. Now, the duty of every citizen is plain—he must support the Government with all his might and strength. The spirit of Tennyson's ode, immortalizing the "Charge of the Light Brigade" at Balaklava, must pervade the breast of every American man and woman:

Forward, the Light Brigade!
Was there a man dismay'd?
Not tho' the soldier knew
Some one had blunder'd.
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

We are to assemble 1,000,000 men, maybe 2,000,000 men, under arms. Many men both in and out of Congress believe that this great army should be collected through volunteers. Others believe that it is impracticable to get together an army of this magnitude made up of volunteers, at least in time for effective service. Judging by what has been accomplished, I can not but share in that belief. Moreover, the President and his advisers, who have thought much about this subject, and who have sufficiently tested the volunteer plan to be convinced that it is impracticable as a sole reliance in this emergency, are urgently advising Congress to enact a compulsory service law to be enforced through a carefully devised plan of selective drafts. The necessities are urgent and imperative, and all doubt about raising this army should be dissipated and all delay avoided as far as possible. I would make it plain that I shall vote for the bill as it stands, if thought best not to amend it. It embodies the President's view, and I am confident it will prove effective for the imperatively important purposes it is intended immediately to serve. But I would have it understood, also, that as for myself I shall vote for it as a temporary expedient and not as a permanent policy to be continued after the conclusion of the war. I would be glad if this view could be made more apparent in the text of the bill. I wish this could be made plainer and more certain than it is. With that end in view I have prepared what I may call a suggestion for an amendment. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 8a. That the service of all persons selected by draft under the provisions of this act shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. Whenever said emergency shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selective draft or otherwise shall cease to be in force and effect."

Mr. STONE. I ask that this may be printed and laid upon the desks of Senators as a possible amendment to be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not at this time offer this as an amendment, but only as a suggestion for the consideration of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and of the Senate. I may not propose it at all, and certainly shall not without further consultation with the Senator from Oregon. For the present I wish merely to emphasize my anxiety to have this proposal for compulsory service limited to the period of the present war.

Mr. President, there is another provision of this bill which is especially objectionable to me, and I would be very glad to see it changed. The provision I refer to is in section 2 of the bill, wherein it is provided that liability to the draft authorized shall apply to male citizens "between the ages of 19 and 25 years." I do not like that. I wish the age limits could be changed so as to read "between the ages of 21 and 40 years." I am extremely reluctant right at the beginning to force immature boys into the service. If they desire to volunteer, I have nothing to say; but to compel them to go nolens volens is another thing. I prefer, infinitely prefer, to make up our fighting force of full-grown and responsible men—at least of adults. I may have something more to say on this subject later on.

FOR BILL EVEN UNAMENDED.

But whether any changes in the bill shall be made or not, I intend to vote to raise this army and put it in the field at all hazards. Our entrance into the war has imposed this national duty upon us; I see no escape from it; I have no desire to escape it. In the opinion of the Government, we can not win this war by the mere expenditure of money, however vast the sum, or merely through the use of our naval strength. I accept this as true. We must, therefore, immediately organize and put into the field a powerful military land force, splendidly equipped for the arduous and dangerous duties of the war; and this should be done not for show but for service. It seems to me we must pass this bill. Let the work of selection go on; but, at the same time, I see no reason why the patriotic men of the country, within the age limits, should not come forward and volunteer their services to the Government. They will find a place in the service.

The Secretary of War is quoted as saying that these volunteers could be incorporated in the various units of the Army, and therefore I assume that the larger the number of volunteers the less will be the number called to the colors under the coercive features of the law. I hope that those who shall offer themselves will be so numerous as to reduce the necessity of actual conscription to the minimum. Since this coordinated plan of volunteering and conscription is deemed to be wisest, it is manifest to me that the vast aggregate of both units should be so mixed and molded as to make one harmonious whole. The idea of any kind of discrimination between the men at the front should be avoided. But the details of the plan I would leave to the executive branch of the Government. I join the President and my colleagues here in appealing to the stalwart, brave-hearted young men of the country to come forward and offer their services to the flag. Senators, we have differed in the past about this war, but the past is behind us. Now we must turn our faces resolutely to the future and do our duty, every man of us. Let no man, here or elsewhere, be deaf to the appealing call of his country. Therefore I say to all men able to serve their country in the field, "Go to the front like thoroughbreds." I say to all of them, "Go forward with the light of patriotism and daring aflame in your eyes." This is no time to think of personal consequences; this is the time to think only of a man's country. The more dangerous a patriotic service the greater is its glory. No greater service can any man render than to offer his life. I bid, I appeal to all American men capable of this hazardous but noble service to respond to the Nation's call, no matter in what form it comes. Great honors are waiting for some, grim death is waiting for others, but a crown of glory is waiting for all. Whatever befalls any of them, this inspiring memory will be forever throbbing through the Nation:

When can their glory fade?
O the wild charge they made!
All the world wonder'd.
Honor the charge they made!

Marshal Joffre, the great military chieftain of the French Army—a chieftain whose prowess is indissolubly connected with an army whose valorous deeds will live forever in the martial history of the world—is in Washington. He comes under the authority of his Government to confer with our President about the war. The press reports him as saying that an American Army is wanted at the front in France. This is not a Macedonian cry; but if it were, the greater reason why we should respond to it. We are in honor bound to respond in any event; we are in honor bound to go to the front. We have entered the war because our Government decided it was our duty to enter it. I did not agree with that view, as you know. But I told you from the start that, while I opposed this Nation entering the war, if it did enter it I would insist upon keeping the national faith, no matter to what length it might lead. Now we are peldged. In this war the enemy of France is now the enemy of the United States. There is no middle ground—no "No man's land." National honor and good faith require us to go the limit. I do not know whether the great hero of the Marne really said what I have quoted from the papers. But whether he said it or not, it must be true. We are needed on the battle fronts of Europe. Now comes the real test of our mettle. Now, we must determine, each man for himself, whether we shall make good the national pledge. There must be no halting at home, especially must there be no halting here. "Forward" is the one word in our vocabulary fit to voice the spirit that should animate us. How shall we go forward? Having a solemn duty pressing upon us, we should perform it quickly. While we are talking here in the Congress our allies are fighting to the death.

If we are going to fight, the sooner we get at it and into it the better. If we are only bluffing, we can go on talking. Over in France Frenchmen, Englishmen, and others of our allies are fighting and dying. We have agreed to go to their aid and fight with them; but we have been talking, not fighting. The first necessity confronting us is the necessity of getting ready to fight. What is the surest and quickest way of getting ready? I am sorry I can not agree with some of my colleagues here that we should first try out the plan of raising an army by volunteers. We have been trying that for some months. Almost every art has been resorted to to excite patriotism and induce enlistment. At all kinds of public gatherings—theaters, picture shows, patriotic gatherings especially assembled for the purpose—heroic scenes have been depicted before the eyes of the people—depicted amid the blast of bugles and the flaunting of flags. Hundreds of demonstrations calculated to thrill the hearts of the onlookers have been made throughout the country. All these things have been welcomed with applause, not tumultuous, but more or less enthusiastic; but few indeed have volunteered. So far the response has been not only unsatisfactory but discouraging. I offer no opinion as to why this is so, although I do not believe it difficult to understand. The President thinks the time is past for experimenting. I agree with him. It is imperative that we act at once and get ready with the least possible delay. I am for that plan which will most certainly, speedily, and effectively meet the demands of the hour. Pass this bill, and we will forthwith enter upon a plan that will not be experimental; its success will be assured from the beginning. Therefore I shall vote for this bill. This is not a time to halt or hesitate; we must go forward.

Mr. GORE, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for the information of Senators, to see if there is any objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not interrupt to inject any other business. The time until a vote is reached on Saturday evening was set apart for the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that it is just the introduction and reference of a joint resolution.

Mr. MARTIN. There are several others here. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has one in his hand; the Senator from New York has one; and I appeal to Senators not to present them at this time. I dislike to object, but I shall be compelled to do so. We can not go into general legislation pending the consideration of this measure.

Mr. GORE. I will state that the excuse for my apparent haste is that the Interstate Commerce Committee meets tomorrow, and I was hoping to have a subcommittee appointed for the consideration of this joint resolution.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, there is plenty of time. This is just the commencement of a series of requests to interrupt the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. GORE. It is in the nature of emergency legislation to meet the present food situation.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; and the Senator from Georgia has one to meet the present transportation situation, and the Senator from New York has one to meet the present coal situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the Chair can do is to ask if there is objection.

Mr. MARTIN. I shall be compelled, Mr. President, to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Virginia is in the same situation with reference to myself. I wanted to introduce a resolution requesting information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as a basis for a discussion that I expect to present to the Senate early next week. We have had no morning hour now for several days, which has prevented the usual opportunity being given for such a course. Of course, there could not be a recess. I believe, however, we have a unanimous-consent agreement that carries the recess with it.

Mr. MARTIN. I am sorry to object, but I hope Senators will realize the impossibility of going into these various matters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD the table of figures I have before me. I can stand here and read it if it is necessary. This is not new matter. I just want it published for information.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection to an order being made to print it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is ordered done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am prepared to go on with reference to the bill that is under consideration. I understand, however, that several of the Senators would like to have a recess taken at this point. If I can be recognized and start in when the Senate meets to-morrow, I shall be perfectly willing that a recess shall be had.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say, Mr. President, that I shall be very glad to have the matter take that course and to have a recess taken, with the Senator from Washington entitled to the floor. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not understand what the course is. We have a unanimous-consent agreement. I do not understand——

Mr. MARTIN. The unanimous-consent agreement is that we shall proceed and neither recess nor adjourn if any Senator desires to proceed.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I know what the unanimous-consent agreement is. I am just asking what the parliamentary situation is now.

Mr. MARTIN. The situation now is that this bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from Washington has been recognized, but he says he does not care to proceed to-night; and I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President withholding for the moment any objection, I should like to know what course is to be pursued with reference to the recognition of those who desire to address the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. MARTIN. I know that the Senators will be recognized by whoever is in the chair.

Mr. FALL. I can say to the Senator—I speak knowingly, having offered the amendment to the unanimous-consent agreement—that one reason for the insistence upon this procedure is that all day there has been upon the Vice President's desk a list of names of speakers who are being recognized. As each spoke, successively, he was recognized. Now, if that is to be the method which is to be pursued, those who do not know that there is any such list there may as well understand it now, and that one member or two Members, if the Senate adjourns, may take up the entire day to-morrow, and those who may desire to be heard will have no opportunity whatever under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, the Senator knows that there is no rule of the Senate under which a list can be made and the preference given to Senators for recognition.

Mr. FALL. I have so understood.

Mr. MARTIN. And I take it for granted that, though there may be a list made, it is simply a reminder to the Chair of a wish to speak; but the Senator who addresses the Chair first will be entitled to be recognized.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator from Virginia were in the chair, having his word for it, I would understand that that would be the rule.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the rule of the Senate, as I understand it.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator from Virginia, unfortunately, or, possibly, fortunately for himself, is not in the chair. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] desires to speak at this time, but he is perfectly willing, as I understand, to consent that the Senate take a recess, provided he is recognized to-morrow morning. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Washington recognized to-morrow morning—I want to hear the Senator—but there are other Senators following the Senator from Washington who are on this list. If a list is to be followed, then Senators who are not at the head of the list will have no opportunity of offering their very valuable observations to the Senate or, through the empty corridors of the Senate, to the public.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. CALDER. My name is on the list, Mr. President, and I have waited here all day hoping it might be reached, intending to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments. Other Senators have talked three or four hours, however. Now, I hope that I will be recognized to-morrow at some time; and, for my part, I shall keep the Senate here to-morrow night until I am afforded that opportunity.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I had better go on. I could almost have gotten through by this time.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, in the hope that it may solve this difficulty, I am perfectly willing to move a recess until 10 o'clock in the morning. I am anxious that every Senator shall have an opportunity to present his views, but I hardly think it is desirable for any Senator to present his views with only three or four Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We will have less than that at 10 o'clock in the morning; but that is immaterial to me. With the understanding that I hold the floor, I am perfectly willing to have that done.

Mr. FALL. Then I withdraw any objection.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, instead of 11.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Thursday, April 26, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, April 27, 1917, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy spirit possess us, O Lord God Almighty, that working with Thee, through Thee, for Thee we may meet the responsibilities and daily duties of life as they present themselves, patiently, calmly, earnestly, and quit ourselves like men worthy of the blessings Thou hast bestowed upon us as individuals and as a people, leaving behind us a record worthy of emulation after the manner of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GRAND LODGE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed the Senate bill 1800, the title of which is to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, and entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate."

This bill is an amendment to the charter of this organization. Under their old charter they have the right to mortgage or sell their property to reinvest in other property. They wish to build, and have made contracts for building upon the present site. The title company has held that there is possibly some cloud on the title unless that provision is changed. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill from the Speaker's table for present consideration.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have examined the bill. My understanding of the matter is that under the existing law this organization is authorized to sell its present site, buy a new site, and build on the new site, but it is not authorized to borrow money on the present site; that it wishes to borrow money and build on the present site, and this bill authorizes that to be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I thought I had stated that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that they were authorized to sell or borrow. They are not authorized to borrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What they want to do is to get money to build on the present site, and the title company holds that it will not approve of their doing that, and they are delayed in getting their money.

Mr. MANN. They could build on the present site under existing law, but they could not borrow money under the present law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate," be amended to read as follows:

"That the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia, a corporation created under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved June 12, 1860, be, and hereby is, authorized to sell and convey for, or to borrow and secure by deed of trust thereon, such sum or sums as may be satisfactory to the several organizations hereinafter named as owners, those parcels of ground in the city of Washington, D. C., known and designated on the plat of said city as lot No. 11 and part of lot No. 10 in square No. 457, together with the buildings thereon, known as Odd Fellows' Hall, the title to which property is now held in trust by the said corporation for the following organizations, owners thereof, namely: The Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia; Columbian Encampment, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Central Lodge, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Washington Lodge, No. 6, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Columbia Lodge, No. 10, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Beacon Lodge, No. 15, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Excelsior Lodge, No. 17, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Eastern Lodge, No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the consent of each of said several organizations being evidenced by a written instrument bearing the seal and the signature of its executive officers; the proceeds of said sale or loan may be applied to the payment and liquidation of any debt on said property or toward the purchase of other ground and the erection thereon of a building or buildings for like purposes as those for which the above-described property has been held, or to the erection of a new building, or to repairing or rebuilding on the ground now held, said property to be held in trust for said above-mentioned organizations according to their respective interests therein, and for such other organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows as may hereafter contribute to the cost of such property, according to the amount respectively contributed by each: Provided, That any purchaser or purchasers of such property shall not be required to see to the proper application of the money paid therefor.

"SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall be authorized and capable of taking and holding real and personal property in trust for said organizations to any value not exceeding the sum of $1,000,000, and shall have full power and authority, upon a resolution or resolutions of each of said beneficiary organizations, to, from time to time, encumber any ground and the improvements thereon so held in trust for said organizations, or any part thereof, in such manner, for such purpose, and in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by said resolution or resolutions."

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the publication of resolutions passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts relative to the price of anthracite coal and other commodities.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing resolutions of the Harvard Club indorsing the course taken by the President and Congress in joining the allied nations of the entente.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein resolutions adopted by the Delaware branch of the National Woman's Party, relative to the Federal amendment known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment, which I have been requested to have read into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing certain resolutions regarding the war with Germany.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. How long are they?

Mr. BARKLEY. Very short.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill S. 1800, which has just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3545) for the increase of the Military Establishment; and upon that I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue during to-day until everybody has had an opportunity to speak; that general debate then close, with the exception of the closing speech on the part of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the closing remarks of my own, to take place to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate shall continue to-day as late into the night as it will take for all gentlemen to express their views on the bill, under the same terms and conditions as the preceding debate, and that when we adjourn to-night general debate shall be closed, except that to-morrow the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] shall close the debate. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. MANN. I think that is a peculiar request. Let the gentleman from Alabama ask to vacate the order providing that the committee shall rise not later than 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. DENT. I did not understand that that order applied to-day.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asked unanimous consent last night that we proceed to-day under the order of yesterday.

Mr. DENT. I did not intend that that should apply to the hour of rising.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the gentleman may have intended, but that was the request.

Mr. DENT. I did not intend that the hour should be the same for to-night, but, Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent to vacate the order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to vacate the order of yesterday by which the committee was to rise not later than 10 o'clock to-night. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now the gentleman wants to ask unanimous consent that there be no general debate to-morrow except that of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and himself, which will close the debate.

Mr. DENT. I am willing, Mr. Speaker, to put the request in the language of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that no general debate shall be had to-morrow on this bill except that of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and himself.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. DENT was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

VOLUNTEERS OR CONSCRIPTS?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not expect to speak on this bill, but after examining the two bills proposed I can not remain silent on so important a subject. There are those who speak for us generally so that it is not necessary for the average Member to express himself on all bills, but at this time I believe every Member ought not only to place himself upon record by his vote but ought to indicate the reasons for that vote.

No man from my State can oppose the Army draft bill without taking his political fortunes in his hands. Practically every newspaper in that State, every large paper of influence, is reported to be in favor of that bill. Practically every telegram that I have received comes from good friends urging me to vote for a bill which, I take it, they have never seen, and some of them wired before the bill had ever been printed. That is an influence hard to resist and which comes to many Members in this House; but, in the words of our distinguished Speaker, who addressed the House yesterday, no man has a right to sit upon this floor or to vote who has not the courage of his convictions and who does not intend to vote according to his conscience. That is what I propose to do. The delegation from my own State cast a number of votes against the war resolution. I voted against that resolution. I have never made any speech of explanation; I thought it unnecessary; it would accomplish nothing if war was declared; and I care to make no defense of it now. To-day I am supporting the President of the United States in everything that he needs—in money or in men—and shall vote to that end. It has been suggested our State is unpatriotic, and some metropolitan papers of this country have in the past pointed a finger of scorn at the great State of Wisconsin, which shows by its history in the past and to-day a patriotism worthy of any State in the country. I will prove that its people are more patriotic than States in which such papers are published. Over 100,000 volunteers from Wisconsin served in the Union Army during the Civil War. There were no slackers and no conscripts. One of the greatest battles ever fought by the Union was at Gettysburg, aided by Wisconsin regiments, composing in part one of the grandest organizations known in all our history—the Iron Brigade. [Applause.] Commanded by Lucius Fairchild, a general of our State, with more men from Wisconsin in the brigade than from any other State, losing over half of some of its regiments in that one battle, but they helped save the day and stopped the advancing hosts of Lee. That is the character of men who lived in Wisconsin then, and the same kind of men live in Wisconsin now—men who will support the volunteer system without a draft if you give them the opportunity. [Applause.]

WHAT WISCONSIN OFFERS TO DO.

You ask how do I know that. Read in yesterday's RECORD the reports offered by the Senator from Missouri [Senator REED], which appeared in the senatorial discussion of yesterday, reports from the adjutant generals of the various States. See what they say for their respective States. Every State will furnish its full quota of volunteers if permitted to do so. Let me read you just briefly word received from Gen. Holway, adjutant general of our State, with whom I served as a lieutenant in another company of the same regiment some 25 years ago. Gen. Holway is known throughout the country as an able military man. He says in a statement received from Madison on April 12:

> The volunteer system will give us a large Army in a short time. Under this system Wisconsin can easily raise more than its quota of men. This State has already enlisted more men in proportion to its population than any other State in the Union.

Mark that. He would not make that assertion if it were not true. Take that word to some of the Eastern States, whose metropolitan papers have criticized my State and the volunteer system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. FREAR. I regret I can not yield to be interrupted now. I desire to finish my argument on these bills.

Gen. Holway continues:

> We now have about 7,000 members in the National Guard alone in Wisconsin.
> Conscription requires more time than one would think of. The census of eligible men would first have to be taken, and that alone is a big work. Then the men would have to be examined, more or less hurriedly. After this would come the long period of training, with problems big enough.
> It takes twice as long to form a conscript army as an army of volunteers, and after it is formed you only have an army of conscripts—drafted men. Wisconsin is able to furnish her full quota under any volunteer system that may be adopted—50,000 men or 100,000 men, if need be. Mr. Chairman, I will not offer any further word for Wisconsin. Anyone familiar with the history of our wars or with the history of the country itself knows that she is able and ready and as patriotic as any other State in the Union. To-day, as ever in the past, she is able and ready to do her full duty. I have heard statements upon this floor in regard to the patriotism of individuals. Some men opposing the volunteer system have arrogated to themselves special claims to be considered patriotic.

PATRIOTISM IS UNIVERSAL.

Patriotism does not belong to any Member of this House alone. I believe that the people of the whole country are patriotic and will show their patriotism if you give them an opportunity to express themselves. I had not intended to speak during this debate until some of these questioning suggestions were made. Let me make a brief personal statement: The man who is to-day commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of the Department of the Potomac, a man who served three years and six months in a Wisconsin cavalry regiment, a man who drew a resolution the other day, and secured its passage by his department, offering the support of the District Grand Army men to the President wherever they could serve and for whatever they could do, a man whose age numbers four score years and over, is my father. His only son, when a stripling, enlisted over across the river at Fort Myer and served five years in the Signal Service of the Army. [Applause.] Over 25 years ago that same son organized a military company in my home town in Wisconsin, a company that fought in the Spanish-American War and that to-day is under arms in my home town awaiting orders of the President for European service. When that company went to the front, another company of ex-members of the National Guard was organized by that same son and offered to the Government to go with the second call, which call never came. I make no claim to especial patriotism for a record with which I was connected, but am again ready to serve my country, if need be. I listened to the touching remarks of Speaker CLARK yesterday, because what he said came from the heart. He was against this same conscript bill, and sends his son now to avoid the possible stigma. I am in the same situation: I have an only son. I can not offer his services to the Government, for he told me that he himself had already done so. [Applause.] He and his friends will serve without conscription. You who have no son can not understand what that means. Neither worldly goods nor possible honors can mean so much to me. So, gentlemen, let no man arrogate to himself any particular patriotism. When our country calls and opportunity is given, our people will respond, because they are loyal to their flag and their country, and it does not become any man to say that his neighbor is not a patriot.

I believe the people will answer the call and fill the quota with volunteers if opportunity is given. Just give them the chance offered by the committee bill.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE TWO BILLS.

Mr. Chairman, I want to give a brief statement of the radical differences between the Chamberlain Army staff bill and the committee bill now before Congress just in two or three sentences before taking up the discussion in detail. The staff bill is inconsistent and indefensible—

First. Because in section 2 of the bill it directs that the present Regular Army and National Guard be "raised by voluntary enlistment" up to the maximum legal strength, involving an increase of a half million men, and yet in the same section declares that all other forces shall be raised only by "selective draft." If volunteers are proper in one case, they are proper in all, and conscription should ensue in either case only at the will of the President, as provided in the House committee bill.

Second. The staff bill is inconsistent and indefensible because it fixes the limit of military service for selective draft purposes at from 19 to 25 years of age, whereas the Regular Army and National Guard provision permits enlistment between 18 and 41 years. No other government in the world has a conscription age limit of only seven years, and all governments average over 20 years, and I shall place in the RECORD a statement of the laws of the different countries.

Third. The staff bill is un-American, because in section 3 it places exclusive control in the hands of Regular Army officers to determine all selections and exemptions, abolishes the writ of habeas corpus to review any selection, and makes arbitrary and legal the most autocratic powers ever delegated to military officials in this or any other country.

In all these particulars the House committee bill has fully protected the rights of the citizens and yet has given the same immediate powers of conscription to the President in all cases, which he may put in force when deemed necessary to do so. Mr. Chairman, there have been some remarks as to what this selective draft will do. I gave to some brother Members a brief report of what is going to happen in the Army under the Chamberlain bill. Quoting from a statement signed by John Temple Graves, a highly reputable news correspondent, he says:

The first grand army of 500,000 men, according to the staff officers, will be raised under the selective draft from men not over 20 years of age. It will be the "first class." These selective conscripts will not necessarily be kept undistributed. The majority, however, will not be assigned to other divisions than that created by the first general levy.

And so forth. He goes on to say that the second levy of 500,000 is to come, if possible, from youths of 20 years to make up what he terms a "beardless army." Oh, no man over the age of 25 years need fear conscription, because they are going to take the children in this selective draft—boys who can not vote, who have no right to express themselves here or in any other place.

Now, my friends, I have explained in a preliminary way why I object to this bill. I believe it is not only undemocratic and un-American, but it places in the hands of Army officers a power that has never been given them before in the history of the country. You will not find equal power of conscriptive draft for young boys alone has ever been placed in the hands of officers of any other Government so far as my investigation shows. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we must either support the committee bill or else a bill recommended by the Regular Army staff labeled "A universal-service bill." This term is deceptive, and the staff bill ought to be termed "A special draft bill for boys," "exempting from military service all able-bodied men from 26 years to 45 years of age." No other bill is before us, and the so-called staff or Chamberlain bill now before the Senate will become law unless we pass the committee bill.

Congress has declared war against the Imperial German Government, and it is the duty of every American citizen to uphold the hands of his Government in prosecuting that war. The President says all resources of the Government are pledged to a furtherance of that war. With that understanding Congress unanimously passed the greatest appropriation bill ever considered by any legislative body, and authorized that $7,000,000,000 be placed in the hands of the President to loan or expend practically without legislative restriction. The country stands unitedly with the President in seeking to prosecute the war to an early conclusion. We have given the President money; now we must give him men. He has pledged the war military strength of the Nation—some 22,000,000 men, if need be—and this Congress will give him as large an army as he desires to carry on the war.

The committee bill is the only bill now before the House. It provides that the President shall be given full power to call for volunteers and, if he so decides, thereafter to supplement that call with a draft of men of military fitness from 21 years to 40 years of age, inclusive. The bill preserves the right of habeas corpus and makes eligible to service in case of need upwards of 18,000,000 men of all classes.

The staff bill, miscalled a "universal military service bill," conscripts boys from 19 to 25 years of age and exempts all others from compulsory service. Further, the staff proposes to conscript 500,000 boys of 19 years of age for the first levy and to take others as fast as needed. I shall offer authority for the statement and invite correction if that is not the announced purpose of the Regular Army staff. I do not overlook the proposed modification as to age limit by the minority; but in the final test, according to the press and conscription champions, the Senate staff bill, or the Dent bill, is the real issue.

We are asked by the staff bill to repudiate the policy of a century and a half of democracy and to adopt an indefensible draft that smacks of the same autocracy which we are seeking to overthrow. Our draft act of 1863 included all men able to serve from 20 years to 45 years of age. Under that act only 62,000 conscripts went into service compared to over 2,500,000 volunteers. The population of the North then reached only 20,000,000 people. To-day we have 100,000,000. That law made all men liable to serve who were capable of bearing arms. It proceeded on the theory that eligible men from 20 to 45 years of age were unpatriotic if they did not volunteer. What shall be said of the bill recommended to us by the Army Staff as a "universal military service bill"? It is the realization of a militaristic dream that asks Congress to authorize a "select" draft for European service of youths from 19 to 25 years of age. All other men are exempt from its terms. Why not men from 26 to 45 years as in other countries. Army officers are to determine the selection of youths and boys who must serve. Without volition or consent on his part, the immature youth of the land is to be conscripted into service at $15 a month to fight the battles. We can till the soil, run the office and shops, but these boys must fight.

ALL OBLIGATED TO RENDER MILITARY SERVICE.

It is the duty of every man to serve his country and to render military service whenever called upon to do so, but before this bill was introduced the President addressed the general public in a statement wherein he said:

I call upon young men and old men alike to turn in hosts to the farm.

This call was for boys to go to the farm. In the same statement a general call was sent out by the President to the farmers of the South to cultivate food and cotton on Southern lands. On the same day Secretary Daniels, of the Navy, gave a statement to the press in favor of retaining boys in the factory, where they would perform a patriotic part of the national defense through shop work.

These suggested "selections" peculiarly seem to meet objections from farmers and organized labor now protesting against conscription, and I call attention to the proposed exemptions from Military service in order to ascertain who are expected to fight our battles and who will determine the selection.

Conscription is to affect only boys from 19 to 25 years of age, according to the so-called staff bill, but it is proposed that those married or supporting dependents, those working on farms and in factories, and those with religious scruples may be exempt. This leaves boys in schools, colleges, or occupations to be drafted to fight our battles.

This feature is not the worst part of the Army Staff bill. No man expects the President to personally select the boys who go on the farm, in the shops, or in the trenches. Regular Army officers will select 499,000 boys and more out of the first draft. That is the power conferred by the staff bill. Federal laws and State laws giving parents a voice over infants at law are to be wiped out. These boys are not now permitted to vote, not bound by contracts, largely irresponsible in law, because of immature age and judgment. When most in need of advice and counsel they are to be taken from homes without their consent or the consent of parents, and the highest court in the land is impotent. Officers just entering service will have greater authority to determine whether it is to be the farm, shop, or trench for the conscript than will the Supreme Court of the United States. No court can review or reverse their acts. The writ of habeas corpus, which protects the rights of criminals and the weak against the strong, is suspended by the staff bill as to the disposition of these boys.

A BEARDLESS ARMY OF BOYS.

But even this proposal, outrivaling autocratic Russia or Imperial Germany, does not set forth the real purpose of the Army staff bill. I read from a statement given out April 17, over his signature, by John Temple Graves, a newspaper correspondent of the highest standing. He says:

The first grand army of 500,000 men, according to the staff officers, will be raised under the selective draft from men not over 20 years of age. It will be the first class. The process of the original levy of the beardless first army of a half million was explained by a member of the General Staff. * * * The staff officers express full confidence there will be enough men of the 19-year class to make the complement of 500,000 and to render unnecessary the immediate calling of the "20-year class." If, however, the registration of 19-year-old men is not sufficient, the 20-year class will be called, and out of this second class will be selected by lot a sufficient number to make up the first 500,000. It is reasonably certain that this is the plan under which the first American Army will be selected and trained for the battle field.

There you have the plan. It does not appear in the press generally, for good reasons, but Graves discloses the fact that a beardless army of 19 years of age is first to be trained for the battle field.

Possibly over 500,000 boys of 19 years will be available for the first army. Of course, men or boys of other ages can be made to take up work now being performed by such boys, so that any "selective" draft for farms or shops is unlikely to occur at that age unless the exemption occurs through influences pressed on officers.

Next, an army of 20-year "beardless boys" will be taken from schools for the second half million levy and "trained for the battle field" to fight our battles in Europe at $15 per month. We will remain home and serve our country on the farms, in offices, or in the shops, while drafted "beardless" boys, unable to vote, with no voice in public affairs—just conscripts—must do the fighting.

A people who patriotically thrill over the concluding words of their national hymn, "the land of the free, and the home of the brave," are about to send their politically voiceless infants, of from 19 to 20 years of age, according to plans stated, to serve in European trenches.

No other Government ever sought to legalize exemption from service of fit men. No other Government ever proposed such a conscription law. No other Government has such a law to-day.

Let me append a statement to show the laws on the subject:

Not one country has a conscription law that approaches the extreme Army Staff bill, and no nation in the world—except England in the present struggle—has ever adopted conscription for over-seas duty.

Ninety days ago not one Member of the House would have predicted that the most moderate of the above laws could be enacted in this country, and yet before a shot is fired we are asked to enact the most arbitrary law ever passed in any country and to abandon the system that has made us a Nation. What has come to pass within 90 days to bring about conscription?

Let us not mistake the situation. Boys are not asking to be relieved from service. They are as brave as their seniors, and are not seeking to escape any just obligation to their Government. All men are brave enough to fight, and 18,000,000 men now estimated to be in European trenches are fighting and dying for their respective countries, but no nation on the face of the earth has yet selected beardless boys from 19 to 25 years to do its fighting and exempted its men from service. Yet the press all over "the land of the free and the home of the brave" terms the Staff bill "universal military service."

This Army Staff bill can not be amended or changed after passing the Senate. We must accept it bodily. The staff refuses to permit any alteration.

Secretary of War Baker has written Chairman DENT, saying:

> I have a deep conviction that any compromise of the principles governing the bill submitted by the department for the raising of a new army would be attended with unfortunate results. * * *

ROOSEVELT WAS ONCE COMMANDER IN CHIEF.

Roosevelt offers 100,000 volunteers and over, ready to serve without delay, imbued with the same patriotism that caused Canadian volunteers to drive conscripts from the trenches. The Secretary of War is reported to have rejected his offer. We need an army, and yet refuse to permit one to be raised.

Will undue glory attach to Roosevelt and his command? Grant, Lee, Logan, and many others acquired prominence during the Civil War. All were not professional soldiers, yet brains and genius find their place in war as in peace. If troops are wanted immediately, why refuse this needed army?

In his most significant utterance made in this country, Balfour says:

> Realize, people of America, that you face a real fight; and be prepared for great individual sacrifice, for it will be demanded.

This war will be no forum in which to try out the comparative merits of the volunteer and regular soldier or the conscript, if you prefer. If won, and it will be won, it must be by hard fighting; it must be won by united effort, and the sooner that fact is recognized by the Army Staff the better for the Nation and all concerned.

The Dent committee bill provides for a volunteer army, but if volunteers are not promptly forthcoming then the President may draft men from 21 to 40 years of age. This gives a range of 20 years, whereas the staff "universal-service bill" (for youths) gives a range of only seven years and does not permit a first test of volunteer enlistments. This staff bill is now pending before a Congress that has been perfecting a child-labor law for the betterment of children. We are now asked to compel them to labor in the trenches at $15 per month.

For nearly a century and a half this country has relied upon its volunteer army. Volunteer service distinguishes a citizen democracy from a military autocracy that exists through conscription. Volunteer service levies patriotic tribute on all men able to serve instead of on the youth of the Nation who are to be drafted, yet those remaining have equal obligation on their part to support the Government on the battle front.

TEN MILLION VOLUNTEERS IF NEED BE.

Mr. Chairman, during the Civil War the number of volunteers from the North serving under different calls reached over 2,500,000, as stated, out of a population of 20,000,000. A draft law was passed in March, 1863, but the total number of men serving under conscription during the entire war only reached 61,947, about 1 in 40, or an insignificant fraction of the total. The 1863 conscription law provided that all men from 20 to 45 years of age should serve their country. On that same basis of population 10,000,000 volunteers easily ought to be raised to prosecute the European war if necessity demands an army of that size.

With less than one-half of our own population to draw upon Great Britain raised 5,000,000 volunteers before adopting conscription last year. Then she drafted all men up to 41 years of age. Four out of five of her men are volunteers. Both Australia and Canada have repudiated a draft law at the polls, but their brave troops on the battle line are driving conscripts out of the enemy's trenches day after day. With only 7,000,000 people to draw upon, Canada has furnished 400,000 men for service, and Australia, with less than 4,000,000 population, has furnished 300,000 men. On that same basis our Government ought to raise 10,000,000 volunteers if need be. The committee bill provides if men do not volunteer then conscription will become effective, but volunteers are first accepted.

From a speech by Representative HUDDLESTON, of Alabama, I find the testimony of Gen. Nelson A. Miles on the subject of volunteer service. No more gallant soldier ever fought battles for his country than the man who recently held the highest command in the American Army. I quote from his testimony before the Military Committee:

> Mr. GORDON. In your judgment, could the continental army be filled without compulsion?
> Gen. MILES. I hope not with compulsion.
> Mr. GORDON. You are opposed to compulsory service?
> Gen. MILES. Absolutely.
> Mr. GORDON. Do you believe that we can raise 133,000 men each year for three years for the continental army without compulsion?
> Gen. MILES. With compulsion, I hope not. I think it would be a very dangerous step toward centralization. As far as conscription is concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War, and with unsatisfactory results. I think there were 54,000 men added to the Army—54,000 additional to the 2,000,000 men—by conscription, but I do know that just at the time of the crisis of the Gettysburg campaign thousands of the best troops, drilled and disciplined men, in the Army had to be taken out of the field and sent back to suppress the riots caused by that unpopular measure. Approximately 10,000 or 12,000 were ordered to New York, and I know that there was a brigade in Pennsylvania which was organized at Huntington and, instead of being sent to the field, where they were needed, they were sent to Philadelphia to maintain order. It was a very unpopular measure at that time in the great crisis of the Nation.

That is the statement of a general recently in command of the United States Army, and a man whose word should go unchallenged, because he knows whereof he speaks, and his word will be accepted before that of the average Regular Army officer. Gen. SHERWOOD, of this House, a man of great war experience, seconds Gen. Miles.

Gen. Leonard Wood, now in command of the Army, a volunteer officer, in official orders issued March 13, 1914, said of the Wisconsin National Guard volunteer troops from my own State:

The National Guard of the State of Wisconsin may be taken as a model in the matter of training, equipment, and business administration.

Following that high praise, I repeat in this place the statement of Gen. Holway, the present commander of the Wisconsin National Guard organization and an officer of high standing in the country and of many years' experience. His statement was given on April 12 of this year. Therein he says:

The volunteer system will give us a large army in a short time. Under this system Wisconsin can easily raise more than its quota of men; this State has already enlisted more men in proportion to its population than any other State in the Union. We now have about 7,000 members in the National Guard alone.

Conscription requires more time than is appreciated. The census of eligible men would first have to be taken, and that alone is a big work. Then the men would have to be examined. After this would come long periods of training with other big problems.

Gen. Holway says the volunteer system is more expeditious. He is right.

WISCONSIN'S GOVERNOR PROTESTS AGAINST CONSCRIPTION.

A telegram at hand from Gov. Emanuel L. Philipp, of Wisconsin, declares as follows regarding this conscription bill now before us:

MADISON, WIS., April 10, 1917.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I recommend that you oppose plan of conscription suggested by the General Staff and reported by the press as being urged upon Congress at this time. The State of Wisconsin stands ready to furnish its full quota of the National Guard as provided by the military defense act of June 3, 1916, promptly or any additional force required to meet the present requirements. We can recruit volunteers much faster than we are receiving equipment and supplies. The spirit of our troops will be much better if we adhere to the volunteer system, and we shall avoid sore spots at home if we defer conscription until it can be shown to be a military necessity. As I see it, public sentiment is not ready for compulsory military service, and I trust that nothing will be done by Congress that will make the war unnecessarily unpopular with the people.

EMANUEL L. PHILIPP, Governor.

During this debate I have received a second and still a third telegram from the governor of Wisconsin. These telegrams are in accordance with my own views after a careful study of the two bills. I insert his third message in the RECORD:

MADISON, WIS., April 24, 1917.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Am firmly convinced that conscription with selective draft at present stage of war is not the will of the people, and that certainly the great majority of those who must serve in the ranks is strongly antagonistic to it. I fear not so much active resistance to the operation of the measure, though this may happen, as passive obstruction to every necessary step of its just accomplishment. The emergency permits no delay. Plans, even if ideal, must reconcile with people and their opinions as they exist. I urge, therefore, that you vote for the Regular Army and the National Guard to be raised to the limit of existing law, and for the opportunity to volunteer as the quickest method to put in being the army that should now be in training; and I further urge that you now provide such legislation as is necessary to presently take all the steps for just conscription up to the selective draft itself, that such draft may immediately be put in effect if volunteering shall fail to meet the emergency.

E. L. PHILIPP,
Governor.

I could quote many high authorities on the value of the volunteer system, and history shows the last war on both sides was led by men who had retired from the Regular Army and whose point of view was enlarged by reason of that fact.

My own State, as previously stated, furnished over a hundred thousand volunteer troops during the Civil War, and while the courage of soldiers on both sides is a matter of common knowledge, it is with pride Wisconsin people point to the fact that our State furnished more troops than any other State for the celebrated Iron Brigade which stood like a rock at Gettysburg. Over half of the effectives of some regiments were lost in that fight, but those who stood their ground saved the day.

Gen. Lucius Fairchild, of Madison, Wis., a brave man, commanded that brigade, and the Grand Army post named after that illustrious officer last week passed a resolution unanimously condemning the Army staff conscriptive bill. Who will say these men are not patriotic. They have been tried in the crucible of war.

Wisconsin is ready to do its full share in carrying on this war. She will furnish her full quota of volunteers, or if the plans of the Army staff for conscription are adopted she will not shirk her duty, but it is not war to select beardless boys to do our fighting and to exempt all others equally able to serve. It is not universal service. It is militarism unequaled anywhere else in the world.

WHO IS IT SAYS BOYS ARE SLACKERS?

The press and the pulpit have inveighed against "slackers" found among boys of from 19 to 25 years, many of whom have not yet formed habits in life or knowledge or judgment of public affairs—boys who have no voice in the Government, and yet who have equal rights to live and be cared for. Why should they alone fight your battles or mine, or the battles of healthy, vigorous ministers of the Gospel, servants of the church, or athletic editorial writers, exempted from service by reason of this act? And yet such boys are termed cowards and slackers when they protest against the "selection" we are asked to make. Why are the boys slackers any more than their critics whom we are asked to exempt? How about the vast army of some 15,000,000 exempt men between the ages of 26 and 45, covering 20 of the best years of their lives? Who says the youth of the land alone shall fight our battles? Are boys to be lulled into a prospect of agricultural pursuits when this bill becomes a law? Will they be given only $15 a month while baring their breasts to gentle farm breezes or to German bullets? Will exempt boys be permitted by Army officers to handle tools in the factory at home at good wages, while their classmates of the same age are facing German tanks and German trench warfare, at $15 per month? Who determines the selection, and how and why and by what method? Graves says 19-year-old boys will first be selected. How and why?

Can it be that all exempt classes will be relieved from service by the Army Staff because of their need at home, while select-draft boys fight our battles. Who places confidence in such an unjust proposition? If it is a sacrifice to draw $15 per month while facing death in the trenches, then why not put all of military age in the list, as is done in every other country, and why not extend the age limit, in order to reach all those who have neither dependents nor responsibilities? That was the draft law passed in 1863 and the law of other countries. What conditions have changed the attitude of brave and patriotic men in their responsibility to government?

Nothing shows the gross injustice of this conscriptive bill more than the policy of selecting boys, one-half of whom have no votes nor influence, but are asked to do our fighting, and these boys are termed "slackers" if they rebel against this vicarious sacrifice.

We are continually urged by the press to stand by the President. I did so on the armed-merchantman proposal, and within 30 days learned from the same source that such course was useless.

On the $7,000,000,000 appropriation I voted like all others, with no means of verifying or determining the necessity for that enormous amount; yet, in common with the majority, I believe great power should be given the Executive. I am ready to place unlimited power in the hands of the President now.

The Dent committee bill gives the President power to raise troops by volunteers if possible, by draft if necessary, but it makes men, not boys alone, liable to conscription. Why not support the bill now before us?

CENSORSHIP VERSUS CONSCRIPTION.

The demand of the press that Congress pass the Army Staff draft bill would bear more weight if the press had accepted without protest the espionage and censorship demanded by the same Army Staff. Wisely enough, the press vigorously resented the Army Staff bill and Secretary Baker's proposal, and the President's program in this respect was modified, and modified because of the protests of the press. Yet when a measure of equally far-reaching importance emanates in like manner from Regular Army circles, a bill not equaled in autocratic military selective power in any other country in the world, a bill that the press has failed to discuss in detail so that its true meaning might become generally known, when legislators refuse to become a "rubber stamp," all are denounced and their motives impugned.

The espionage bill drawn by Regular Army officials would have endangered the freedom of the press for all time to come. It was undemocratic and un-American. The so-called selective-draft bill drawn by Regular Army officials will tend to inaugurate a precedent affecting the freedom of men who are to be selected by Army officers. No more abject or involuntary servitude was ever presented in this country, and it is equally un-American. All the pull, influence, and pressure that politics, wealth, and power can exert will be brought to bear on these officers by those looking for exemption from the European selective draft. I have shown repeated instances where another branch of the service has capitulated and indorsed worthless, wasteful waterway schemes because of powerful influences directly exerted on officers who owed their first start to such influences. How can the result be otherwise?

The power of "selection" is now demanded, and the influence invited to determine exemptions against such selections will be a thousand times more objectionable in a democracy than any mere question of dollars and cents. The anxious mother in her far-off home, the heavy-hearted father, or the boy drawn have no means of questioning his selection. He will be sent to fight the battles of his elders who are exempted from service, who live thousands of miles from the scene of conflict, and yet we call the staff indefensible bill "universal service" for war.

DELAY UNDER CONSCRIPTION.

Military authorities admit it will take four months to prepare conscription lists and make selections. They figure on a year before a green army of 1,000,000 conscripts will be ready for service. Members have claimed in debate full quotas will be ready, and the adjutant general of my own State guarantees Wisconsin's quota of volunteers will be ready in one-third of that time or less. The committee bill is expeditious and certain.

Under the committee bill volunteering immediately proceeds if the Army Staff does not block the way, while at the same time preliminary steps to compel conscription if needed will be pushed without a single day's delay. The committee bill will advance the raising of an army, the Army Staff plan will retard it.

These statements made in debate have not been denied, and yet Members on this floor have been bombarded with telegrams, letters, and abusive press articles founded on misinformation and misunderstanding of proposed measures and actual conditions.

Speaker CLARK, ex-Speaker CANNON, Gens. Miles, Wood, Sherwood, and many other patriotic men of this country voice their objections to throwing to the winds the volunteer system. Grant, Sherman, Lee, and other great authorities led volunteers and praised volunteers for their fighting qualities.

In my own State the governor, the adjutant general with whom I served when we were both lieutenants in the same regiment 25 years ago, and many other leading men have protested against abandoning the volunteer system until it has been tried. After a long service with officers and men, some of whom are yet in the Wisconsin National Guard, it is significant that out of 7,000 men and officers now in service not one has written me or asked me to support the Army Staff bill. Men who do not understand compulsory training from compulsory service and are exempt from service, men who have no accurate knowledge, past, present, or future, of the measures before us, have demanded we support the Staff bill. I do not criticize their insistence, but after five years' service in the Regular Army and a longer service in the State volunteer service I believe the Army Staff bill is un-American and indefensible, and I can not conscientiously vote for it. I desire to support the President and will place all power in his hands.

ALL POWER GIVEN THE PRESIDENT.

Unless opposed to draft under all circumstances, any man can patriotically support the committee or Dent bill, which comes to us from the committee with a majority vote. The committee by its bill has given the President full authority to try out the volunteer system without further action by Congress. If volunteers are not promptly secured, the President may compel conscription of all men from 21 to 40 years, inclusive. That will be universal service in fact, and it is the only universal-service bill before us.

The Army Staff should not fear to trust the President. Congress has placed in his hands $7,000,000,000 for war purposes and should trust his judgment as to the necessity and time for conscription. The people will trust him. By the committee bill conscription will cease with the end of the war. The right of habeas corpus to review arbitrary and unwarranted military selection is preserved by the committee bill and is denied by the Army Staff bill, which drafts children.

The selective-draft bill, in my judgment, outranks the conscriptive powers of any autocracy in Europe, is unjust and oppressive, and is a menace to the principles of democracy, which we have fought for and preserved during nearly a century and a half of national existence.

The committee bill gives every power granted by the Staff bill, extending the age limit and permitting us to continue a volunteer system which gained for us our liberties in 1776 and our unity as a Nation in 1865. It is the part of militaristic folly to throw this preserver overboard without first testing its effectiveness when war is again upon us. As has well been said, we are all equally patriotic and desire to win the war as soon as possible, but let us not repudiate without trial a system that has won for us every war in the past.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I must ask not to be interrupted until I have finished my argument, as I have only 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this is the gravest question which has confronted this country in a half century, if not in its whole history. It is proposed to overturn principles which the American people have cherished since the beginning of our Government, and yet on every hand there are forces which are impatient with any attempt at calm consideration and of counseling with each other as to the solution of the problem. The organized forces which are determined, at all costs, upon forcing the men of this country to serve on the battle fields of Europe have made practically no attempt at argument. Except in a very few cases those who are anxious to force men to go to battle have resorted to the most vile abuse and threats to accomplish their purpose. Even without knowing how a Member of Congress would decide the question, these people who would force men to the battle field have shown every degree of intolerance and contempt for the man who insists upon getting all the light and argument possible upon the subject before reaching a decision. They refuse to grant to others the right to act according to their consciences and information.

Mr. Chairman, a question which so vitally affects the welfare of the hundred millions of people living in this country now and of the countless millions who are to come hereafter can not receive too much consideration and investigation. I have spent days, yes, weeks, studying and investigating the question that is now before us. I have studied the hearings on the bill before the Committee on Military Affairs. I have read the hearings before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on the subject of universal military service. I have studied the debates in the British House of Commons upon the bill to force men to serve in the army, and I have spent hours in conference with military experts discussing the subject. I have felt it my duty to do this, and yet many men with the intolerance of the primitive savage can not find words sufficiently vitriolic to vent their spleen upon Members of this body, not because the subject was not being given earnest and patient thought but because the question had not been immediately decided according to their wishes. [Applause.]

If this situation were not so full of tragedy, there would be really much amusement to be gained in observing that the very great majority of these men, to my personal knowledge, have opposed practically every effort to democratize our political institutions and our economic and industrial systems. Oh, how their hearts now crave democracy when they are anxious to force into service on the battle field people who are not so fortunate as to this world's goods as they themselves are. How beautifully they discuss the possibility of seeing the son of the rich family serving with the son of the laborer. How strange it all is that they have now become so desirous of rubbing shoulders with the factory hand and the miner from whom they have heretofore held aloof. The generosity of these men is enough to make the angels weep. They picture to us the beautiful sight of the millionaire sleeping in the same dog tent with the poor man as if that constituted real democracy. How far is all that from a democratic impulse that might cause the rich and poor in general to visit joyfully each other's homes. Without adopting the tactics of the forced military service advocates by charging hypocrisy, I do ask if such talk is not altogether disgusting? These new preachers of democracy know full well that with the most universal form of forced service on the field of battle, for which, by the way, this bill does not provide, practically all of those who serve will be the men that now have a hard battle to make a living for themselves and those near to their hearts.

One of the chief arguments made in support of forcing people to serve in battle is that it will enable those who sit in judgment to pick out for slaughter those whom they consider to be inferior men. Are these men really sincere in this argument? How does this reconcile with the proposition that it is democratic and will bring the rich man's son into communion with his fine-spirited but poor fellow being? Does anyone think that they really want this?

Who feels himself so important, so wise, and so just that he wishes to sit in judgment upon all his fellow men, and in this "selective" way, which the minority of the committee has described, decide which man they want to send to slaughter, and who, on the other hand, because of their greater excellence and superiority, ought to be saved from slaughter? That, sir, is a decision that I personally do not want to make for anyone else.

If there are men who have the disposition and nature which makes them wish to engage in battle, that is a different thing, and they only are responsible for their decision to fight, but I would feel it the part of arrogance in myself to assume the right and wisdom to say that a man is an inferior individual and of no consequence to society, and hence must go before the cannon and machine gun.

It has been constantly asserted that according to the philosophy of democracy there is a universal liability to serve in battle. This premise has been assumed by the conscriptionists. For my part I deny that the sound philosophy of democracy creates any such liability. There are two things which, according to sound principles of democracy, not only can not be left to the opinion of Government officials but can not even be left to the decision of the majority. One of these is the right to an equal voice in determining the rules of human conduct, the other is the right to life itself.

The fundamental principle of democracy is that the decision of the majority as to the rules of human conduct must always prevail, but if the majority could deprive all but a select few of the right to their equal voice in the determination of the rules of human conduct, the very purpose of democracy would be defeated and the individual could be made a slave at the mere whim of the majority. This is equally true as to the individual's right to live. In homely phrase, the individual must be assured of his right to life and to vote in order to give vitality to the principle of majority rule. If the principles of democracy should permit the destruction of all those "selected" by the majority, then the mere fact that one had become a part of such a Government would mean that he could be deprived of his life, and consequently of his voice in the Government upon any pretext, if the majority should so decide. As engaging in battle means almost certain death within a certain time, then the forcing of anyone into battle is equal to ordering his death and depriving him of the very advantages which he is supposed to have secured by becoming a part of the so-called democracy.

If men are forced to go into battle against their wish, it will be because, as of old, that a greater force compels them to do so and they can not help themselves and not because of any implied principle of sound democratic philosophy. [Applause.]

To be a good soldier, like anything else, one must be adapted to it. It requires special qualities to as great a degree as do mechanics, teachers, doctors, and others. It requires a certain quality of mind and body to be a good soldier. The man who must be pushed into battle not only is of no use as a soldier but is, in fact, a positive drawback to the rest of the army. This is not my opinion alone, but is the opinion and experience of many military men of long service.

Maj. W. C. Harllee, of the United States Marine Corps, who has served in that branch for 17 years and who served as a private, corporal, sergeant, and first sergeant during the Philippine insurrection—and, by the way, he was all the time among the bullets in the Philippines—and as a cadet at the West Point Military Academy for two years, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, said:

> Unwilling men burden armies, eat its substance, retard its action, and give it panic.

He further says:

> I am opposed to universal service or compulsory service, or any other kind of service than that rendered by willing men.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CROSSER. I will if I have time left when I have finished my argument.

Many other military men, when free from restraint, speak to the same effect.

The British Army and Navy have been the strongest factors on the side of the allies in the present war and will unquestionably have more to do with the final outcome than any other single factor; and yet the British Navy is composed entirely of volunteers, and the British Army consists of 5,000,000 volunteers, who had enlisted before the draft law was put into effect. Under the draft law the British Government has added only a million and a half to its army, and thus far none of the drafted men have been put into action.

The soldiers from the British colonies, namely, the men from Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, have done as much, if not more, than any other part of the British Army. The Canadian and Australian volunteers have been in the hardest battles of the war.

Canada, with a population less than that of the State of New York, has raised a volunteer army of 400,000.

The people of Australia, long after the war had begun, voted upon the question of foreing men to go to war and voted the proposition down.

The British colonel, F. N. Maude, says:

> England, in January, 1915, had enrolled two and a half million men out of a total male population of 4,600,000 between the ages of 19 and 35. This is almost two-thirds of the total men available under 40, and almost exactly the same proportion as the strictest law of compulsion in Europe would have given her. It is one-sixth more than the Germans had been taking out of their annual contingents.

During the Civil War in this country, according to the report of the Secretary of War in 1865, the total number raised by draft from the beginning to the end of the war equaled only 2.3 per cent, or 62,000 men, of the total number of troops raised.

Gen. SHERWOOD says that during that war they sent him 72 drafted men, and that only 2 of them served at the front.

Another argument made by the advocates of forced military service is that the volunteers could not be organized as well as those brought in by draft; that they could not take care of them in such numbers as would present themselves.

In answer to that, I wish to ask if a force of men could not hold back the crowds of volunteers as easily as they could drag in the conscripts, and since the military officers of the Government would be in charge of both kinds of men would it not be possible for them to organize the volunteers as well as they could organize drafted men. If not, why not? But we are told that the purpose of selective draft is to enable the military authorities to take such men as they want for the armies and leave the others for industrial and agricultural pursuits. You know that the minority of the committee is going to make up a great army from the poolroom sharks, of which Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina spoke with such justified sarcasm. If they so desire, could not the military authorities also select from the volunteers the men that they desire for the Army and send back the remaining volunteers to the occupations of civil life?

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Not now. I will endeavor to yield later if I am allowed time.

I do not wish to question the motives of anyone, but I am forced to the conclusion that the effect of the minority report, if adopted, would be to establish permanently the compulsory idea.

In my opinion if such a principle should be made a permanent policy it would endanger the fundamental principles of democracy.

The trouble with the military experts is that their desire to construct a human machine has blinded them to that grander thing, the human heart.

Sir, it is much easier to go with the tide than to swim against it. It would be much more convenient for the moment to do that which would silence those who have been indulging in fiery abuse and threats; but, being convinced after a great deal of thought that I would be deliberately doing that which I believe to be absolutely wrong in voting for the minority report. I can not with a clear conscience do so. [Applause.]

It has been suggested to practically every Member of this House that it would be to his political advantage to vote for conscription and thereby avoid the intolerant abuse in which most of the newspapers of the country have indulged. That, in my opinion, is an insult to any sincere man, and it would be moral cowardice of the basest kind to vote for what he believes to be wrong on as grave a question as this simply because he might wish to advance his political ambitions. I, for one, refuse to do it, and in reply to those who chatter and bark about "standing by the Chief Executive," I wish to say that I have supported his policies almost invariably heretofore, certainly as far as I could, and would do so in this case if I felt that in so doing I would be doing right.

The Constitution requires every man in this Congress to do his best—and that means that which he thinks is right—to promote the welfare of the people of the United States. No man can excuse himself for doing that which he thinks is wrong by saying that he did it because the executive branch of the Government insisted that he do so.

If it is desired by the people of the United States that Members of Congress should not vote and speak as their judgment and conscience dictates, then the Constitution should be changed so that the responsibility would not longer rest upon them in regard to such matters.

The favorite, because they consider it the most effective, cry of the draft advocates is that all who do not comply at once with their demands are "pro-German." The same cry was used in Australia during the referendum campaign on the question of conscription, which was submitted to the people long after the war had started. In that campaign there were placards, "Vote yes, for Australia; no, for the Kaiser."

If you will pardon a reference to myself, I wish to say that every one of my ancestors on both sides were born in Scotland. My father and mother were both in middle age when they left that beautiful little country. I myself was 7 years old when my parents left Scotland for Ohio. At the beginning of the war two of my first cousins went with the British Army to the front in Flanders, not, however, as conscripts, but as volunteers. I believe a third went later as a volunteer. I think, therefore, that it will test the credulity of even the most intolerant advocate of forced military service to honestly believe that I am in the least "pro-German."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CROSSER. Can the gentleman just give me three minutes additional?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will yield the gentleman three minutes additional.

Mr. CROSSER. In conclusion I wish to quote upon this subject from the speech of Daniel Webster delivered in Congress on December 9, 1814. Webster has heretofore been considered one of the greatest thinkers this country, and even the world, has ever produced. Mr. Webster said:

* * * * * * *

The supporters of the measure before us (a bill for conscription) act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers, by construction, out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion, which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free, and limited Government, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions that government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort of misery, than has been exercised by any civilized government, with one exception, in modern times.

* * * * * * *

A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction, a free government without adequate provisions for personal security is an absurdity, a free government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

* * * * * * *

Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the anguish and distress which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor and to rest in security and happiness? Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the strokes of death were to fall from heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in the majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death.

* * * * * * *

Laws, sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad like the fabled serpent's teeth, they will spring up into armed men. A military force can not be raised in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If the administration has found that it can not form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it can not enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail, and, having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our Government.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to hurry through and cut out enough of this manuscript to be able to return to the gentleman from Nebraska a part of the 20 minutes he has so generously allotted me. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether other gentlemen have noted a recent peculiar change in the situation as to this measure. For some time I received scores, hundreds of telegrams and communications asking me to support the policy of universal military service. [Applause.] I endeavored to find a bill before the House providing for universal military service and failed to do so. [Applause.] Suddenly the same gentlemen who previously could be satisfied with nothing short of universal military service began another crusade, and again I was flooded with telegrams and communications from New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other suburbs of my constituency asking me to vote for the President's plan of a selective conscription law. The principles of these gentlemen seem to be like the feasts of the church, movable. Monday they will be satisfied with nothing short of universal military training; Tuesday they demand a selective draft only, and can be satisfied with nothing else. What it will be on Wednesday remains to be seen.

Mr. Chairman, not a single Member of either House of the Congress of the United States wants to withhold from the Government all the military and naval strength it may need to meet and overcome its enemies. There is no division of sentiment on that question. All want to do the same thing so far as preserving the record of the American Republic, which has never been defeated in war and which, so far as any dangers that now threaten it are concerned, will remain unbeaten.

All the acerbity that has characterized this debate in Congress, in the newspapers, and on the streets has come from the heat with which the supporters of this or that plan have presented their views. I refer to those whose views are honest, not those who would promote military activities for profit, especially not to those munitions makers and other traders who would involve the universe in war and send scouting parties to Mars to insure dividends [applause], nor to financiers who have made investments in war bonds that they want the taxpayers of the United States to indorse. They are influential and noisy, but not above suspicion. [Applause.]

Many excellent people who read little but the articles of special pleaders have been persuaded that Germany, which has not yet sent an army across a sea that is from 30 to 300 miles wide, will be knocking at our doors in three months with 14-inch shells. They forget that England, the next-door neighbor to Germany and her favorite enemy, has not yet been invaded or seriously hurt. They also seem to forget that it is 3,500 miles farther from Wilhemshaven to New York than to the English ports. They are needlessly nervous, as the President said in one of his addresses to Congress.

These people make the sincere element that has joined in the choral demand for a reversal of the traditional American policy of reliance upon volunteers for the defense of the country.

They denounce Prussianism, which is merely the supreme development of militarism, as a hideous monster that must be destroyed and embrace it as means of doing so.

We are gravely told that volunteers have always failed, that American volunteers have failed, and that England found them a failure and was finally compelled to resort to conscription.

The greatest test that volunteers were ever put to in this country was in the Civil War. In that war the Union forces, first and last, amounted to about 2,800,000 men, and the Confederates from Fort Sumter to Appomattox had about 610,000 men. On both sides they were nearly all volunteers. Both sides tried conscription and it was not a success for either.

What has recently happened in Great Britain in the employment of volunteers has been repeatedly misrepresented.

The facts are, as reported by excellent authority, that Great Britain raised an army of about 6,500,000 men, of whom 5,000,000, or more than 11 per cent of the total population of the British Islands, were volunteers.

Are the British more patriotic or courageous than Americans? I do not think so. Can we get an adequate supply of volunteers? I believe so, and that we can get them more quickly than we can get an army of conscripts. Furthermore, I believe that they will be better soldiers. British volunteers came to the colors so rapidly that there was difficulty in handling them and the authorities actually discouraged enrollment by raising the standard for recruits. Secretary Stanton also had more volunteers in 1862 than he could handle and stopped recruiting for a while.

The population of Great Britian is less than half that of the United States and she raised 5,000,000 volunteers and converted them into an army almost within the sound of the guns of her mighty enemy and Von Hindenberg and the Crown Prince will admit that they are good soldiers, whatever the advocates of conscription here may think.

We are not in the desperate straits of France and England in August, 1914. There has been an unparalleled draft on the resources and men of the central powers for nearly three years. Germany, whom we have recently declared officially is our enemy, is now fighting on the defensive. Her power is necessarily declining while that of the allies has recently received the most tremendous increment in the backing of this Government.

We can organize an army on either the plan submitted by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs or that of the minority. Both provide conscription, but that of the majority makes the stronger appeal to me. It does not insult the young men of the country by assuming that they will not do as the young men of England did, come voluntarily to their country's assistance. It provides for filling up the gaps in the Regular Army, and for taking into the Federal service all the State troops or National Guard.

In these two steps both bills are alike. It is in the third paragraph of section 1, in both bills, that we find the first difference in them. Besides the 925,000 men to come in through the Regular Army and the State troops both authorize the calling to the colors 500,000 more men. The bill of the House committee says that they shall be given an opportunity to volunteer and that if they fail to do so they may then be conscripted. The minority bill, that which was prepared where the laws of a Republic should never be written, in the War Department, denies the opportunity to volunteer, assumes that our young men are not brave and patriotic, and proceeds at once to lay the hand of the conscript officer on the shoulder of such as may be wanted.

My contention is that the drastic method, the odious conscription plan, should not be resorted to until a chance has been given for getting men into the Army on a basis that is generally regarded as more honorable. Even advocates of the conscript system say that it is inadvisable to have volunteers and conscripts in the same army because the former are thought to have a more honorable status. I fancy this must be true, for certainly it will be the men of spirit who do not require compulsion to bring them to the defense of their country. [Applause.]

All southern men who undertake to discuss this question have it thrown at them that the Southern Confederacy resorted to conscription in the spring of 1862, less than a year after the war began. So it did, but the history of that period does not increase my respect for the system.

The first men enrolled by the Confederate States were in the main enlisted for one year. The periods of enlistment began to expire in the spring of 1862 and the authorities of the Confederacy, realizing the situation and the plight the Government would be in if the army that had had a year of service should be disbanded by expiration of their enlistment contract, took the drastic step of conscription. It was done primarily to retain in the service the men who had been trained and disciplined in the field. However, the law was made general and the abortive attempts to enforce it caused much discontent throughout the South, notably in North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

In a political campaign in North Carolina in the autumn of 1863 conscription was made an issue and the charge was frequently uttered that a military despotism was being set up. It was specially unpopular in that State, although North Carolina sent a greater percentage of her people into the Confederate service than any other State in the South and none made a better record for loyalty and gallantry. The attitude of North Carolina to the Confederacy is summed up in the proud boast of her citizens that she was "first at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, and last at Appomattox."

The historian, John Christopher Schwab, of Yale University, in his book The Confederate States of America, says:

> Another cause of discontent, especially in North Carolina, was the adoption by the Confederate authorities of a policy of conscription.

The act was unpopular throughout the South, and the unpopularity of the law was increased by the exemptions.

However, the exemptions provided in the first two acts of the Confederacy were inconsiderable compared to those proposed in the bill supplied to Congress by the War Department. In that bill everybody is exempt except 500,000 of those who are 19 years old and not over 25.

It is interesting to note that newspaper men were exempt in the Confederate conscription act, and it has been said that at one time there were not less than 50 editors on one small paper in an unimportant town, unimportant from the point of view of population. The abuse of the editorial exemption became such a scandal that the act was amended to reduce the number of editors and printers who were not compelled to take up arms.

I am curious to learn how many of the noisy editorial shouters for war in the Northeastern part of our country have availed, or will avail, themselves of the opportunity now open to enlist in either the Regular Army or the State military organizations. Will they wait to be conscripted?

The popular opposition to conscription in the Confederacy led to dangerous conflicts between the Confederate and State authorities. Gov. Brown, of Georgia, had a hot correspondence with the officials of the Confederacy at Richmond protesting against it. Alexander H. Stephens, vice president of the Confederate Government, in a speech to the Georgia Legislature in March, 1864, declared the whole system of conscription radically wrong. In fact, it was popular nowhere, but it may be said in extenuation of the Richmond Government that it represented a constituency of about 7,000,000 white people, including Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky, and was being hard pressed by the rich and powerful North, with a population of 20,252,382, according to the census of 1860.

From Draper's The Civil War in America I quote what he took from a book entitled "The Diary of a War Clerk in Richmond." The author of the diary said:

> To-day I saw two conscripts from West Virginia conducted to the cars, going to Lee's army in chains. It made a chill shoot through my breast.

The author goes on to say that conscription failed to replenish the army.

If the purpose of military circles to adopt the European system of enforced service should be agreed to by Congress, how long will it be before more Americans will be dragged in chains to the camp or battle field? May it not meet with resistance by people who are unaccustomed to the European military systems and class distinctions, a resistance that will very greatly disturb the peace? I hope its friends are not mistaken in their estimate of what they propose, but I fear they are.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will take the liberty of quoting from a letter written by Gen. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, one time Speaker of this House and later Secretary of the Treasury, in which he gives a very frank opinion of the conscript law of the Confederacy that has been referred to in this debate. The letter was written to the Secretary of War at Richmond August 5, 1862. Gen. Cobb said:

> I venture to intrude some suggestions which my observations in Georgia have brought to mind.
> This war must close in a few months, perhaps weeks, or else will be fought with an increased energy and malignancy on the part of our enemies. I look for the latter result, and at all events think it is the contingency for which we should prepare. That preparation requires a large increase of our army. How is it to be effected? The conscript law has performed its work. It retained the 12-months men in the service. Besides that, it compelled large numbers to volunteer and thus fill up the ranks of the regiments already in the field. These two results have been accomplished, and beyond that it will be unwise to calculate upon the conscript law as the means of furnishing troops for the army. The number of conscripts will be very small—not worth considering in calculating the strength of our army. Such, I am sure, is the case in Georgia.

[Applause.]

Further along in the same letter Gen. Cobb, in speaking of the unpopularity of the conscript law, said:

> Why it is so is useless to inquire, though I may say, in passing, that the law is unpopular—almost odious. * * * I would, then, repeal the conscript law so far as the future is concerned, retaining all that you have made by it, and then call upon the governors to furnish quotas or authorize the formation of companies, regiments, and even brigades and divisions, to be accepted by the President and to be officered by him. * * * It will relieve the new recruits from the odium of being conscripts.

There is much more evidence from the inside circles of the Confederate States Government that shows the unpopularity and ineffectiveness of the conscript law of 1862.

Any reader of James Ford Rhodes's history and his account of the draft riots in New York, Boston, and Troy will learn that the policy was just as unpopular and ineffective in the North.

I have not the time to read it, Mr. Chairman, but I will print in this connection an article that recently appeared in the New York Evening Post on the question of conscription and how it failed to appeal to the free people of Australia. It was voted on by the suffragans of that huge country and all her soldiers in the field in Europe and at home. These men who were all battling for the British Empire in Asia and Europe were expected to support the conscription measure. They voted against it by a tremendous majority. [Applause.] Soldiers though they were for the time being, they knew that civil liberty is always menaced by the military spirit, and they voted against militarism.

No better illustration of that truth can be found than in the legislation in the German Empire.

The great Von Moltke, than whom an abler soldier has rarely appeared, contended that the army should be the judge of its own necessities and should have the power to vote a tax on the people to meet those necessities. But a man greater than Von Moltke, Prince Bismarck, vetoed the suggestion. He said that he would never consent to giving up civilian control of the army. [Applause.]

Yet the Parliament of the German Empire gave up the practice of voting military supplies each year, and in 1871 voted the annual requirements for three years; in 1874 it voted the military budget for five years, and in 1880 voted a largely increased amount for seven years. There is a lesson for us in that.

Mr. GORDON. Of course, our Constitution prohibits that thing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course, it does; but what is the Constitution between militarists? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are at war with a powerful and resourceful enemy and we must see it through to a successful conclusion. Conscriptionists and anticonscriptionists alike hold that view. We have pledged all the resources of the country—men, money, and property—and I for one entertain no doubt of the success of our arms. But loyalty to the country does not call for an abandonment of one's views about how the campaign should be conducted, from the legal point of view, nor how the armies should be recruited. Whether conscripts or volunteers, our recruits will have to be trained, and if we follow the wise example of Lord Kitchener months will be required for that tedious but necessary work. I do not believe that men who go into the service under compulsion will be more quickly educated to their new duties than the more responsive patriot who enlists because he is willing to make the supreme sacrifice for his country.

But how about the patriots who are behind this flood of telegrams that Members are receiving? Will they enlist, or is it their purpose to leave that privilege for the man who labors in the mine, factory, or field?

If all the people who are demanding compulsory military service will at once enroll themselves with the Regular Army or the National Guard, we will have an Army of a million men in 48 hours. And before we compel them to shoulder a musket let us call their attention to this opportunity to serve their country. If they should fail—and I will not insult them by suggesting that they will fail—to enlist, we can then resort to conscription unless meantime the surging democracy of Europe has toppled over the last remaining autocrat and established peace on the basis of common sense, justice, and democracy.

ANTICONSCRIPTION IN AUSTRALIA—COMMONWEALTH VOTED DOWN THE COMPULSION PROPOSAL—MANY SIMILAR FACTORS IN PRESENT SITUATION HERE—SOLDIERS IN FIELD REJECTED CONSCRIPTION.

[By Louis Esson.]

(Mr. Esson is an Australian writer, who landed in this country only a short time ago. He was in Australia throughout the campaign for and against compulsion, and was in a position to know and understand the situation in that country.)

Now that the question of conscription is being discussed throughout the United States, perhaps it might be worth while to relate how the problem was dealt with by the people of the Australian Commonwealth.

The conditions are not dissimilar. America is now faced with the same situation that confronted Australia at the beginning of the war. Both countries are democracies, both hate militarism, and value, above all, personal and intellectual freedom. Both are distant from the scene of action. Under the voluntary system Australia has sent over seas a number of men that, in proportion to population, represents a United States army of six millions. Has America to be conscripted before the people are given a chance to show what their response might be? And is conscription to be brought in without consulting the people at all?

When the prime minister of Australia, William Morris Hughes, set out on a diplomatic mission to London he was an opponent of conscription; but doubtless his triumphal tour through Great Britain, where he was hailed as the savior of the Empire, and the enthusiastic support he received from the Northcliffe press modified his earlier views, and he "evolved" so rapidly that he became the idol of the extreme jingo party. But the people of Australia had no illusions. As his star rose in England, so did it set in Australia. A labor man had departed from the Commonwealth; a dictator returned. As soon as he landed, though his statements were guarded, it was known that an attempt would be made to bring in conscription. A section of the press urged Hughes to bring in conscription at once, without consideration or discussion, but the opposition from the labor party was too strong, especially in the senate. So a compromise was effected. It was resolved to hold a referendum on the subject, every man and woman in the Commonwealth having the right to an equal vote.

ARGUMENTS USED HERE.

It is surprising how the same arguments used some months ago in Australia have been brought forward here to-day. History still repeats itself. A referendum was unnecessary, the militarists contended, for nine-tenths of the people favored conscription. The press said the same thing. At first it seemed that the vote would be carried by an overwhelming majority. "There is only one side to the question," said Hughes in the house, and it was only with difficulty that the arguments of the opposition ever got through to the people. The censor exerted his autocratic powers to the full. Free speech and discussion were thwarted as far as possible. Those who were opposed to conscription were assailed as pro-Germans, disloyalists, slackers, and enemies of society—terms not unknown in the amenities of controversy at the present time.

It was an exciting campaign, the bitterest Australia has ever known. While Hughes and other cabinet ministers were stumping the country in favor of compulsory service, other members of the party were speaking against the Government. With a territory about the size of the United States, and with only 5,000,000 of people, menaced also by swarming Asiatic neighbors, Australia had already sent to the front over 300,000 men, besides rendering useful service in the Pacific with its own navy. Far from voluntarism having failed, it had proved a triumphant success. Australia had not shirked its duty; but it was soon felt that the country could not further be drained of young men and be able confidently to face the future. Many important industries were short-handed. Farm laborers, harvesters, shearers, and other rural workers were needed in every district; and it was clearly seen that Australia could render more valuable service to Great Britain and the allies by keeping up her primary industries, especially the supply of foodstuffs.

Other arguments brought forward against conscription were the hatred of militarism in all its manifestations and the feeling that the citizen rights of a democracy were in grave danger. Militarists talked of the "equality of sacrifice" under compulsion; they still talk, but they no longer deceive anybody. Militarism and democracy are incompatible. It is certainly a measure opposed to the tradition of the British peoples, and to be resorted to only when voluntarism has been fairly tried and proved to have been a failure.

SOLDIERS VOTED AGAINST PLAN.

The result of the poll was a triumph for democracy, leading one to believe that no free people in the world would knowingly put themselves under the power of a military autocracy.

Sir William Irvine, a nephew of John Mitchell, the famous Irish politician, and one of the ablest men on the conscription side, had hopes to the last that the soldiers' vote would carry the day. It had been rightly decided that the Australian soldiers at the front should have their say in the matter, though a distinguished Melbourne lawyer thought it a simpler plan to add 200,000 votes to the "Yes" side, because he knew what the opinion of the soldiers would be. But to the surprise of many, who take their opinions ready-made, the soldiers voted against conscription by a huge majority. This fact was at first suppressed, but soon became an open secret.

No doubt, on his return from England Mr. Hughes believed that the newspapers really represented public opinion. Most of these papers urged him to go ahead, the people were with them, for they represented the people. Dis aliter visum—the people thought otherwise.

And it seems not unlikely that if a referendum were taken in the United States, or perhaps even in any country of Europe, the voice of the people would come as a startling surprise to many of the self-appointed "leaders," who talk so confidently for them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen waste time talking about the righteousness of this war. That hour is past. War has been declared by the war-making power of this Government, which also has the power to make laws regulating the war. And when we made war we became a united people. We are ready to vote anything in the way of men or money to carry it to a successful conclusion.

Men waste their time talking about universal obligation. There is not a man here but what admits the truth of the proposition. Men waste their time in filling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon the subject of universal service. The question now is a question of conscription—a chance drawing, a draft, a new proposition to take the place of the old rule of the volunteer service. And you may disguise the propaganda as much as you like and say it has nothing to do with the 10,000 telegrams and letters and newspapers we are getting every day to stand by universal service, universal training, and universal obligation. The question before us is whether we are to stop in the midst of crossing a stream and trade horses; whether we are to try the conscript plan and conscript only the boys who can not vote and have nothing to say, in order that they may do the fighting for us; change your whole plan and your whole system in the face of an enemy. And I for one will not vote for conscription [applause] until you have at least given an opportunity to the brave men who are willing to fight. [Applause.]

And I want to say here we want fighters and not slackers. If there is anything in the world that the Kaiser wants to meet it is an army of conscripts on the other side. You say men will not enlist? I say they will enlist, and they are enlisting. Notwithstanding the unfairness of the law of this Government, now, they are enlisting. Four thousand a day—more than the General Staff can even take care of. Excuse me, my Boston friend; I said "Stäff" and not "Stiff." I hope that is right. We call it "Stäff" out in Illinois. Now, in the South it may be "General Staff," but they will call it "General Debility" and "General Red Tape" before they get through with the drafting system.

The Secretary of the Navy says the men are coming here faster than they can use them. He does not want 25,000 a day, and I see in last night's paper that 4,000 were enlisted in a day, and Illinois leads in the enlistments—and it will lead them. [Applause.] The Secretary of the Navy says, "We are satisfied if we can maintain the present daily average—better satisfied, in fact, than if we got 26,000 men in a single day." The General Staff does not intend to let the volunteers have a chance in this war. [Applause.]

Col. Theodore Roosevelt, who was the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of this country for seven years, a trained soldier, tendered his services. I have offered a resolution here, asking, if it be consistent with public policy, that the Secretary of War let us know whether they have accepted his services or not. The papers showed that the colonel applied at the White House. I suppose his application was stamped in red ink and referred to the Secretary of War, and by him referred to the Assistant Secretary of War, and by him referred to the General Staff, and it is probably sleeping now somewhere; but you and I know that, conserving and protecting the General Staff and the fetiches that they worship, they do not intend to let the colonel enlist for fear it would destroy the draft plan, and they do not want to give up the draft plan, and they do not want to let the colonel make a hero of himself; for, while he is studying democracy in the Old World, he may raise hell with democracy in the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

Oh, we are spreading democracy and dough—especially the latter. [Laughter.] When our good British cousins took the first dose of dough yesterday of $200,000,000 I was delighted that my drafting friend from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] hoped and prayed that while they were spreading American dough in Great Britain they would give them a dose of democracy in Ireland and South Africa. [Applause.]

Ah, but gentlemen say that if Col. Roosevelt should enlist he would go right over there. You see, he is a volunteer of volunteers. He is like Hobson. He has already enlisted and volunteers for a soldier's extra hazardous service.

Ah, men, do you know the difference, you who have read the letters of the men and women? If you will ask for a volunteer army to defend American soil, you can not write the names; you will have 5,000,000 men in 48 hours to respond to your call. [Applause.]

Everybody knows Col. Roosevelt. Half of the people hate him and half of the people love him. Some wanted him to go, because the quicker he went and the longer he stayed the better it would suit them. [Laughter.] I was in that class a few months ago, but I have joined the other class. He has got the bowels to do the American thing, and this good man in the White House has not got the courage and the political daring to give him a chance to do the right thing. [Applause.] And then you say it is the General Staff that will not let him send Roosevelt to the war.

During the Spanish War I visited many of the camps of the boys. I got over into Camp Alger with the Sixth Illinois—and, by the way, there is to be no more Sixth Illinois when the General Staff gets through with it. The doctor said they had 18 men down with typhoid fever in Camp Alger, and asked if I could not get them some cots. I called up the red tape office, known as the War Department—this crowd that is now complaining of the failure of the volunteers. They decided that my application had been stamped and restamped, but the cots could not get out there until Thursday. This was Sunday, and the boys that were stricken with typhoid might probably be dead long before that. The doctors said they could not say how long they would last. I just went to the telephone and called up a friend of mine who kept a hotel, and I said "Can you send 20 cots?" The answer came back at once, "Sure, Mike," and they were there in three hours. I suppose the General Staff is now figuring on delivering those cots to Camp Alger, and probably somebody is under indictment for selling or not selling them. [Laughter and applause.]

The truth is that every word you say against the National Guard at the border, and every word you say against the volunteers, every word you say against the Spanish-American War men in condemnation of the services of the volunteer men, everything that went wrong was not on account of the volunteers, but on account of the Regular Army and regular standards and the War Department that was not prepared to take care of those boys. [Applause.] That is the truth about it.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], whose sophistry is almost as sweet as honey in the honeycomb, and whose phrases can never be forgotten, says that he stands not for the individual, but for the Government. Does he know that while he says it is the duty of the individual to serve the Government, it is the duty of the Government to conserve the private rights of the individual? And this is his idea: Here are two boys; one of them does not want to fight, one of them wants to go on with his work, and you put him in the dicebox and work him out and you take him. And here is the other boy who drank with his mother's milk a love of country and who wants to fight and is not afraid to fight, and he says, "Brother SHERLEY, I want to enlist." You say, "Turn him back; turn him out. Put in the man who does not want to serve and keep out the men who do want to serve." And this is democracy! God pity us and save democracy! [Applause.] That is democracy. Oh, but these military men, so familiar with the military needs and who study this question for four or five long days [laughter], tell us that war is the management of great machinery; that it is a science, with great guns, with great engines of destruction. Aye, so it is; and we must have them. But back of every gun you must have a brave man and an American heart or your gun is not worth a continental damn. [Applause.] You can not draft a brave patriotic heart. God made that instrument, and it is the only safe thing behind our American guns.

You must here know more possibly about human nature than even the General Staff. I do not want a man to try my lawsuit who does not believe in it. I do not want a doctor to doctor me who does not have a heart in his work and believe in it, and I do not want a man between the plow handles on my farm that would rather shoe a horse. I do not want a man to shoe my horse who would rather plow corn. I do not want to force a man to do the fighting for my country who is not willing to go and fight and be a man and serve in the line of his duty. [Applause.] You can not draft the kind of boys that we want. They will be bound to get there if you will give them a chance. But when you say you are giving them a chance now you are dodging the question. You are not fair.

If you want to enlist to-day, you have got to go into the Regular Army or National Guard, which, by the direction of the President, becomes a part of the Regular Army, for a long term of years. Up to the present time no legislation has been had that will allow a man to enlist for a service during this war. That is true, is it not? And your bill does not provide for any of the old-fashioned enlistments that allow the men and boys to get together in Chicago on the west side, where they have been going to school together, where they belong to the same churches or the same lodge, to carry out the news in the village, "They have gone and gone together."

Social life can not be taken away from the human being without making him a cold-blooded, useless machine. Gen. Smith D. Atkins once stood in line, and a man about my age came along and took his hand. Not a word was said, but I saw tears in the eyes of the man shaking the general's hand. I said, "General, that fellow seems to like you." "Oh, yes;" the general said, "he is from Freeport"—the district represented by my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCKENZIE. The old general said, "Yes; you see he went out in my company, and I told his mother I would look out for him, and at the end of one day when they said he was dead, and piled up to be buried, I went to take a last look at him and see if there was anything on his person that I ought to send to his mother, and I found his heart was beating, and in two weeks after that he was back again in the regiment." [Applause.]

That whole spirit is taken away by your conscription. That sense of neighborhood; that sense of affection; that sense of care—the knowledge that Jim, Tom, and Dick and Harry from your town are marching side by side with you, and if you go right mother will know it, and if you go wrong all will know it, that is what makes a fighting army. They take their social life with them. You drive it out by this doctrine of conscription.

But the gentleman insists we are not representing the people. I was delighted, and am always glad to hear the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who told you how when the conscript marched down the street, with the toot toot playing and the drums beating, the people would say, "There goes the boy that goes to fight his country's battles." But the unkind man on the sidewalk will say, "Yes; he is going to keep out of the penitentiary." That is your law, gentlemen. If he does not come in and sign up, it is a year in the penitentiary, is it not? Yes. A brave boy! And when you come to bury him and put the monument over his head, it will say, "Here lies the body of my son, who gave four years of his life to the cause of his country." And then some devil will come along in the graveyard and write below it, "Because he was afraid of going to the penitentiary or getting shot by order of court-martial." Gen. Dickey, who was chief of Grant's staff, told me once that they had a general understanding that when they were in close quarters in the enemy's neighborhood never to put a drafted man on the picket line. [Applause.]

You tell us we are not giving the President everything. We are giving him more than you are. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] sung the praises of the volunteers, as you all do, and he said they were the "cream" of the Army. We are willing to give the President the cream of the Army and not the skimmed milk that comes from the dicebox that you are providing for. [Applause.]

You say we will give courage to the enemy. Now, listen. Which will encourage the enemy most, to pass the bill of the majority, which says, "Gentlemen, we will have an army; Mr. Kaiser, look out; you are going to have an army coming against you; they are going to be volunteers until we can not get any more, and then we are going to draft them, but we are going to get them." The enemy will say, "By George, he means business; Uncle Sam means business." But what do you say? You confess to the world—you men who defended it right here yesterday said you could not get volunteers enough. Does that give any comfort to the enemy, when they know that Uncle Sam has gone into the war and his Congress confesses that he can not draw from the brain and brawn of American youth enough men to defend the righteousness of that war? [Applause.] Who is it that is encouraging the enemy by saying we have got to draft men to fight? Is it you, or is it we fellows who are willing to furnish volunteers to do this business? Now, you gentlemen who are scared of this propaganda, get out of that fear. There is nothing so old as yesterday's newspaper. [Laughter.] I got 40 or 50 telegrams yesterday—I got a hundred telegrams yesterday, most of them from millionaires. I have been getting them right along. A lot telegraphed me a week ago that they favored the plan adopted by the President, and I answered them, "For God's sake, tell me what it is; for, as a Member of Congress, it has not been furnished to me"; and it was not until last Friday that I knew what the final plan was presented by the Senate bill. I asked a man in every precinct—and I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin—I asked a public-spirited man in 5,000 precincts in Illinois as to what the feeling was, and their answers are on my table, 3,000 of them. Ninety per cent say that in their precinct 90 per cent of the people of that precinct are against conscription. That weighs more with me than any propaganda.

Why, gentlemen, one letter I read late into the night from a woman who told me her story. At the end she said, "Please, Mr. MASON, excuse the appearance of this letter; I have stained it with my tears." A widow's tears weigh more in the heart of a brave man than all the thunders of a propaganda of Wall Street and a combination of newspapers. [Applause.]

I say to you that they will enlist, as did those under Lincoln, Grant, and Logan, who gave the country the greatest volunteer soldiers in all history. Give them a chance, Mr. Red Tape, give them a chance, Mr. General Staff, give them an opportunity and you will not have to spend a year training them. Ninety-nine out of a hundred will be ready to go upon the call of the President. You are drafting for the trenches in Europe. They will enlist to go anywhere this side of hell that the country calls them to go. [Applause.] But your demand for a draft first is an insult to every man that wears the copper button; it is an insult to every man that wore the gray; it is an insult to history. Give us a chance to volunteer, not under your plan but under ours. The General Staff and the red tape and the little Regular Army officer can make bootblacks of their boys. We have fighting boys. They will be ready to go. Do not refuse the President the greatest thing in this country, the American boy, who stands at night in uniform and as the colors go down uncovers his head with a glistening eye and swelling heart and reveres that flag. Open the door under that plan and we will say to the President: "We are coming Father Woodrow, 2,000,000 people strong. We are bringing you the cream of the American people, the best blood of the American people, for there is no blood too good to be sacrificed on the holy altar of your country." [Applause.]

The work of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Spanish War Veterans is not yet finished. Some of the Grand Army of the Republic and most of the Spanish War Veterans are willing and able to do their share now, but this bill leaves them all out. The great value in times of peace is that they keep alive the spirit of patriotism. One of the most patriotic events I ever witnessed was when a Spanish War camp made honorary members in that order of every member of the Grand Army of the Republic. On their every altar is the flag. Every camp fire is a school for loyalty, and the Sons of Veterans, the Women of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the Woman's Relief Corps spread the doctrine of charity and patriotism. Conscripts can not do this work for us.

SELECTIVE DRAFT.

The people have been deceived by the word "selective." Deliberately and wantonly deceived. Many letters and telegrams were sent me by honest people asking my support of the President's selective draft. It now turns out that the scheme is the dream of the General Staff, and that the word "selective" refers only to the manner of drawing by lot of those who go first. People were led to believe that selected meant that the President would select some for one thing and some for another. It now develops, and is admitted by all, what we have contended from the first, that it means drafting for military service by lot, and we are now informed our boys' names are to be all put in a wheel—between 21 and 40—and drawn by chance.

You say you want the slacker and the loafer, why not select them instead of compelling gentlemen to shake dice or take a chance on a wheel with them to see who is to go? To illustrate, here are two boys, one a respectable, hard-working boy who by reason of home ties honestly feels he can not go now, and does not enlist. The other is a loafer, supported by his parents, who might make a good soldier, and does not care for anything—his country or his family.

Under this law those two names go into the wheel and the blindfolded goddess of chance decides which shall go. If they are within the age and sound, the judges have no power to let out one and take the other. If the loafer is lucky at the wheel, he is free and the gentleman goes to the trenches. Do not tell me the people understand this. Another illustration: Here a family with two sons, one the support of wife and children and possibly parents. The family agree that he should remain at home, because he has learned a business that pays enough to support the family and agree the other, equally good and honest, but who has neither wife nor child and wants to go, may go. The family agree—but here comes your wheel—your dice-box, your law, and says your family do not know what is best—if the wheel decides it, and it may—"You must both go," or the wheel may say, "You who are willing to go stay and you who want to stay go." Oh, men of America, stop and think! Next autumn, if this war continues, when our people sit around their hearthstones and talk over family plans to get food and fire for the coming winter, and your "wheel" begins to turn, curses, like those from Pandora's box, will be amongst us. Fear, the greatest curse of mankind, will lead them all. It will hover like the shadow of death over every home. Fear of cold and hunger, fear of death—fear will lead, and trooping by her side will be hate, envy, jealousy, fraud, corruption, and violence. Turn your wheel that breaks the women's hearts. Shake your dicebox for the price of mothers' tears. Cast your lots, if you will, for the blood of our boys, as they did for the Master's garments at the foot of the cross, but if you leave out all opportunity for the brave before you brand as slackers and conscripts all who from a high sense of duty can not go, I will never vote for this bill.

Mr. Chairman, we all like to be popular, but it would be a coward's part to think of our business or political prospects or our party now. We are changing our form of government. The absorption of legislative power by the Executive was never so apparent. Then we go further, and nearly every one of you say you favor the draft because the Regular Army—the General Staff—recommended it. The military arm of this Government is passing this bill, and you know it. You admit it, and you yield to it because of the newspaper propaganda that has so misled the people and is misleading us.

Who misled the people? Who has commercialized public sentiment? I insert here an editorial from Devils Lake Journal. It was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 9, 1917, page 3947.

I do say it is true. Whether it is true or not, the people should know, by giving the great editors of the United States a chance under oath to deny it.

Please read it. It is unanswered and uninvestigated.

In March, 1915, the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and the powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and a sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press of the United States.

These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began, by an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers. The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy—national and international—of these papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

This contract is in existence at the present time, and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of the stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March, 1915. They have resorted to anything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant and wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is "patriotism." They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people.

Again, Mr. Chairman, this draft is making worse our food problems.

Many people in my State of Illinois can not afford the usual and customary food. Hunger stares us in the face. Only the rich are secure, and even they may go hungry. We need men on the farms. Crops will go unharvested and fertile ground uncultivated by reason of the draft.

How?

Read this advertisement, which was published in nearly every paper in the United States, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Thousands of our young men—possibly slackers—are going to Canada—Great Britain—where they are assured they will have good wages, steady work, "and no compulsory military service."

[From the Daily News, Apr. 12, 1917.]

FARM HANDS WANTED—WESTERN CANADA FARMERS REQUIRE 50,000 AMERICAN FARM LABORERS AT ONCE.

Urgent demand sent out for farm help by the Government of Canada. Good wages. Steady employment. Low railway fares. Pleasant surroundings. Comfortable homes. No compulsory military service. A splendid opportunity for the young man to investigate western Canada's agricultural offerings and to do so at no expense. Only those accustomed to farming need apply.

The demand for farm labor in Canada is so great that as an inducement to secure at once the necessary help required Canada will give 160 acres of land free as a homestead and allow the farm laborer who files on land to apply the time he is working for other farmers as residence duties the same as if he had lived on the land he had applied for. This offer made only to men working on Canadian farms during 1917, thus making it possible to reduce the necessity of actual residence to two years instead of three years, as under usual conditions. This appeal for farm help is no way connected with enlistment for military service, but solely to secure farm laborers to increase agricultural output. A wonderful opportunity to earn good wages while securing a farm. Canadian Government will pay all fare over 1 cent per mile from St. Paul and Duluth to Canadian destination. For particulars as to railway rates and districts where labor is required or other information regarding western Canada, apply to ———, authorized Canadian Government agent.

Do you think we ought to draft our boys to fight for Canada while that good neighbor is seducing our boys to farm for them and escape the draft? I do not. Australia and New Zealand, parts of the British Empire, refuse to draft. They submitted it to a vote of the people—which you dare not do in democratic America—and they refused by an overwhelming vote to draft their slackers. Do you think we should draft our boys to fight for the country that does not draft their boys? I do not.

You say it is now "Our war." Yes; so it is. We got into it while delivering guns and food to Great Britain, and when they have drafted their slackers it will be time enough for them to ask and advise us to draft ours.

One paper said that we had in Chicago 20,000 slackers at our baseball game, because they would not enlist when invited to do so by our volunteers in the National Guard. They are not slackers. You do not under the present law, nor the law now pending, give them a chance to volunteer. If they enlist now, as my son has, they must enter the Regular Army either directly or by way of our National Guard. It is the Regular Army just the same, and we are given notice here by those who speak for the General Staff that the National Guard is to be wiped out and absorbed by the Regular Army. You do not, have not, and will not call for volunteers, so that each city, town, or county may raise troops amongst their friends to fight the enemy.

The 20,000 men at the ball game are not slackers. They are mainly men who work in the factories, stores, and offices, who struggle with high prices for food, but manage to get half a day and half a dollar to see the national game, and it comes with bad grace for countries we feed and fight for to demand the draft here, who do not draft at home.

You say we delay raising an army. That is not true. The bill reported by the majority, for which we stand, provides for the old-fashioned Lincoln call for volunteers, and authorizes the President to proceed at once to prepare the list for drafting if you fail to get an army. You say it will take three or four months to prepare the wheels and the lists of men and the three lottery managers, and we say that within three or four months you can have all the men you want if you call them and do not threaten them. Roosevelt has now offered more than 100,000 men. You by your vote have refused him and his men a chance. What the Senate will do I do not know. Never before has our country showed its weakness by ordering a draft at the beginning of a war. England raised 5,000,000 by volunteers, and they are the fighting men on the line. Washington asked for draft only when not sufficient men volunteered; Lincoln did the same. Our bill, the bill of the majority of our Military Committee, does the same, and men who say we are delaying the raising of the Army do not speak the truth.

I know every man here will do his duty as God gives him light to see his duty. Please give me the right you demand for yourself. You have been fair in this discussion. We have not quarreled here. The burden of this question has been the heaviest we have ever been called to bear. Little-brained men who have advised that we be murdered for expressing our honest opinion here simply have long-distance bravery and think it is patriotism.

Lincoln said:

God must have loved the plain people. He made so many of them.

I have found out what they want. Denied a referendum. I have adopted the best course I could to find out their sentiment; I say that 90 per cent are opposed to drafting our boys for European trenches.

Many stand for universal training, and all agree as to universal obligation. That is not this bill. Happy is the Congressman here who can have with him a majority of his people and the approval of his own conscience.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it would take a more eloquent man than I to respond to the eloquence of my colleague in any proper way, but I apprehend that we are not engaged in the contest of eloquence; we are engaged in making preparations for victory. [Applause.] We are engaged in war and we must do the things that are necessary to be done to furnish the supplies that we will need for American victory. [Applause.] Every man must pay his share, and every man must do his share. It is not what we say that is going to affect the opinion of Germany, it is what we do that counts. We may have all the eloquence of the best orators in all the land pleading for the sentimental side of this case, but I do not understand that we are going to win this war with sentiment. We are going to win the war because we are prepared to meet the issues. We have made the declaration, we have voted the money, we are levying the taxes, we are going to raise the army, and if we are going to have an army to be successful it must be an army that can furnish the reserves necessary to follow up the men at the front. The voluntary army can not do that. For you are always in a condition of uncertainty as to whether your regiments are going to be filled or empty if you depend on the volunteer system.

It is no disgrace to a man to be called to the colors by his country. He is a part of his nation. He claims a right to all the privileges, and he should be willing to assume the responsibility, and I apprehend that the men of America of fighting age are willing to assume the responsibility and do it in a way in which they are directed by the Government. This is a land of patriots, and our patriots are not standing on the question of whether they are to be allowed to volunteer. They are asking the Government to say how can they serve the country the most successfully. [Applause.]

They say they had trouble in raising an army in England by the volunteer system. Some say that the English people were reluctant to volunteer, and some say that they were forced to volunteer. It is infinitely better to have a single system, under which every man can serve, than it is to have men reviled for failing to volunteer. We want unity, we want success, but to gain success we need not only money but we need men, and we need men in such numbers that there can be no question of failure.

We have entered upon a most gigantic enterprise, and we have to assume the responsibility. We must meet this responsibility without fear or favor, for victory must perch upon the banner of America. [Applause.] Nowhere in all the world can there be found braver men than under the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.] Nowhere can there be found men more willing to do their duty, and if I understand the sentiment of the American people, it is that all men should be selected without respect to whether they are rich or poor, high or low, educated or ignorant; that all men do their part to prove to the world that this is a free country and that the American people are standing for a democracy throughout the world and the maintenance of the democracy within America. [Applause.]

I have no patience with those who believe that the men will object to being conscripted. Selective conscription may have some inequalities, because it must be operated by human agencies, but we can write amendments into this law that will make every State in this Union furnish its quota according to the percentage of its population to the total population of the country, and thereby prevent any favoritism to any State or any man in the Union, and I propose to offer such an amendment to this bill when it comes up for amendment and consideration under the five-minute rule. Every State, therefore, will be called upon to do its equal part, with no right on the part of any man, either the President of the United States or the General Staff, to play favorites anywhere throughout the Union.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I must decline to yield. This is America. It is said that when this Government was formed it was considered the most gigantic experiment that had ever been tried by men. Many people believe that we are still in the experimental stage of government here, but this bill, when enacted into law, will prove to the world that America and the American people are qualified to govern, that they are qualified to be trusted with the conduct of democracy, that our men will prove themselves to be brave and fearless, patriotic, ready to meet every obligation imposed upon them by the Constitution, that they will respond readily and willingly to the call to arms, and that they will prefer to be called by some uniform system than to have three or four other systems combined to embarrass the system best calculated to lead to the success which every American prays and hopes for in the contest upon which we are now engaged.

I have no fear that any man will complain because he is conscripted. I have no thought in my mind that a conscripted man will not be classed as high in the councils of the citizenship of his country as the volunteer man. Every man who bears the title of American citizen is the peer of every other man, and ought to be charged with like responsibility. No volunteer system can bring uniform service, and because of this fact and because of the further fact that the volunteer system calls forth to the colors some men who are more enthusiastic, perhaps more patriotic, than others, and leaves those less enthusiastic and less patriotic at home, I am distinctly in favor of the adoption of the proposition to make a uniform selective conscription law, which will bear alike upon every man of military age, as provided in the minority amendment to be offered to the pending bill. With such a provision in the law there can be no favoritism, without it I fear there might be. I want America to succeed. I shall willingly do my part to maintain the Nation's honor. I want to see the burden fairly distributed. I want each man to do his part according to his ability. I want to see the fires of patriotism burning on every hilltop; I want to see its glow in every face throughout the land. I want to see the institutions of freedom, planted on this continent by the fathers, spread to every nation on earth. I want Old Glory to be seen in every land and upon every sea, and there applauded as the symbol of freedom. I want the word "American" to mean more than it ever meant before. I want Americans and American rights protected everywhere, and to this end I am ready to dedicate myself, my all.

Many people throughout the country think we are considering universal military training. There is nothing further from the truth than that. We are only preparing to meet the present emergency. That emergency is great, but not so great that it can not be met by the American people and successfully concluded, as the result of a unified America under the direction of the Commander in Chief of the American Army, the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, in my time I want to send a resolution which was adopted by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA HOUSE VOTES FOR SELECTIVE DRAFT PRINCIPLE.

HARRISBURG, April 24, 1917.

The house to-night passed a resolution introduced by Representative Whitaker, of Chester, declaring for the principle of the selective draft. The resolution was introduced at a time when unanimous consent for its immediate consideration was necessary. There were no objections.

The resolution recited that it is the belief of the legislature that "only a selective draft can be depended upon to meet the needs of the emergency that now exists in this country."

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, during the debate yesterday a reference was made to the number of volunteers who had gone into the service from the Dominion of Canada. I had occasion last summer to spend two weeks in the different cities of Canada, and my observation was that while they were operating under the volunteer system, it could well have been called a compulsory volunteer service. I am reminded that there was a campaign conducted upon the part of the Canadian Government which practically placed every man who was not enlisted in the position of being a slacker, regardless of what his individual position may have been. On all sides there were exhibited on public billboards, on all public places, pictures of Lord Kitchener. As you passed by these great signs there was the finger of Lord Kitchener pointing to the passer-by, saying to him, "Remember, the eyes of Kitchener are upon you. You should immediately join an over-seas regiment and fight for the cause of your country." I want to assure this House that had I been a Canadian and had I not enlisted I would have been ashamed to be upon the highways of Canada.

Because I feel that any other course would be a reflection upon the patriotism of the people of my district I will favor and vote for universal liability for service. Were I to adopt any other course it would be equivalent to saying that I feel that some of my constituents are patriotic and others are not. I believe that they are all imbued with the same love of country. Under the volunteer system some who should not enlist would not enlist, yet they would be charged with being slackers, although they might be staying home to perform duties for which they are better fitted and for which they are more urgently needed.

The principle of equality of service by selection places all American citizens, rich and poor alike, on the same footing. The volunteer system penalizes the patriotic for the benefit of those who are not patriotic. In the Civil War we had to abandon the volunteer system and adopt drafting. If we had had selective service then, the war would have been less costly. It would have ended sooner, and saved thousands of lives and countless millions.

Let us do the right thing at the right time, which is at once. Let us abolish special privilege from our military system. It is the very essence of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees every citizen the right to bear arms in defense. This is not a system which will remain in vogue after the conclusion of this war.

It is not because I fear there is any danger that we would not be able to raise a large enough army under the volunteer system, but because I believe there would be inequalities, and an inefficient distribution of man power under such a system, that I favor universal service by selection.

For the same reason I oppose any exemptions written into the law. If we exempted the farmer, thousands might go to the farms, not to aid production but merely to escape service. If we exempted the strategic industries, thousands might obtain employment in such industries when they may not be needed there. The President himself, in touch with the changing needs of the Army, Navy, and other strategic industries, should be the one authorized to say what men shall be kept at home for useful service and what ones should go into training.

There is a moral reason also for the immediate enactment of this selective-service military bill. I do not think that this moral reason has been stressed sufficiently in the present debate. I have believed all along that if we had been properly prepared from the beginning, if Germany had been made to realize that we were in earnest, and fully capable of waging a real war, there would have been no ruthless submarine campaign against American lives and commerce. But Germany had been convinced that we were not ready, and would not be ready for years; that we were slow to become aroused to wrongs committed against us, and slow to get into action. She knows that our volunteer system has not been entirely efficient in the past; that it was not efficient in England, and that it will not serve the purpose here now.

The $7,000,000,000 bond issue gave Germany preliminary notice that the United States intends to be effective financially. The measure before us will be final notice that this country means business. It will have a greater effect upon the people of Germany than anything else we are able to do at this time. It will make the German Government realize that this country is making ready for the long pull, if such a long pull becomes necessary. The adoption of selective conscription may shorten the war by months or by a year.

From the same standpoint Col. Roosevelt should be encouraged, rather than discouraged, in his plan to raise a division for early action in France. The French delegation headed by that statesman whose fame will be immortal, Gen. Joffre, is here now, and its members will tell us what the appearance of a division headed by the former President of the United States would mean as a moral influence in the trenches of France. The plan of Col. Roosevelt can not interfere with the conscription system, because men not called by selective service have already volunteered for his division, and the division would be confined to such men.

It is significant that Col. Roosevelt, confident of his ability to raise a division by the volunteer system, nevertheless strongly approves of selective service as the ideal military system for this great democracy. He favors it because it is efficient and American.

The volunteer system was not efficient in England, not because of lack of patriotism, but because men who should have been officers became privates; because surgeons and doctors who could have saved thousands of lives behind the trenches died on the firing line as privates or lieutenants. It failed because it was wasteful and unscientific, leaving at home men of independent means and in every way eligible for military service, while it took away men with dependents, leaving the Government to support these dependents.

The mothers and fathers of the country should not be made to bear the responsibility of saying that their boys should go to the front, lest they be regarded by their neighbors as slackers. The responsibility should be assumed frankly by the Government, so that when young men remain in the strategic industries it will be known that that is where the Government wants them and that they are doing military service required of them.

We have had war forced upon us. It was not of our choosing. We had to fight or surrender our national honor. Now that we are in the great world struggle for the maintenance of civilization itself let us not waste the lives or money of the people by any volunteer system which will increase our sacrifices or lengthen the war. Let us adopt the system our own experts tell us is necessary—the system which is representative of American democracy, which gives us the right sort of officers and men at the front, and a strong industrial organization at home. I am for selective service because it distributes the burden equally, because it treats all alike, and because it keeps us from making unnecessary sacrifices in vain. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from California to provide for the increase of the Military Establishment through selective conscription.

I shall vote for this amendment because it is the principle which the Commander in Chief of the Army to-day urgently requests.

We were early taught that the first duty of a soldier is obedience. I am not to-day considering Mr. Wilson as the President, but, as we are engaged in this great war, he should be regarded as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Selective conscription is positively recommended by the Commander in Chief, by the Secretary of War, by the officers of the General Staff—the military heads of our Government.

Congress holds a subordinate position in the question of responsibility in the actual guidance of war affairs and its method of conduct. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we are going a long way when we assert any individual independence on such a serious problem as now confronts the country.

We are in no sense abrogating our rights as Congressmen, nor are we placing ourselves in the position to be familiarly referred to as "rubber stamps" when we accept the judgment of men who have made warfare their life study and who have laid their views before the Secretary of War and the Commander in Chief. But if we could be so accused, it would be far better for us to be designated as "rubber stamps" rather than as "boneheads" if, as a result of our assertive independence, our country's cause should suffer and hundreds of thousands of lives of our fellow citizens be sacrificed.

I shall vote for the amendment because a volunteer system has been proven a failure not only in the present war but in previous ones. The example of England in the present war has been frequently cited, and no more pertinent illustration is needed in proof of this statement.

I shall vote for the amendment because the bill as proposed by the majority of the committee recognizes the possibility of failure of the volunteer system in that as a second expedient it provides for conscription. If the volunteer system is a proper one, why does the majority of the committee recommend that, following the 500,000, conscription should then be resorted to?

I favor one exception to complete conscription for two reasons. First, that practically all the men who would volunteer under the exception would be exempt from conscription; second, the man who would raise the volunteers has such a personality that the men who would serve under him would be a fighting force of astonishing power. There is no similar man in this country so that an exception is in no sense dangerous. A positive offer, which can be substantiated, to provide 20,000 to 25,000 men and rapidly prepare them for foreign service can not be easily overlooked. The proposal of Col. Roosevelt to secure the enlistment of this force should be accepted, and I trust an amendment of this nature will be presented to the House so that it may be voted upon. It means a well-drilled fighting machine, composed of men enthused by the personal magnetism of their leader, that will be a great addition to the forces to be raised under this bill.

I shall vote for the amendment because it is the only fair way to treat all men of military age. My only doubt comes from the possible misuse of the selective feature of conscription. We must, however, place sufficient confidence in our officials to expect them to see that the tribunal having to do with the exemptions is absolutely fair and just.

I shall vote for the amendment because no army can be successful of which the head is not thoroughly satisfied with the manner in which it is raised.

I shall vote for the amendment because after the Army is raised all men will feel they are on an equal basis. Should the volunteer system be adopted it can readily be seen that men who do volunteer will have a feeling of superiority over those who may be later on selected by conscription.

No one knows nor can foresee the extent to which our participation in this war may be carried. The bill of the majority of the Military Affairs Committee only deals with the possibility of securing 500,000 volunteers, and further provides that should that number not be secured conscription shall then be resorted to. In other words, the bill before us considers 500,000 as the limit of an army to be raised under the volunteer system. It does not consider that 500,000 is the limit of the army that may be needed, and it therefore shows both a mistrust of the system recommended and a division of method which can not be otherwise than harmful.

As it seems evident that conscription is bound to follow, what inducement can there be in the minds of men to volunteer? What will prevent carrying out the suggestion I saw yesterday in a paper published in my district, from which I quote:

WHY NOT PROVE IT NOW INSTEAD OF LATER?

Paradoxical as it may seem, we have become convinced that the most patriotic thing the young men of military age in this country could do to-day would be to refuse absolutely to volunteer their services for military duty.

As the days drag on it is becoming increasingly apparent that there is in Congress a fixed determination on the part of a more or less influential group to force the country to try once more the muddling, inefficient, unfair, undemocratic, and never yet successful volunteer system before getting down to business and doing at once what must be done eventually—organize our forces on a basis of selective conscription, which will pick the right man for the right place, irrespective of wealth or social position, and put him in the shortest possible time where he will do the most good.

This determination seems to have its foundation in a belief that there are in the country enough young men who will voluntarily shoulder all the burdens and risks and responsibilities of military service so that comfortable citizens can stay comfortably at home, easing their conscience by tossing a few dollars into the Nation's war coffers; so that the mean-spirited can continue undisturbed in their petty pursuits; so that the hypocrite, who "doesn't offer himself because he doesn't believe in war," can save his skin—on principle; so that the weakest, the unworthiest, the most decadent elements in the Nation, in short, may be preserved to propagate the race.

In certain contingencies extreme measures will often serve a swift purpose where other methods fail.

I shall vote for the amendment because I am convinced that the great majority of the people of the country consider it is both the fairest to them and the surest of producing the desired results.

We want to adopt such methods as will the most speedily place us in a position to strike effectively. We can not afford the enormous toll of lives and wealth that would be sacrificed should we not provide a thoroughly prepared and well-equipped Army. The argument of the majority of the committee is that a volunteer army can be more rapidly secured. Even if we should admit this to be true, we would secure a body of individuals all at one time rather than so proportioned that they could be readily absorbed and properly trained and equipped.

There is to-day opportunity for voluntary enlistment which is not being taken advantage of in sufficient numbers to fill the branches of the service up to present war strength. The method proposed by the minority of the committee is absolutely democratic and fair to all. It will give us a well-rounded and efficient military unit, and at the same time permit of continuance of service in industrial, commercial, and agricultural lines of those who can better serve the common cause in that way. In no other way can the whole machinery of our civic life avoid almost complete disruption.

I have frequently criticized the President for his insistence in his demands that Congress yield its own views to him. These criticisms were based on my regard for the belief in the value of the individual opinions and judgment of Members of Congress. These opinions are on subjects wherein our responsibilities are coequal with those of the Executive. As the country is now at war I, for one, do not feel that we should consider ourselves as sharing in equal measure with the President his duties as Commander in Chief. He alone holds that position. We are not sharers or participants in the duties and responsibilities of it.

To-day I commend that same insistence that I have previously criticized. I commend it because, as I first stated, his personality as President in the present crisis becomes secondary to his position as Commander in Chief of the Army. I believe his position in this question of volunteer or selective conscription is right, but whether it is right or wrong his is the greatest responsibility for the successful conduct of the war, and there must be a positive approval of his methods and wishes.

We, as subordinates, may advise and suggest, but we must not try to dictate.

As Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress, we have a tremendous responsibility in acting upon this bill. I venture to say that no matter how long any of us may remain Members of this body, as we in the future look back upon these days since war was declared, the realization of the importance of our action will grow in proportion as the years advance.

Let us not leave it as a heritage to our children that we to-day sounded a discordant note or voiced a word of opposition to the call of the Commander in Chief, which was so clearly expressed in his memorable address on April 2 when he referred to the army of at least 500,000 men "who should," he said, "in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service."

No plainer command was ever given to a faithful people. Let us by our vote here, as their Representatives, show our willingness to obey.

The task before us is a stupendous one before a victorious peace is secured. It may mean hardships and suffering for the American people, which would to-day cause us to shudder.

We need at this time the strength of unison. The Congress gave an overwhelming vote in favor of the declaration of war. It cast a unanimous vote for the necessary funds to carry it on. Let us be as unanimous in our method of securing the essential force to make effective the votes we have already passed. We will thereby show our approval of the first implied order of the Commander in Chief. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, during the few weeks which I have been here engaged together with you, performing my duties as one of the Representatives of the American people, it has been my endeavor to approach each problem upon which I was called to vote with a great deal of care and caution. I have listened with great interest to the speeches of the gentlemen in favor of the committee bill and to those opposing. The question to be determined by this House at this present time is not whether conscription shall be substituted for the volunteer system in the United States, because the committee bill simply provides that volunteers may be called during the time the preparation to put the conscription in effect is going on. What is to be gained by a Member who believes in the volunteer system in its entirety in voting for the committee bill? It does not offer the volunteer system as against the conscription plan, but it undertakes to give us a dual system. The conscription system is either right or the volunteer system is right. It appears to me that a combination of systems will not serve the purpose of those who believe in the volunteer system alone. The Kahn substitute means the abolition of the volunteer system in America and the putting in force the selective draft system. The principal objection to the conscription system is the well-founded and deep-seated prejudice of the American people to the word "conscript" and the domineering disposition of the War Department. The deep-seated prejudice of the civilian against the snobbishness of Army officers which has prevailed in some places among the Army circle is not sufficient reason why the selective-draft plan to raise an army in this emergency should be defeated. If the selective-draft system of raising an army in this Republic is to stand or fall upon prejudice against snobbishness and undemocratic conduct of our Army officers, then I of this House would be compelled to vote against the selective-draft system, for no man in the House has a greater prejudice than I have, for reasons well known to my colleagues from my State. And I say that, in my humble judgment, the principal moving impulses that actuate the Members in favor of the volunteer plan is their reluctance to release and give up that high idealistic sentiment that has found place in the breast of our patriotic citizens since the days of the foundation of the Republic, to which sentiment my heart clings with a fond affection, and clings to it like an heir who clings to the precious heirlooms of his ancestors; and as I sat in this Chamber and listened to that most ardent speech of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] my heart welled up, because he was born on the same soil that I was born, and I know the temper of his people and their traditions. My heart clings to those traditions of my native State with the same affection and with the same intenseness that those of my forefathers clung to Erin's Isle, but these are times and conditions that break traditions and hearts. [Applause.]

The fear that the details and administration of the plan of conscription might not be carried on with equal fairness to all the States and subdivisions, to all classes of our citizens, is a factor, no doubt, that deters those who cling to the volunteer idea from supporting the selective-draft plan. Fear that the change from the volunteer system, which has prevailed through the entire history of the Republic, to the new and untried system of universal service in the United States might tend to bureaucracy or militarism is, beyond no doubt, the principal ground upon which the opponents of the draft plan oppose the same. Gentlemen, we all agree that we oppose militarism in America. You are thinking of times of peace, but there is no peace. We are confronted with cold facts and conditions not of our making, and we have to meet the situation without hesitation and with the firm resolution to overcome our enemy.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Does the gentleman believe a sufficient emergency exists at this time to make it absolutely necessary to put the selective draft in operation?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do; but I believe 80 per cent of our people do not realize the importance of this emergency.

The only question here to determine is, Will temporary volunteer service with the selective plan or selective-draft plan immediately better answer the interests of this Republic? The solution of this question will require the best of our thought and every endeavor. Sentiment, prejudice, or personal considerations will not suffice. Let us reason together without anger or intolerances. Spontaneous public patriotism and public intolerance will drive men into the ranks who are entitled to the protection of this Government, and the men who are so callous to the impulses of patriotism or to the shafts of public condemnation will never respond until Uncle Sam lays his hand upon their shoulders and says, "We want you." In my humble judgment, 80 per cent of the American people do not realize what this declaration of war means. Many of them believe that it is merely a gala occasion for the American Navy to engage in a little target practice and our torpedo destroyers to have a little game of hide and seek upon the high seas with a few German submarines. I hope I am mistaken; but, in my humble judgment, we have matched a real war, the end of which we know not. If the necessity arises in the mind of the people, then, of course, volunteers will spring full grown from the hills and dales; but shall we wait until the causes of the war shall reach and arouse the interior? Is it not persuasive, at least, when the Commander in Chief says the necessity is here? England is cited as an example of volunteers, but some of us recall how, in order to get volunteers for the trenches, they posted the picture of Mike O'Leery on the posters, with these words, "O'Leery wants you to fight for Belgium." This is the same Mike O'Leery who captured five Germans single-handed, and when asked how he did it, he replied, "I just surrounded them."

In casting my vote for the selective-draft plan I know that my action will not meet the approval of the young, vigorous men in my district, because they are wiring me, asking that we give them a chance to volunteer, as they are anxious to go to the front, and many of them hope to again follow Col. Roosevelt even to the trenches of France. I would not deter any trained men from going under Col. Roosevelt, but I am constrained to hold in check the boys and those who can best serve their country at home. A farmer does not hitch his young, unbroken colts to his farm wagon, but rather hitches them in with the old horses, one at a time, and holds them in check. It is better for the colts and better for the driver. The selective-draft plan, in my judgment, will be better for the soldier and better for the country. The question is asked, Why change this volunteer system that has come down to us from the fathers of this Republic? To this question, I reply, Why did modern civilized nations change their methods of warfare? Back in the days when "knighthood was in flower" gunpowder was invented, and you will recall that a brave English knight said that gunpowder was the invention of a coward and that no brave man would stand back 50 paces and shoot his fellow man, but the brave man would put on his armor, gird his sword about him, and go within a spear's length of his antagonist and fight it out to the death.

When we fought the Revolutionary War we defeated the British with volunteers because we fought them in the primeval forests of the thirteen States with marksmen so unerring as to startle the British regulars. I might pause to say they carried one of them back to England to exhibit his unerring marksmanship, and the recruiting stations had to close up directly, because there were no more recruits. Trained volunteers who were trained by their daily vocation as woodsmen. At New Orleans we defeated Packingham with the riflemen from Tennessee and Kentucky, and in the War with Mexico we swept the enemy from the field at Buena Vista by giving them a little more "grape and canister." In the Civil War Between the States we fought like demons upon the surface of the ground and in the open, and no doubt it was patriotic volunteers on both sides that made those wonderful charges and fought the fiercest battle and performed the greatest deeds of daring and bravery with which history is replete. Yes; volunteers urged on by the fire of patriotism that caused them to enlist in what they believed to be a just and righteous cause. But as was said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], warfare today is not the warfare of 60, 80, or 140 years ago. It is all right to fight the other side with volunteers if they were fighting us with volunteers; but, sirs, this war is a war the like of which has never been recorded in the annals of history. The question for us to determine is, Shall we use the selective-draft plan to be able to successfully terminate this war?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield me three minutes additional?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. McKEOWN. But above all and over all, Mr. Chairman, the one great impelling thought that prompts me is this thought, that the selective-draft system will bring together the American people as no other plan will do. The pro-German sympathizers and the people who do not realize the seriousness of the causes of this war and inclined to criticize their own Government, will be required, whether willing or otherwise, to do their part under this selective-draft plan; but, sirs, whenever boys of pro-German parentage and of disturbing elements have once been drawn into the ranks, side by side with our native-born sons, this will be the melting pot that in my humble judgment will preserve the future of this great Republic. The pro-German sympathizer will no longer say "You wanted war, you go fight." The native-born American will no longer say, "You are pro-German, you are not entitled to live in America," because he can reply, "My boy is in the ranks with yours."

Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked, "Do you expect to whip Germany with the pool-room bums?" I answer, "No; it will require, in my humble judgment, a well-trained army of men;" and in reply to that question I wish to add this, that while we do not expect to whip Germany with the pool-room bums, yet, Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, we do propose that the pool-room bums, the dudes, toughs, and hobos will be required to fight for their country or go to work.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to say that if the committee bill becomes the law, I am authorized to say for the fourth congressional district of Oklahoma that it will equal or lead any other district in volunteers. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE]. [Applause.]

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member of this House I speak with great deference to the veteran legislators before me.

Peace is a time for minute scrutiny of all legislation, that imperfections may be avoided. War is a time for action, swift and certain. You will recall that throughout the Civil War there was an element of criticism and dissent, which found its expression in Congress through a small but persistent minority in efforts to impede war legislation proposed by President Lincoln and his administration. You will recall in what extreme disesteem these men were universally held. They were despised, while the great leaders of the Confederacy, who were physically engaged in the struggle, were respected. In those days I felt the general impulse and, as a boy, hated the very name of Vallandigham and his congressional associates. With added years and mature judgment, I am now able to make greater allowance for them and think it more than likely that they were actuated by conscientious motives. Unlike Douglas and other northern leaders, they fell into a habit of mind of constant criticism and dissent until they were finally obsessed with their ideas and could see nothing honest or admirable in the Lincoln administration and were generally regarded by Union men as little short of traitors to their cause.

I have felt extremely critical of this administration. I did not like its policy in Mexico. I started in, therefore, in a critical condition of mind. But the overwhelming importance of the present situation of war has deeply impressed me and given me a new viewpoint. What I may think and say as an individual is of little importance; but, as a sworn Representative on this floor, might I not, by an habitual indulgence in criticism of the administration and by embarrassing the administration by my votes on this floor, unconsciously and unwittingly gradually drift into the obstructive and censorious frame of mind that was the fate of Vallandigham and his associates on this floor at the time of the Civil War? I have determined to avoid everything that savors of carping criticism of the administration on war questions and to give it my hearty support upon all such questions, unless I have definite knowledge that the administration is wrong, or so believe.

Mr. Chairman, as one who had the honor and privilege to serve in the great Volunteer Army of the Union more than a half century ago, I give my assent to, and shall vote for, the selective-draft bill prepared by the General Staff of the United States Army and approved and desired by the President of the United States. In reaching this determination I am not unmindful of the great and glorious achievements of Volunteer Armies in the history of our Government or to the objections inherent to a draft of citizens for military duty. It was a consideration of these objections and of the universally grim and sinister character of war that rendered it so difficult for myself, and for most other Members upon this floor, to vote for the resolutions declaring a state of war on April 6, 1917. Before that date the United States was at peace with all the world. But a profound change was produced by that act. In a moment we were as a nation plunged into war. What would have been objectionable, and even repulsive, before that time now becomes a necessity of our condition and a patriotic duty.

The United States has been at peace for more than 50 years, with the exception of the brief War with Spain in 1898. Two generations have come into the world since the close of the great Civil War in 1865, who have no knowledge of the grim character of war, except as they have gained it in their reading of history. It is difficult for them to realize that the necessities of war demand repressive and restrictive rules of conduct, and a concentration of the entire power of the Nation in ways that are unusual, harsh, and sometimes even cruel, in order that war may be effectively carried on.

It was a realization of the absorbing and cruel character of war that caused the Members of this House to take the final step after long and careful deliberation and with extreme reluctance. Each and every Member realized that the infringement of the rights of our citizens upon the open seas and the wanton destruction of their lives by Germany fully warranted, and even demanded, the grave and decisive step which was advised by the President and which finally received the approval of Congress.

From the moment the President signed the resolutions declaring a state of war conditions were fundamentally changed. The Congress by its own act had placed upon the President the responsibility of successfully conducting that war. In the performance of that great duty he was entitled to receive from the Congress the widest latitude of power and authority, and this extraordinary power must be extended throughout the entire period of the war. Congress having delegated this extraordinary task upon the President should accompany it with the utmost degree of confidence that justly, wisely, and considerately it will be exercised, and that at the conclusion of the war these extraordinary powers, conferred for the accomplishment of a great purpose, will be returned to the Congress and to the people by whom they have been conferred.

For my own part, as the representative in Congress of a constituency of a half million American people, I do feel and I do extend that confidence, and in good faith it is my intention to carry out upon the floor of the House of Repersentatives the mandate which was given the President when the resolution declaring war was passed by voting him in principle and in detail every power necessary to a successful outcome of the great adventure of liberty and freedom of the peoples upon which our country has thus been launched.

Upon the great question of the system upon which we shall organize our armies—whether by the volunteer system or by a selective draft—I am prepared, upon the grounds which I have just set forth, to vote in accordance with the recommendations of the President, guided as he has been by the General Staff and the military authorities and opinion of our country. In declaring this determination I do not wish to detract in any way from the magnificent history and achievements of the volunteer system in this country in the past. On the contrary, I desire to pay a high tribute to that history and to those achievements, drawing a clear distinction, however, between those achievements and the utility of the volunteer system as a means of building up and assembling an efficient army with the least consumption of time.

The volunteer system is the system under which the Revolutionary fathers organized the Army with which they won the independence of the United States and laid the foundations of our Government.

The volunteer system was that with which our second war with Great Britain was fought. It is true that the capture by the British of the Capital City, in which we are now assembled, and the burning of the Capitol Building itself, in 1814, were attributable to the lack of military training and preparation. The condition of our country at that time, as to the lack of a defensive system, was much the same as it is to-day. It is also a curious fact that the newspapers and the public speeches of that period were much like those which we have been reading the past year in reference to the condition of unpreparedness and the absolute importance of preparation for the contingencies of war. Such successes as were gained by our armies in the War of 1812, notably that under Gen. Andrew Jackson at New Orleans, were gained under the volunteer system, although there was considerable drafting done by the various States in 1812, 1813, and 1814, and there were conscriptions for brief service during the Revolutionary War.

Although our small Regular Army was conspicuous in the Mexican War, it may be said in a general way that that war also was fought with volunteers.

The great achievements of the volunteer system, however, were the most conspicuous during the Civil War. The armies of the Union and those of the Confederacy were practically all volunteers. The full enlistments in the Union Army amounted to about 2,800,000 men and those of the Confederacy probably 1,000,000. On both sides these included reenlistments to the number of several hundred thousand.

It is not inappropriate to mention the extraordinarily youthful character of the Union Army. The records of The Adjutant General of the United States Army show nearly one-half of the entire enlistments were of boys of 18 years of age and under, or, in exact figures, 1,151,438, while more than two-thirds of the entire Army were 21 years of age and under, or 2,159,798. The military age was from 18 to 48, and of the 2,800,000 there were but 46,626 of 25 years of age and over. The following table of ages of Union soldiers of the Civil War is taken from the records of The Adjutant General's Office:

10 years of age	25
11 years of age and under	38
12 years of age and under	225
13 years of age and under	300
14 years of age and under	1,523
15 years of age and under	105,987
16 years of age and under	231,051
17 years of age and under	844,981
18 years of age and under	1,151,438
21 years of age and under	2,159,798
22 years of age and over	618,511
25 years of age and over	46,626
44 years of age and over	16,071
Total enlisted	2,778,309
Individual enlistments	2,213,370
Reenlistments	564,939

I have not the records of the gallant army of the Confederacy, but I have no doubt they would show a similarly striking record of the youthful character of their army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield me a little more time?

Mr. McKENZIE. How much time?

Mr. OSBORNE. About five minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Whether or not these volunteer soldiers were worthy of their country and of the cause for which they fought may be answered by a reading of the history of the great battles of the Civil War—Gettysburg, Vicksburg, Shiloh, Antietam, Fredericksburg, the Wilderness, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Cold Harbor, and Sherman's march to the sea. I believe I do not speak extravagantly when I say that the combined volunteer armies of Grant and Lee, of Sherman, Sheridan, and Stonewall Jackson, on the day of the great event at Appomattox, was the equal in effectiveness, in soldiery qualities of self-sacrifice, of determination and valor, and in all that constitutes a great and grand army, of any army that had ever assembled on the face of the earth. The combined numbers at that time, decimated as they had been by more than 2,000 engagements and battles, numbered about 2,000,000 men. Beginning with that day these 2,000,000 valorous, rugged soldiers peacefully vanished as an army, and its individual members quietly and unostentatiously took their places in the avocations of peace—frequently in lesser places than they had vacated when they rallied to the colors. But not for long. They soon constituted the virile force which builded up the wasted energies of the country. The civilian-volunteer soldiers of the Civil War, North and South, were the most vital force in all branches of useful activities in the Nation during the following third of a century, rehabilitating its physical powers and energies, vitalizing the patriotic impulses of the country, and keeping alive the spirit and soul of the Nation, and saving it from being overwhelmed by the waves of growing wealth and successful commercialism which their services in war and peace had rendered possible.

Nor did the volunteer system fail to produce thousands of officers of great courage and distinguished ability as soldiers. Nelson A. Miles was a major general at 26, and Adna R. Chaffee entered the Volunteer Army as a private, and after a lifetime of active and distinguished service, retired at the age of 64 as lieutenant general. It would be an almost endless task to mention the names of deservedly distinguished officers of the Union and Confederate Armies who were the products of the volunteer system.

I was impressed a few days ago by the remark of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], himself a veteran of the Spanish War, who made the statement that with 10,000 volunteers he would undertake to whip an army of 100,000 conscripts. This statement was made to emphasize the belief in the greater value of volunteers as soldiers over drafted soldiers or conscripts. A circumstance within the range of my personal experience points in the same direction.

Under the last call of President Lincoln for 300,000 additional troops, I volunteered at the age of 16 and served during the closing months of the war in a regiment of recruits as a private soldier. Nine of the ten companies of this regiment were volunteers, and the tenth company was made up of drafted men from a northern county in the State of New York. It was the custom in raising troops during the Civil War for the President to issue his proclamation calling for such number of troops as he found necessary, beginning in 1861 with the original call of 75,000 men for three months, and followed at intervals during the four years by seven or eight proclamations, calling usually for 300,000 men, which was the occasion of the popular song of that day, "We are coming Father Abraham, three hundred thousand more!" Each State was required to raise its quota of men according to its population, and the States in turn divided the quota among the various counties, and each county was required to enlist its portion. If in any county there was a failure to enlist a sufficient number of volunteers a draft was resorted to. The company to which I have referred was drafted in this way.

They came from a rural community and were composed of young farmers—stalwart young Americans—and physically and morally were the equal, if not the superior, of any other company in the regiment. Some of the companies were raised in New York City, Albany, and other large towns, and their average in physique or morale was not equal to that of this drafted company.

The difference in practical service, however, was largely against the drafted company. The incredible fatigues of army service—the long march, the drills, parades, and inspections, the sleeping out in rain and storms—told on these splendid men more than it did upon the others. Those who had entered the service willingly, and who were all very young, after a few hours' sleep on the ground would spring back into good physical condition and be ready for whatever might happen, while the drafted men, their thoughts on home, on their little farms, and on the mothers, wives, or children that they might have left at home, would give way to these physical prostrations, would contract diseases that would be thrown off by men of lesser physical power, would be taken to the hospitals, and frequently die. The loss by death in this particular company growing out of these diseases was fully double that of any other company in the regiment. I mention this fact as one that has a bearing upon the important question before the House.

I sincerely believe that the new conditions, which contemplate a recruiting of the entire citizen army by the draft from among the whole people, may not have the weakening result which is suggested by this particular case. I am inclined to the opinion that where drafting is general all over the United States from a list embracing all men of military age and all subject to service, and especially where drafted men and volunteers are not placed in the same regiments, the outcome will be entirely different. Each man, knowing that every other man was liable, like himself, to service, and that his choice was the result of chance fairly encountered, will be reconciled to the situation in a way that he would not be if some were volunteers and some were drafted men.

I fully realize that the conditions of warfare have been revolutionized since the Civil War, and that what was best for that time is not best for to-day. But I could not let this occasion pass without saying a word for the glorious history of the achievements under the volunteer system. I do so upon the same ground that I would glorify the deeds of the wooden ships of the United States Navy a century ago. The annals of the sea contain no more glorious episodes than those of the United States Navy when all its ships were of wood. John Paul Jones gained imperishable renown as a commander of wooden ships of America. Perry's battle in Lake Erie was one on wooden ships. The deeds of Admiral Semmes during the Civil War on the Alabama were performed on a wooden ship, and the final sinking of the Alabama was by another wooden ship, the Kearsarge. Farragut's great naval successes were at the head of a wooden navy. Yet we would not to-day, in face of the marvelous advances in naval construction, think of trusting our fortunes to vessels of wood.

We are assured by the trained, educated, and patriotic officers of our Army that the former volunteer system, however glorious it may have been in the past, is no longer suited to the requirements of a modern nation. As a volunteer of the Civil War I may turn with regret from that system to confront the stern realities of to-day. We are engaged in a great war with a well-equipped and powerful enemy. It is for us to turn away from purely sentimental considerations and give our support to those agencies and systems which modern science and the knowledge of the day indicate as being those necessary to win success. As sensible men we know that time is one of the most important elements in war, and that we can not too soon organize and equip our Army. At its best, we know that the volunteer system is a slow and crude method of getting together a great army. Had France depended upon that system, Paris would have been in the hands of her enemies more than two years ago. The Union success in the Civil War, under the volunteer system, was due to the fact that our brave opponents raised their army under the same system and both armies were under the same disability as to speed in assembling.

The Congress of the United States has voted for war. It has placed the conduct of that war in the hands of the President. Having placed that overwhelming responsibility upon him, let us sustain and uphold his hands in the conduct of that great enterprise in every possible way. Let us sink all personal and political considerations in the great contest before us.

The President has in many ways shown a sense of the great responsibility which rests upon him. Great occasions and great crises make great men. Two recent actions of the President have gone far to entrench him in the confidence of the people. One of these was the appointment of Gen. George W. Goethals to take charge of the building of our ships. Another was the appointment of that great young man of my own State of California, Herbert C. Hoover, as head of the food-supplies commission. These two conspicuously excellent appointments, combined with the magnificently patriotic address to Congress of the President, and his more recent address to the American people on consecration to the cause of our country, have produced a profoundly favorable impression upon the people in all parts of the United States. Should he, in the performance of his great task, deem it wise to accept the services of another great American, and commission Theodore Roosevelt to raise a division of soldiers and permit this body of Americans to bear the banner of our country to the lines of the fighting forces of our brave allies in France, it would be a glorious inspiration to them and to the American people as well. Such action, I contend, would not compromise the general principles of this bill and would go far to smooth away many of the obstacles to a complete and unified purpose of the people to place everything—fortunes, honors, and lives—upon the altar of their country, and inspire still greater and more unbounded confidence in the President.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill framed and recommended by the General Staff of the United States Army, which is approved and desired by the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY].

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, it is not without some sense of hesitancy, or perhaps of reluctance, that I have consented to address the House upon the pending measure. The Members have indulged in a great deal of discussion on this subject, which on first thought seems to change our very course from that directed by the founders of our Nation.

The suddenness with which all these problems have thrust themselves upon our minds has almost overwhelmed us, and there is no wonder that the Nation pauses and gasps.

When the subject of conscription was first submitted by the President, I thought it was not only a reflection but an insult upon the patriotism of American citizenship.

At first I said to myself: "Was it not sufficient when I cast my vote for the resolution recognizing a state of war and placing all the resources of the Nation at the disposal of our Chief Executive to repel the assassin who has so foully murdered our citizens on land and sea and has destroyed our property without a just cause? Why should I now doubt the patriotism of the Nation by voting for selective conscription? Must I be required further, by my vote, to permit the mailed hand to tear an unwilling son from a fond and unwilling mother?"

All this seemed for the time, I say, almost to overwhelm me, and I not only hesitated but was ready and willing to cast my vote against conscription. But as I began to study the proposal and to compare it with the volunteer system which had been in vogue in this country and saw how miserably the latter system had failed at the very birth of the Republic because not enough volunteered; how, had it not been for the French soldier, we would probably not now be a free and independent people; and then again, when I considered the failure of the American Army in 1812, when the Capitol of the Nation was burned by invaders, and how the United States was forced to resort to the odious draft in the Civil War, and by offensive methods which stigmatized as poltroons 776,829 Union soldiers, who were either drafted or compelled to enlist to maintain the Union after the flower of our volunteer manhood had been destroyed—after I had reflected on the history of the volunteer system the question arose in my mind: "Shall we repeat the mistakes of our fathers by first sacrificing the volunteer and placing a handicap upon a large percentage of our citizenship who do not volunteer at first call?"

Democracy believes in equality, but to maintain that principle we must allow all to bear the burdens equally.

Mr. Chairman, democracy must be strong enough to maintain its own form of government as against domestic and foreign foes. It is said that we are aping after the autocracy we aim to destroy. How, I pray you, can we now meet this foreign foe unless we unite and organize?

The chances are that the man who now cries out: "Don't Prussianize America" is not a true friend of America. Mr. Chairman, the more I considered this question the more I came to the conclusion that the selective system is the only fair and just method in a democratic form of government. And as I remembered of the draft riots of the Civil War and how odious the system proved, after the destruction of the volunteer system, I was appalled at the thought that the country might not be prepared for this sudden change in the conduct of war, and that instead of considering it an honor to be selected, the men would resent it because it implied some force.

During the past week I have sent telegrams to the fifty-odd papers in my district inviting the opinions of the readers on the best method in which to raise an army. I want the Clerk to read one of these, coming from 50 boys all of military age.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. B. F. WELTY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Your duty is plain. Fifty young men of Lima, Ohio, composing the Inner Club, all of military age, expect you to support the bill for universal service. You voted for war, and being at war we must fight, so let us all fight. Vote for conscription bill—politics and patriotism don't mix.

THE INNER CLUB,
By M. AUSTIN POTTER,
SEWARD G. FOLSOM,
PAUL T. LANDIS,
VAN CLEAVE HOLMES,
GEORGE L. PARMENTER, Committee.

Mr. WELTY. Ah, Mr. Chairman, they say that the people can not distinguish and can not understand what the words "selective conscription" means. I was never more delighted and gratified than with the response which convinced me that they too, have been thinking about this very question before the House; and the hundreds of letters and telegrams have proved to me that a large majority of those who are giving this subject any thought are in favor of requiring everyone to do his part, and believe the selective system the only fair one. The Nation is not afraid of military autocracy so long as every citizen is a soldier.

The volunteer system is a beautiful dream when all are willing to do their duty and bear the burden equally—when all are willing to volunteer. But so long as we have men who are cleft with a selfish and cowardly spirit, and believe in the volunteer system because they know the other fellow is willing to volunteer, we can maintain the country longer by destroying the present volunteer system and give everyone a chance to do his full duty.

The slacker must bear his just share of the burden if he desires to enjoy long the freedom of his country. I find that there are two classes who believe in the volunteer system—those who are anxious to volunteer and those who rejoice because the other fellow is willing to go to the front. But our Americanism depends upon the degree of our willingness to sacrifice.

Mr. Chairman, no true American, "having put his hand to the plow and looking backward, is fit" for citizenship in "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Why are we halting between two ideas? Action, not words, is what the country wants. It is not now for us to decide what measures will be most popular with our constituents. We are not here to reelect ourselves. In a crisis such as this, when the ideals of the Republic are to be tested with the ordeal of fire, it is of no importance to patriots what measures might soonest win the stamp of approval. There is no time to be lost in the discussion of minor details. We must decide, and that right quickly, how best to serve the common welfare of the land, how most efficiently to prosecute the military campaign we have voted to undertake.

It is said that only the rich favor the volunteer system. If it were possible under this bill to purchase a substitute, I should not vote for it. The burden will fall equally upon all, and no man can complain because of that burden. This war will not be over in 60 or 90 days. We have a man's job on our hands, and for the sake of our glorious ancestors we should at least meet the test so that our country may continue in its path of destiny.

Looking at it from a cold and dispassionate view, we must all come to the same conclusion—that the selective system proposed by the minority of the committee is the only fair and just requirement from every true and loyal American.

Should the volunteer soldier bear the entire burden? Should we not also look after the man who raises the crops or makes the munitions of war? Selective conscription can be made applicable to the needs of the country as those needs arise. Plenty of boys at first will volunteer to do their bit on the field of battle, but few will offer their services in a field of corn or wheat. Thousands will turn out to march behind the flag, but some must stay home to make the shells and shrapnel we will need. Mr. Chairman, the most effective mode of prosecuting this war will ultimately prove to be that which puts each man at the task where he can be of the greatest value to his country.

Again, I find that there are two classes of volunteers who will go unless restrained—the son with a dependent mother and the married man with a family of children. I want you men who favor the volunteer system as against selective conscription to consider the young man with a family, or the one who supports a widowed, or perchance an invalid, mother. He would like to go, but his better judgment tells him that he can best serve his country by supporting his home. Valor may not at first get the best of his judgment, and probably he will not respond at the first call, but neither does the slacker, who supports no one. The country needs more men; another call goes out. Are you going to embarrass the boy who has a dependent mother or the father of six children, and see him go? Yea, will you permit him to go, while the slacker, who is too lazy to work, or who, perchance, expects to make a fortune out of the war, remains at home? I pray you think on this subject in a cold and dispassionate manner.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WELTY. I think I can conclude in about three minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I still remember the boys of '98, some resigning lucrative civil positions to volunteer in the ranks at $15.60 per month. In our regiment we had privates some of whom resigned and others had held city and county offices, merchants, printers, mechanics, and farmers—the best blood of the land—all ready and willing to join the ranks; and I can see the slacker as we left him, able-bodied, sitting on a store box whittling while his mother was earning a living over a washtub. When we came home I saw the same slacker whittling on the same store box. What are you going to do with that man? Does he, too, owe a duty to his country when the country needs men?

The other day we granted authority to England, France, Russia, and Italy to conscript their subjects in our country who attempt to escape military duty. Shall we treat our slackers differently? Another reason I am for selective conscription is because it places the man who should remain at home, on the farm or in the factory, on the same level as the patriot, and does not make him feel as though he is a poltroon if conscription is resorted to when the volunteer system fails.

Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the gentleman from Nebraska so eloquently describe the freedom his ancestors enjoyed in the Swiss Alps, and wondered whether our ancestors were neighbors. But I was rather surprised that he would justify his position by comparing the Swiss method with his proposed method of raising an army. He surely knows that every Swiss is a soldier, and as good as the world has ever known. If Germany had no more regard for the Swiss Army than she had for that of Belgium she would have invaded that country too. Had we the Swiss military system in this country we would not now be debating whether to call for volunteers or conscript our soldiers. They would be mobilizing while we are talking about it.

I do not fully agree with the minority report, and would suggest to the committee an amendment that boys from 18 to 21 be permitted to register, while men above that age be required to register. This will leave it optional with boys of 18 to 21 to offer their services. I offer this suggestion because I find a great many Members who will refuse to vote to conscript a boy who has no chance to vote against him if he does not approve his course.

We voted for war and have given the President all the money he requested to prosecute that war; now, I pray you, do not tie his hands when it comes to voting men so necessary to conduct that war to a successful conclusion. But let us be united in holding them up. He is not only the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy but of every American citizen who is willing to make the full sacrifice necessary to maintain the rights of a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES.] [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the administration plan in this emergency as the best and fairest means of raising and training an army. I do not like the committee bill because it seeks to evade the issue, and in the very heart of the bill it calls upon the American Congress to shirk a responsibility. The selective draft is right or wrong in principle. If right, it should be adopted; if wrong, it should be rejected utterly and only resorted to when there is no other way to save the Nation, and in the meantime should not be held as a club over the heads to force unwilling volunteers. No halfway measure that would leave the matter in a nebulous condition and shift the burden to the shoulders of another is worthy of this body of thinking men. We are face to face with an issue, and I believe the American Congress should rise to the responsibility. [Applause.]

All of my sentiment, my training, my ideas, and the impulses of my heart have clustered around the volunteer soldier—the glorious battles he has fought, the victories he has won. Our liberties were established by him, and the Republic has always been maintained by his valor. He fought at Lexington, at Concord, and at New Orleans. He stood guard while human freedom was cradled, and he has walked by the side of liberty during the unfolding and development of this country. He has been our mainstay and protection while we have grown from simplicity and honor to the proud heritage of freedom and power. But when the cold logic of reason is summoned, is the volunteer soldier not found to have borne more than his share of the burdens of government? Has he not been permitted to make too proud a sacrifice? Why should the best blood of a nation perish that a poorer type might enjoy the blessings of liberty? Why should military duty be voluntary any more than taxes, road service, or jury duty?

Conceding that the volunteer method would secure the necessary soldiers, I ask you, is it fair? We are wont to pay tribute in song and in story to the brave volunteer who has carried the flag to victory and possibly to death on the blood-red field of battle. But what does lip service mean to him after the tumult is over and the story grows old? What are you going to do for the man who has patriotic fervor enough to enlist, make the sacrifice for his country, carry the robe of glory on the field of carnage—to return a forgotten soldier to resume his activities in the aftermath, while his less worthy brother quenches the flame of patriotism, remains at home, makes money, ascends to higher position in his chosen vocation, and, while joining in the cheers, perhaps, has the returned soldier discounted in the stern battle of life's business? Why should the slacker be thus favored? Why should he, while remaining at his fireside, enjoy the protection and gain of another man's fighting? The volunteer system puts a premium on the sluggard in his sluggishness and penalizes the patriot in his patriotism. [Applause.] The objection is not to the volunteer soldier but to the system. The volunteer soldier is the greatest of soldiers, but the system is the poorest of systems. It takes the flower of the land and leaves a generation of delinquents to propagate the race. Is there any good reason why the brave, strong man should risk his life and his all that the stay-at-home might live and flourish? Modern warfare is the grimmest business that ever engaged the attention of a people, the most terrible ordeal that men must face. It must be on an efficiency basis. Every abled-bodied man should be placed where his Government feels that he can best promote the interests of the Commonwealth. [Applause.]

Since my boyhood I have heard the phrasing, "The classes incite and the masses fight." Heretofore there has been too much of truth wrapped up in that trite expression. Under the selective draft the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the baker's son, the banker's son, each—all must melt into a common sentiment and stand shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart. Could anything be fairer or more democratic? For once in all our glorious history let us have a war that is not a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. To this end I shall favor levying a draft upon wealth in the form of graduated income and excess profits taxes, in order that all our forces may be utilized in the prosecution of this fight and for the purpose of discouraging those who would make a profit out of warfare and coin American blood and tears into money, by removing any artificial inducement for war. There is no doubt that if every man must bear his part, both of money and liability to service, it will have a sobering effect on all people whenever war excitement prevails. Of course these taxes should not be exorbitant, but taxation should be distributed in the fairest manner possible.

I take no stock in the argument that men will not volunteer. I have no doubt of our ability to secure volunteers at this time. A flame has swept the country. From the housetops to the hilltops—from the schoolhouse to the workshop—from the flaming forges of life, this great country, cleft by flowing rivers and framed in eternal hills, is ablaze with patriotism to-day. It was so in 1776, it was true in 1861. But the trouble is that if the volunteer system fails it always fails in the emergency, when the cold steel of the crisis comes. It happened in the Civil War. At first they were all enthusiastic but after service for a time the glamor faded, the ardor cooled, and conscription came. It was odious then. The slacker having lost all courage and self-respect by dodging his duty and by the abuse and villification which had been heaped upon him was brought into the Army a slinking coward. Conscious of his own shortcomings—every circumstance combined against him—he felt disgraced. It will not be so with the selective draft. When a man has registered he will have performed his duty until his name is drawn from the wheel and he is selected for the service. Conscription if adopted at the start carries no stigma with it. It is the natural and logical system.

If we all owe the duty of service when needed, the choice should not be left to the individual, for the selection will not then be from those that are needed least at home, nor from those who would be of greatest use in the Army, but from those who feel the pressure of that duty strongest, be they married or single, producer or nonproducer. I am very much inclined to the opinion that those would likely go that industry could least spare. At least, the selection would not be scientific or businesslike, and modern warfare is a business—a business for those at the front and those who are kept at home. There must be a mobilization of every resource of the Nation—of men, of supplies, of everything that constitutes a nation's resources. Who ever heard of the head of a mercantile firm going in among his men and calling for volunteers to carry a message or to do any particular duty? No; he assigns to each man the duty which he wishes performed. That is the modern successful business method. The allied forces need munitions and food supplies more than they need men. We have become the supply house of the earth. And yet the vast majority of new enlistments in this country to date have been from the open country, where men are most needed. This can be prevented under the proposed plan.

Switzerland is an ideal democracy. She has no standing army, no professional soldiers. That little country has universal military training and universal liability to service, and can mobilize her entire fighting strength in an incredibly short period of time. Five hundred thousand trained citizen soldiers are instantly available in that land, at less than one-third the expense to which this country is placed in maintaining a regular standing army of less than 100,000 men. Switzerland is in the pathway of the storm in Europe, and would have furnished a convenient passage for the armies, and yet not one of the belligerent countries has dared set foot upon her soil and not one of her citizen soldiers has been slain. We have heard in this discussion a great deal of talk of tradition and traditional policies. If the Swiss had used the old traditions, they would have stood on the mountain and pushed rocks off onto their enemies and used the old crossbow that William Tell used in his contests. Why not use the flintlock pistol and the old muzzle-loading squirrel rifle that our fathers used if we are going to use simply the argument of tradition? If the Swiss had adopted that policy, they would, instead of being men vibrant with life and energy, have been paying tribute to the brave volunteers who fought and died in defense of their country. I would rather have living men, untouched and unhurt, than to be paying tribute to the dead, no matter how gloriously they may have perished.

I hope the time may soon come when by international agreement we may have all armament and all military preparation reduced to a minimum, when all this economic waste may be avoided. This, however, is not practicable so long as the intense military attitude is assumed by other nations, and rulers who thirst for conquest and military glory hold the reins of government in other lands. We all long with an intense longing for the time when liberty, equality, manhood, and fair play shall be the ruling passion of men of all nations and when democracy will live and flourish among all peoples.

I wish it might all have been avoided. When the war resolution was up, our minds instinctively sought a peaceful solution. If faith, by delaying, could have seen a bow of promise through a rift in the clouds, or if hope, by lingering, could have seen a star in the far east to guide us amid all this gloom and depression, I should have been glad to follow and worship at the altar of peace, even though it led to a manger. But it could not be so. Prussianism had placed a cherubim of mockery and a flaming sword of ruthlessness, which turning in every direction guarded the gateway to the haven of peace. The die is cast. The dogs of war have been unleashed. In the battle of democracy against autocracy we are fighting for "rights that are more precious than peace." There is no doubt that the Kaiser dreamed and planned a world conquest just as surely as did Napoleon or Alexander. If successful, human liberty would be the martyr, and the rights for which men have worked and fought during all these years would be sacrificed.

Great events are making this period the most momentous in the annals of all time. New ideals are being born and almost instantly wrought into form by the plastic hand of progress. Recent events have shown that we can not stand still. The crust of civilization is too thin. We must move forward or backward, else human liberty will perish in the mire. The conditions call for emergency legislation, for the action of the times, and I prefer to follow the leadership of the Commander in Chief of our military forces in this crisis. There is more than the simple issue in the outcome of this war. This is the last death struggle of caste and privilege and of the tyranny of birth and blood. Tremendous changes are going on in the world's affairs. The Russian Czar has abdicated and a new Government is being established more glorious in form than the archaic and outworn Government of the past. We are being molded into a new world relationship just as surely as in the Revolutionary War the thirteen Colonies were being molded into a new form, which was afterwards slowly, but none the less surely, and gradually wrought out. If we assume our rôle in the new relationship, we can hope that there will be no other world war; that the battles of the future will not be destructive, but rather creative and constructive; that the rivalry between nations will be settled by each building up its own resources rather than by tearing down the neighboring commonwealth; that when the smoke of battle has finally lifted from this holocaust there shall arise a higher purpose, a nobler impulse, purified and refined as by fire; that the rights of nations great and small to the great highway of the seas will be recognized; and that human liberty will in the future be guarded with eternal vigilance by men everywhere with a common purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat says that the volunteer system was a failure during the Civil War. I deny it. History proves that that is not so. I claim that the conscript system during the war was a failure, and I am going to prove it before I take my seat. I have here an official report that will be presented for the first time on this floor of the draft riots throughout this country during the Civil War. And I am going to print it in the RECORD for the benefit of the "conscript fathers" on this floor [applause] and throw some enlightenment on this question.

The advocates of conscription seem to lose sight of the fact that the vital question of the hour is not what is the most equitable way to raise an army, but the vital question is what is the best and speediest way to raise the most reliable and efficient army. There is no doubt the volunteer always is and always has been and always will be a better soldier than the so-called slacker, who is rated as a moral and a physical coward. [Applause.] Another grave mistake the devotees of conscription make, and that is that conscription takes the rich and the poor all alike. As the family is the unit of society, let us see. I have recently been reading a very valuable pamphlet by Prof. George Nasmyth, a noted writer on sociology, author of a book on social progress, and another valuable book—A Study of Force as a Factor in Human Relations. This pamphlet deals with the question of universal military training or conscription, whichever you may call it. The argument for universal military service is that it treats the rich and the poor alike. This argument is not sound. Let me quote from Prof. Nasmyth a paragraph that goes to the root of the whole question:

> Does universal military service involve equal sacrifice on the part of rich and poor alike? If both are killed, of course, both have made the last great sacrifice. But for the families of the two men the difference is very great. For the family of the poor man the loss of the breadwinner means that the widow must go out to work; that the children must be deprived of an opportunity for education. For the rich man, on the contrary, no such sacrifice on the part of his family is involved. His wife is not compelled to go out and work; his children are not deprived of the opportunity of receiving a liberal education.

To that poor woman and her children life is a burden without hope.

As all our wars have been successful, all fought by volunteers, I am for the volunteer system for raising a patriotic and effective army. As forcing unwilling men into the Army, even to fight for the life of the Republic, resulted in riots and rebellion and bloodshed, and was a conceded failure in our greatest and longest enduring war, I am opposed to conscription now. The statement, so often repeated on this floor, that the volunteer system is a failure rests solely upon the assertions of those who have had no experience in war and who have presented no argument to sustain their statements. When I state that the draft system has always proved a disastrous failure in this country I do not propose to rest the statement on mere assertion. I am going to prove it.

During our great Civil War, which was fought on both sides almost exclusively by volunteers, we had in the armies of the Union from 1861 to 1865, 2,212,742 soldiers. Of this number, notwithstanding the drafts, covering a period of almost two years, less than 62,000 drafted men ever got in battle array at the front. [Applause.] The talk heard so often on this floor that an unwilling soldier, forced into the Army against his will and against his convictions, will make as serviceable or as valuable a soldier as a volunteer, who offers his services because of an all-prevailing sense of duty to his country or his country's cause, is not only absurd but absolutely foolish. During my four years' service in the Civil War I was never sick and never off duty, hence I was always at the front of observation. [Applause.] I was a member of three regiments and had as much experience, I believe, with both volunteers and drafted men as any ex-soldier now living. During the Atlanta campaign of 110 days, every day under fire, I had sent to my regiment 72 drafted men from northwestern Ohio, but of that 72 men only 2 proved of any value, only 2 out of the 72. [Laughter.] And you can not find a surviving soldier of the Civil War to-day in any part of the United States who will admit that he was forced into the Army as a drafted man.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. If I can hear you and they will give me all the time I want, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am asking this for information. Several States gave bounties in order that they might secure the requisite number of volunteers. I have no information as to what may have been done in the State of Ohio, although I know that State furnished a splendid number of men for the Union Army. I would like to inquire if the State of Ohio gave bounties to any men to induce them to volunteer in the Civil War?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Oh, yes. It gave bounties.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think that a man who has to receive a bounty before he will enlist is a real volunteer?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I could not answer any questions as to things that occurred in the rear during the Civil War, as I never was in the rear. [Laughter and applause.]

All feel that the honor and glory of service comes only to the volunteer soldier. The deserters in our Army during the Civil War, and there were thousands of them, came almost exclusively from drafted soldiers. This was true also of the soldiers of the Confederacy, as I am well informed.

During the siege of Knoxville, Tenn., during the winter of 1863–64, I was in command of an outpost, and, without exception, the Confederate soldiers who deserted and came to my post were conscripted soldiers. [Applause.] In my judgment, if a draft is now ordered on our young men to be sent across the Atlantic to wallow in Europe's pool of blood, we will be confronted with formidable opposition. In the great Civil War, when the appeal to the patriotic manhood of the Republic was to save the Union of these States from disruption, the draft not only failed in adequate support but resulted in riots and bloodshed.

For four days on the streets of New York there were rioting and bloodshed, and the mob took possession of that city. And there to-day are more of the conscript fathers than in any other city in the Union and fewer recruits. [Laughter and applause.]

As to selective conscription I have numerous letters from humanitarians and students of sociology, all against taking our young men first. Among the letters is one from Mr. B. L. Smith, of Joliet, Ill. Mr. Smith says:

> Because of the youth of the boys called for in the first draft, the character of these boys is yet in the making. To compel carefully reared boys of this age to live month after month by the side of the street loafer and the poolroom fiend is liable to result in character ruin of the boy.

[Applause.]

> Boys under 23 (perhaps 22) are still highly plastic as regards character making. If the draft began with men of 23 or older, my protest would be less. Why not begin with the bachelors of 30 to 35?

[Applause.]

> Then take the unmarried men between 23 and 30, and then, if necessary, the boys of 19 to 23. In the event of peace before fighting occurs, the demoralization of the moral forces of our country would not be so great if the older men whose characters are fixed are called out first.

I could give you more proofs of the failure of conscription in the time that tried men's souls, and women's souls, too. These are memories of trial and travail burnt into my soul—indelibly as long as life and memory shall last.

The period of 1861 to 1865 of our great Civil War is conceded to be the most patriotic in all our 130 years of history, and the cause for which the Union Army fought was for the preservation of this Union of States, and the opposition to the draft during that period, 1863 to 1864, was not as intense as it is to-day among the young manhood of this Nation, who, under the selective plan of conscription, are to be forced into this damnable European war. I have recently returned from Ohio, and I am satisfied that the larger element clamoring for conscription are men not liable to draft. This element is largely made up of men over the draftable age, and the documents that I shall present and am presenting here now to show the opposition to the draft of '63 to '64 was not because they did not believe in the war or would not fight in the interest of the Nation, but because they believed the draft was un-American, unconstitutional, and unnecessary. The riots that occurred during that period, to which I am about to refer, are liable to be duplicated in this country in the near future if the attempt is made to send the stalwart young manhood of America into a foreign war that does not appeal to their patriotism, or in the defense of their country, or in the interest of Christian civilization or the future peace of the world. [Applause.]

Now, here is what Gov. Seymour says, the war governor of New York, afterwards a candidate for President of the United States:

> The failure of conscription in comparison with volunteering is shown by results in this State (New York):
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Total number of volunteers enlisted, January, 1863, to January, 1864 | 56,156 |
> | Total number of conscripts who were delivered at military stations | 2,575 |
> Like results are conspicuous in all parts of our State and in all sections of the country—in New England, Pennsylvania, and the West. The attempt to fill our armies by drafting was abortive. While it gave no useful result, it disturbed the public mind, it carried anxiety and perplexity into the workshops, the fields, and the homes of our citizens. It not only fails to fill our armies, but it produces discontent in the service; it is opposed to the genius of our political system; it alienates our people from the Government; it is injurious to the industrial pursuits of the country. (Gov. Seymour's annual message to the New York Legislature, Jan. 5, 1864.)

This morning my distinguished and able colleague from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] quoted from Daniel Webster. I have another quotation from Daniel Webster bearing on that question, from a speech delivered after the War of 1812 had progressed for two years. It was against the constitutionality of conscription. Daniel Webster was the ablest statesman of the ante bellum period. If you want to know what he looked like, go out into the Marble Room among the immortals and you will see him there. Here is what he said, among other arguments:

> Is this, sir, consistent with the character of a free government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, sir; indeed it is not. The Constitution is libeled, foully libeled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasures and their own blood a Magna Charta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained that you may take children from their parents and parents from their children and compel them to fight the battles of any war which the folly or the wickedness of government may engage in? Under what concealment has this power lain hidden which now for the first time comes forth, with a tremendous and baleful aspect, to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty? Who will show me any constitutional injunction which makes it the duty of the American people to surrender everything valuable in life, and even life itself, not when the safety of their country and its liberties may demand the sacrifice, but whenever the purposes of an ambitious and mischievous government may require it? Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country.

Here is the report of the provost marshal general:

> WITH OUR NATION AT WAR, IS IT WISE TO CREATE INTERNAL STRIFE?
> CIVIL WAR.
> The order for the draft was the signal for violent disturbance in many portions of the loyal States and much blood was shed before these disturbances were quieted. In some portions of the country, particularly in the city of New York, certain districts in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois, the draft was conducted under the protection of troops sent there to overawe the lawless, and in other districts the draft was deferred until troops could be furnished to protect the officers. The draft was not completed till late in the year, and produced but few men for the service. (Report of Provost Marshal Gen. James B. Fry, Mar. 17, 1866.)

Will you get this statement into your system? [Applause.] The number of men drafted throughout the United States in one year was less than the number of troops sent to the city of New York alone to enforce the draft.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS OF DRAFT OF 1863.

The report of the provost marshal general to the Secretary of War, November 17, 1863, shows that the total number of men raised by the draft of this year was 9,848. Thus the total number of men raised by this draft was less than the number of troops sent from the field to enforce the draft in New York City alone.

[Applause.] I read further:

On Saturday, the 11th of July, the draft commenced in the city of New York. * * * The results of this riot and condition of affairs in the State of New York made it unpractical to resume the draft in that city until the 19th of August, when troops were sent there from the armies in the field.—(Report of provost marshal.)

Under date of August 12 Maj. Gen. John A. Dix wired for 10,000 troops to "overawe resistance to the draft." (See letter to the Secretary of War, which follows.)

In the report of the provost marshal general, above quoted, occurs the following naive admission:

It is probable that large reenforcements will be obtained under the President's call of October 17, 1863, for 300,000 volunteers.

Now, this is the official result of the draft. I quote:

SUMMARY OF RESULTS OF DRAFT UNDER CALLS OF MAY 1 AND JULY 18, 1864.

TROOPS DEMANDED TO ENFORCE DRAFT.

To enforce a draft which produced 19,058 up to November 1, 1864, troops to the number of 35,000 were demanded by commanders in charge of the drafting in different States, as follows:

Indiana	10,000
Illinois	10,000
Ohio	5,000
New York City	10,000

In addition to these troops, troops were demanded from Harrisburg, Pa., New Jersey, and Delaware.

During this same period there were, in round numbers, 225,000 volunteers secured.

ADJUTANT GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY:

There is good reason to expect a riot here in completing and enforcing the draft. The only force I have to oppose or prevent it is that of recruits for new regiments not yet mustered into the service. I recommend to send 500 or more well-disciplined men to this place to remain till the drafted men are put in the field.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE ACTING ASSISTANT PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
Albany, July 16, 1864.

Col. JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General United States,
Washington, D. C.

COLONEL: * * * Believing that the contaminating influence of the riot in the city of New York would doubtless cease with its suppression, which I thought would certainly occur by that day at furthest, I acceded to the suggestion—to omit drafting the next day—but on the morning of the next day, although there was no drafting going on, the riot broke out, and the mob indulged in a counterpart of the depredations which have been occurring in the city of New York, destroying the office of a certain newspaper, the Troy Times, sacking the building, as well as the house of a prominent citizen.

* * * * * * *

The thirteenth district, Capt. Fero, provost marshal, has removed his papers to a securer place than headquarters. There is an organization of laboring men and others at Kingston, Saugerties, Wilbur, Eddyville, and Port Ewen estimated to be in all 2,000 men. The steamboat Powell, from New York, was forbidden to land at Kingston until a delegation of the mob, some 300 or 400 men, had examined the boat, supposing that cannon was to be landed. At Saugerties Tuesday night 300 men paraded the streets and threatened to burn Mr. Bois's house, who is a powder manufacturer.

NEW YORK.

STATE OF NEW YORK, NORTHERN DIVISION,
OFFICE OF ACTING ASSISTANT PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
Albany, July 17, 1863.

Brig. Gen. CANBY, New York City.

GENERAL: I am authorized by the provost marshal general to apply to you for force to aid me in the discharge of my duties as acting assistant provost marshal general for the northern division of New York.

A draft was sought to be enforced on Tuesday of this week in the city of Troy for the fifteenth congressional district, which led to a serious riot, and this city, in anticipation of the draft, which has not been ordered here, is on the verge of an outbreak of a nature similar to that occurring in the city of New York. * * *

I have to report that a force of 1,000 men and a section of a battery are immediately needed to protect the Government records and property here and in Troy now under charge of the officials of the provost marshal general's bureau.

Very nearly the same state of things exists in each of the districts under my charge.

The drafting has, by authority, been temporarily suspended, and when commenced again anywhere in the division a larger force than ever as above required will be necessary.

I am, sir, very respectfully, etc.,

FREDK. TOWNSEND,
Major, United States Army,
Acting Assistant Provost Marshal General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like enough time to read the reports.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Very well. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes more.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Now, all these reports are from official sources—all about the draft riots. I have compiled a summary of the results; and if there is any question about it, I will refer any Member on this floor to the official reports, which will confirm it.

NEW JERSEY.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1863.

Maj. Gen. DIX,
Commanding Department of the East, New York City.

GENERAL: * * * In the fifteenth district the draft was commenced, and has been suspended by a riot in Troy. In the fourteenth district the draft has not commenced, as the indication of riot in Albany made it prudent not to begin.

* * * The indications of mob violence are so strong in Buffalo that I have deemed it best not to undertake a draft in that city until an adequate force can be sent there. Difficulties of greater or less magnitude are apprehended in some of the interior cities of New York.

In New Jersey there are unmistakable signs of resistance, and the draft has not yet been ordered in that State. I have directed Col. Buchanan, acting assistant provost marshal general for that State, headquarters Trenton, to pursue his duties with great prudence, so as to prevent an outbreak.

JAS. B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
FIRST DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN,
Milwaukee, Wis., July 14, 1863.

Lieut. Col. CHARLES S. LOVELL,
Provost Marshal General for Wisconsin.

COLONEL: We are in possession of evidence that satisfies us beyond the possibility of doubt that there are organizations now in this city with plans matured, and that at a given signal the mob will break forth in all its fury. We could, and if the department desires it will, give facts and reasons for all we state. We have to-day been called upon by other parties occupying apartments in this block soliciting us to remove the provost marshal's office from this block to avoid the destruction of their property.

While we believe we are not particularly timid, at the same time we believe that it would be recklessness and foolhardiness to attempt a draft in this city without protection.

JOHN A. DIX, Major General.

Ohio has always been regarded as a very patriotic State. In the Civil War, from 1861 to 1865, Ohio raised more than one-tenth of all the volunteer soldiers of the Union Army. But there was a powerful element in Ohio opposed to the draft. Why? Because it was un-American and unnecessary.

OHIO.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, August 2, 1864.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War:

There is trouble anticipated in several districts in the State about the time of draft. Several strong organizations are forming, and some arming to resist. We will have men enough of the guard back for service, but our arms are the French and Prussian muskets, very inferior, and many of them worthless. Can you make a deposit of 10,000 to 20,000 Enfield rifles here with your ordnance officer, to be drawn on in case of emergency? The same thing would be accomplished by allowing the National Guard to bring their arms home and turn them over here.

ADJUTANT GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

GENERAL: It is represented to me by the chief magistrate and other civil authorities of this State (that) there exists a widespread and organized determination in some parts of the State to resist the enforcement of the draft, and that indications are apparent that it is the purpose of evil-disposed persons to attack the general rendezvous and disarm the permanent party here stationed. * * *

Maj. B. H. HILL,
Acting Assistant Provost Marshal General for Detroit.

MAJOR: * * * There is but one expression of opinion, and that is that there is existing here an organized armed body of men in this city to resist the draft. Some estimate it as high as 5,000, but that is an idle estimate. * * * This feeling has become intensified to an alarming degree by the successful violence in the city of New York, compelling the draft to be deferred. A spark here would explode the whole and bring it into the most violent action. * * * The condition of things is more critical than they have been at any time during the war.

A strong force should be ordered to this city at once.

Yours, respectfully,

JNO. S. NEWBERRY,
Captain and Provost Marshal First District.

OHIO, INDIANA, AND ILLINOIS.

WASHINGTON, August 12, 1864.

Lieut. Gen. GRANT,
City Point.

GENERAL: I have just received Gen. Heintzelman's report on Gen. Burbridge's telegram in regard to arresting certain persons in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Gen. Heintzelman does not deem it prudent to make arrests at the present time, as a rescue would probably be attempted, and his force is not sufficient to put down an insurrection. To provide against this he wants 10,000 men in each of the States of Indiana and Illinois and 5,000 in Ohio.

Gen. Pope and the provost marshal general of Wisconsin report that there will be armed resistance to the draft in that State, and that, as all the troops there have been ordered into the field, they will have no means to enforce it.

* * * * * *

Add these requisitions to those from New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, and I think we can dispose of a few hundred thousand men, if you can spare them from the James River.

Seriously, I think much importance should be attached to the representations of Gen. Heintzelman in regard to the condition of affairs in the West.

CHAS. ALLBRIGHT.

And the same condition occurred all over the country. I hope this will not occur again. It shows just how unpopular the draft was 50 years ago.

I have presented these riot records to show how utterly abhorrent to patriotic American citizens the conscription laws proved to be a half century ago. And that, too, in the awful presence of the greatest crisis in the history of this Republic. We have no reason to suppose that a conscription law to-day will prove less abhorrent to the patriotic young men of to-day.

We are treading on dangerous ground. If the stalwart, self-conscious men of a half century ago resisted a conscript law when the life of our own country was the one vital issue, what may be the result of a conscript law to force our peace-loving citizens to fight in a foreign war 4,000 miles away?

Are we going to send an army of conscripts to Europe to fight for democracy? Having disposed of the hereditary ruler of the German Empire, are we going to depose the hereditary monarch of England, the hereditary monarch of Spain, the hereditary monarch of Roumania, or of Serbia, or of Denmark, or Sweden, and Norway, and the other king-ruled and king-dominated empires of war-cursed Europe?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. If the gentleman will yield, I merely want to answer his question by saying that I hope so.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Are we to dethrone the Sultan of Turkey and the Mikado of Japan, under the pretense of a war for democracy? It looks like a long war; and when will the end be? What will the harvest be?

I am against conscription because it is un-American and undemocratic, and unjust to the stalwart manhood of this Nation. We have a cause to fight for that appeals to the loyalty of the men and women of this Republic. Let the President issue a stirring call for volunteers, and we will get volunteers to-day, as we have in the past, in ample numbers. I am against conscription because I am opposed to a government of force as against a government by consent of the people. I am opposed to conscription because no conscript army anywhere around the world ever achieved liberty for any country or empire around the world since civilization was evolved in the womb of the dead centuries. I am against conscription because I do not care to live to see the day when government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall be supplanted by a government by force. I am opposed to conscription because I am opposed to inaugurating kaiserism in this Republic, while destroying kaiserism in Europe.

If Germany is ever made a democracy, the force must come from within the Empire by evolution, or internal revolution, the same as in Russia and China. No student of sociology, no prophet of human destiny, believes that democracy can be forced on Germany by the armed legions of a foreign enemy. [Applause.]

Did the gentleman from Rhode Island wish to ask me a question?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I merely was answering your question when you asked was there a hope of routing out all those kings. I want to say fervently that so far as I am concerned that is my hope.

Mr. SHERWOOD. All right. I hope we rout them out, too.

Mr. GORDON. Are you in favor of conscripting men to rout these monarchs?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I think I have given my views so that you can all understand them on that question.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. I thought the gentleman from Ohio had yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman from Ohio said it required more soldiers in New York to enforce the draft there than they drafted all told. Will the gentleman inform us how many were drafted in New York?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I gave the number in my speech. You can see it in the RECORD.

Mr. WELTY. Does not the gentleman know that the report of the Secretary of War for 1865-66 shows that 168,649 men were drafted during the war; that at the first draft, in July, 1863, there were 35,885; on the second draft, in March, 1864, there were 12,363; and that the total was 168,649?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes; and less than 62,000 of them ever got to the front. [Applause.]

Mr. WELTY. Do you not know that 776,829 men enlisted because of that draft in 1863—enlisted as volunteers?

Mr. SHERWOOD. No; I do not know anything of the kind, and neither do you. [Applause.] That is an assumption that has no evidence behind it. The men who volunteered in the Army volunteered from patriotic motives, and they went to the front and fought the battles of the war. Drafted men were in many instances shirkers. On the 20th of July, 1864, in the Battle of Peach Tree Creek, I was in command of the division of skirmishers, and some of the 72 drafted men in my regiment were detailed on that skirmish line that I was commanding, a line about a mile long. When we reached the Confederate riflemen and sharpshooters, and when the bullets commenced to sting and the grape and cannister to tear through the trees and the shells to shriek with a terrific roar, those drafted men fell on their bellies behind trees. [Laughter and applause.] That is the kind of men you get by the draft. Does anybody want to ask me another question? [Laughter.]

APPENDIX.

The following extracts are from a letter written by Mrs. Annie Riley Hale, of Tennessee, a high-class woman and student of sociology. She is the author of two well-read books—Rooseveltian Fact and Fable and Bull Moose Trails. It deals with the question of conscription in vigorous language:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This is one of the considerations that should give you pause in the enactment of the proposed militaristic legislation—the bills for universal military training and compulsory service and, last and worst, the so-called "Army draft" bill empowering the President to "select" all young men between the ages of 19 and 25, nolens volens, and send them to the European trenches or wherever he may elect.

The President has assured us that our motives in entering this war are of the purest brand; we seek no selfish or mercenary end; we wish only to chastise the Hohenzollerns, serve humanity, and realize a dream of universal democracy—the much-heralded, long-delayed "federation of the world." Mr. Chairman, although I am absolutely opposed to war as an outworn, barbarous, costly, and futile method of settling international disputes, hating it not so much for its cruelty and waste as the monstrous injustice in its central idea and for its dastardly cowardice—especially this last—I was so much in sympathy with the high purpose the President announced, my imagination was so caught by the glorified vision, that, even while I doubted, I put aside my misgivings and was reconciled to this particular war until I grasped the staggering fact that the President proposed to inaugurate his rainbow quest for "universal democracy" by crucifying all the democracy we have here at home.

He has seen fit to arraign the Kaiser for having plunged the German people into war without their consent and against their will. It seems to me he owes it to himself as well as to us to let his act stand the test of raising his armies by voluntary subscription; for thus only can it be determined whether or not he has not committed the Kaiser's blunder. It seems to me that he and you, gentlemen of the Congress, can not do less in common fairness and common decency than to abide the consequences of your war declaration and execute your decree of death in accordance with the principles of American constitutional liberty which my forefathers fought for and labored to secure to their posterity. When you conscript a man's liberty and force him to fight in a war which he thinks unnecessary and unjust you conscript his conscience as well. In the old days of religious persecution a man might save his life by keeping his mouth shut, but under your system of military persecution he can save neither his life nor his principles. And yet the Constitution, which you have sworn to uphold, guarantees to every citizen under its protection life, liberty, freedom of speech and press, and freedom of conscience—not the freedom of your conscience nor the President's conscience, but the citizen's conscience.

But whether this be true or not, gentlemen, the great charter of individual liberties under which this Government claims to be operating guarantees to them the free exercise of both mind and conscience and the free disposal of their lives. When you arbitrarily deprive them of this, you are in effect putting the felon's brand on the descendants of the men who founded this Nation and raised over it the standard of civil and religious liberty. For under this law a conscript officer, acting under the orders and within the discretion of the President—for, mark you, this vast power over the lives of thousands of American citizens is to be lodged solely in the hands of one man, without legislative check of any sort—can seize American youths who have committed no crime save that of being between the ages of 19 and 25, tear them from their mothers' arms, gag and bind them, and send them, like scourged galley slaves, into the European slaughter pen.

* * * * * * *

But they tell me if the volunteer recruiting should fail to raise the Army strength voted by Congress that you and the President would be humiliated before the world, as you would thus stand convicted of having plunged an unwilling people into war. While this is true, Mr. Chairman—and I should feel very sorry for the President and the Congress if they have been honestly misled in this matter—I think it better for the Congress and the President to be humiliated than for the Nation to suffer and thousands of innocent people to lose their lives; and I think if the President and the Congress are brave men they will not wish to save their pride at the Nation's expense. The President, in his war message, took occasion to differentiate between the rulers and the peoples of Germany and Russia; the President will not, I trust, think it treasonable in humbler citizens who are also able to differentiate between the people of the United States and the men who are in temporary control of their Government. Under our system this changes every four years; the best part of it—as I view it, though not wishing to flatter you, gentlemen—changes every two years. I think you can not afford, as honorable men and responsible agents of the people, to depart from the best American traditions or abandon the ancient rule of guidance in the prosecution of this war, let the result be what it may.

As you know, America has fought all of her wars with volunteer soldiers, resorting to compulsion only once in her history, and that the most critical stage of our national life.

Whenever wars can not be waged by volunteer fighters, they should not be waged at all; and when men are not free to choose the war or leave it, they are not living under a free government. It is bad enough, from my viewpoint, for some men to put their quarrel into other men's hearts and per suade them to do their fighting—which is the quintessence of all modern wars; but when you force other men to fight your battles—such as is proposed in this "Army draft" bill—then you have put the American Republic in the same category with the bloody despotisms of Europe, and only the most pharisaical self-delusion could suggest that we as a Nation have any great democratic message for those governments.

No; gentlemen of the Congress, if you must do this thing, don't add blasphemy to the crime of stabbing American constitutional liberty; don't do it in the name of democracy!

I shall wear my D. A. R. badge and the American tricolor until you pass this bill, if you do; and then I shall lay them sadly away to await the dawn of a fairer, saner day; and if it never comes, I will leave them there with my other sacred relics; but I shall date the downfall of my country from the passage of this militaristic legislation.

For "upon the outcome of the great debate on 'Conscription against Democracy,' depends the question of whether the last fortress of democracy in the world, and the greatest adventure in human history, shall go down in failure."

MRS. ANNIE RILEY HALE.

LETTER FROM A REPRESENTATIVE CITIZEN.

I have received hundreds of letters from parties living outside my congressional district touching this vital matter. I submit only one, which represents the sentiment of all, from Mr. J. C. Madden, a prominent citizen of Continental, Ohio:

CONTINENTAL, OHIO, April 24, 1917.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I thought that I would write you on the matter of this conscription law which they are trying to force through Congress. Now, in Toledo, a few days ago 24 volunteers applied for admission to the Army; of this number 4 were passed and 20 declined. Now this shows that either our military men are declining our volunteers purposely to try to make out that our volunteer system is a failure or that our Nation is so dilapidated and run down that we could not fight any nation, even Mexico. For if this is a square deal on passing men, then we can't raise 3,000,000 men, to save us, that is fit for military service. So either they are not honest or they don't know what they should know to run our military affairs, for if we are such a Nation of weaklings they should have gone to the President and Congress and told them confidentially that we can't fight anybody, for we are too much of a Nation of weaklings. My opinion is that they are purposely declining the volunteers for the purpose of discrediting the volunteer system.

The men who were in the Civil War have always told me that one volunteer was worth three or four drafted men anyway. Now, on the basis of Toledo having 24 volunteers a day, and on a reasonable basis at least 50 per cent should pass, that would raise 500,000 volunteers in less than 90 days. Then Roosevelt wants to raise an army of volunteers, and they don't appear to want him to do that. Now, I don't know what the folks down in Congress think about it, but 9 out of every 10 about here, regardless of politics, think that there is too much politics in that move. Now, they claim that we are in this war to destroy Prussian militarism. Now, if that is the case, what profit to us if in doing that we saddle a military despotism on this country? It seems to me that we will be like the Bible says, "What will it profit us if we free the whole world and lose our own liberty in doing it?" Do you know that Canada has raised 400,000 troops and never had conscription and even don't have it now? And on the same basis we could raise 4,000,000 volunteers. If the men at the head of affairs could disguise themselves and would get out with the common people so as to learn what they think the way they are conducting affairs, they might handle things different. I see that the newspapers are all denouncing Congress because Congress wants to have something to say as to how the war is conducted, and say that they are all traitors to the Government. Now what is the Government? Is it the few men at the head of affairs or is it the hundred million people? It is supposed to be the hundred million people, and we are each supposed to be the one hundred-millionth part of the Government. The newspapers say that in a republic that when they get into war everyone is to lay down his liberty and let the ones at the head of affairs run things any way they see fit without asking any questions. Now, if this is the case, what is the difference between us and the most absolute despotism?

Another thing that they want to consider, and that is that there are three parts of an army—the part at the front, the part making war material, and the part raising food—and that the last of the three is the most important and that the failure of the last of the three loses more wars than anything else. In my opinion if the war lasts a year, the whole world will be starving, even if a few people are trying to raise back-yard gardens, for the world is so much shorter of supplies than what the average man thinks. Right around here in this good farming country, being one of the finest corn countries, two-thirds of the farmers are putting in their crops and not feeding their horses any grain on account of the shortage, as in the first place it is not to oe had if they have the money, and in the next place the farmers don't have the money. I will close, hoping that you may give the desperate situation in which the world is due consideration.

Yours, truly.

J. C. MADDEN.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD certain correspondence between William Allen Butler, president of the Lawyers' Club, of New York City, and Hon. W. E. Cox, Representative in Congress from Indiana. I have consulted the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and he has no objection. I ask unanimous consent that this correspondence be extended in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The correspondence is as follows:

THE LAWYERS' CLUB,
New York City, April 19, 1917.

Hon. W. E. COX,
Member United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The war committee of the Lawyers' Club desires to record its belief emphatically and insistently that the institution of universal, obligatory military training and service under Federal control in the United States of all the male citizens of the country should be established at the earliest practicable moment.

This should be done not only as a measure of national safety but also for the sake of its benefit physically, mentally, and morally to the recipients thereof.

That an act embodying the measures suggested by the Chamberlain bill or that of the War Staff, or such inclusions or modifications thereof as may be found wisest of adoption, should receive the serious and early consideration of Congress, and that pending such action a selective conscription measure along the lines urged by the President should be passed and put into application without delay.

Very truly, yours,

WM. ALLEN BUTLER, President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, April 22, 1917.

Mr. WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER,
115 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR MR. BUTLER: I have your letter asking me to support compulsory draft conscription. Won't you be kind enough to tell me why it is, especially as New York is lagging far behind other States in its volunteers, that you have not enlisted, or your boys enlisted, or at least why your wife's relatives have not enlisted? Or why have not your fellow lawyers enlisted or their sons, or if you have enlisted, or any of your people, or you know of any of your fellow lawyers or their boys who have enlisted won't you kindly give me the date of their enlistment, together with their names and addresses?

I shall await your answer with a great deal of anxiety.

Respectfully,

W. E. COX.

54 WALL STREET,
New York, April 25, 1917.

Hon. W. E. COX,
Representative, Third District of Indiana,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COX: In answer to your letter of April 22 in which you ask me to tell you why it is that New York is lagging far behind other States in its volunteers and ask me whether I, or my boys, or wife's relatives and have enlisted and asking their names, as to myself, having been interested in the events of 1861, I am a trifle beyond the enlistment age. I have to say that my son, Dr. Charles T. Butler, has just spent seven months as a surgeon in the American Red Cross in the French hospital at Ris-Orangis, France; that my son Lyman C. Butler is an officer in the Seventh Regiment and has been connected with that regiment for upward of six years, having reenlisted June 1916, served in Texas, and he is now a member of the organization. My brother's son, Dr. Ethan Flagg Butler, in the early part of the European war took two United States Red Cross units to Servia and was in charge of a hospital there and did splendid service in fighting the typhus fever, two of his associate doctors contracting the disease and died. My sister's son, Sam Paul, for six months drove an American ambulance on the Verdun firing line in France. My nephews, William Paul and Henry Franklin Butler, enlisted this spring in the Naval Reserve and are now in active service on the coast. My niece, Mary Paul, has taken a course as trained nurse for the Reserve Corps. My daughter, Louise T. Butler, has taken trained attendant courses and is a member of the Presbyterian Hospital signed up for the reserve services. My nephew, Charles M. Butler, is a lieutenant of the Officers' Reserve Corps and goes into service at Plattsburg next week. My nephew, John Crosby Butler, is in the First New York Armored Motor Car Battery. Now, passing to my wife's relatives, outside of her sons and daughter above mentioned she has two nephews, Czaykowski by name in the French Army, now in the trenches. I am so busy as an officer of a very patriotic club with various relief measures that I have not the time to get the extended lists that you desire. I take pleasure in answering your letter so far as my own and my wife's family are concerned at once. I remain, my dear sir,

Very respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER,
President of the Lawyers' Club.

P. S.—I forgot to mention my son-in-law, Maitland Dwight, who is enrolled in the College Men's Training Corps, drilling at Governors Island and attending military lectures.

W. A. B.

Mr. DENT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to make an argument covering the details of this bill, but if I can have your attention I will give you some of the reasons why the Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill as it is. They may be of some service in reaching a correct conclusion, in view of the arguments that are made here in support of conscription.

In the beginning, I want to call attention to a telegram, which no doubt many of you have received, and which is typical of a great many that have been sent out.

The idea that a great many people have with reference to conscription, as to how it is going to operate, and the class of people that will be conscripted, will appear from this telegram, which, of course, is a false impression:

DEAR SIR: As organizer and executive of American Merchants Syndicate, composed of 12,000 real American merchants in every State, I implore you to vote for conscription—and let the loafers and unsympathetic, naturalized foreigners do their part.

Now, that is from a man who says he is representing 12,000 merchants, giving his reasons why we ought to vote for conscription and the necessity for it, to "Let the loafers and unsympathetic naturalized foreigners do their part." And yet we are told by those who advocate conscription that they expect to have an efficient army, and they expect to have men who will fight; and it seems they expect to get them by drafting the loafers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Please tell us where that telegram is from.

Mr. WISE. It is from Chicago. I have not finished reading it yet. I am giving you the first reason which this man gives, representing 12,000 merchants of America, and as the organizer and executive of the American Merchants' Syndicate. He asks you to let loafers and unsympathetic naturalized foreigners represent you in the trenches of Europe, standing side by side with the volunteers of England and Canada and Australia and every other even partially democratic nation, all of which are represented by volunteers, and where he wishes us to be represented by conscripted men composed of loafers and others who are not in sympathy with America. Do you think that would be very creditable to America?

That is not all of this telegram. What else does he say?

Allowing those not subject to conscription to volunteer, subject to acceptance if needed under arms more than industry, though ineligible for conscription—

In the name of God, telegraphing me to apply the law to a boy of 19 to 25 years old, and yet asking that the law shall not make it compulsory on him at any time, however desperate may be our situation in the future, to leave him out of conscription. His argument is, gentlemen: Do not conscript me for anything. Conscript the young man, the other fellow.

Though ineligible for conscription, I will volunteer for anything—after eligibles are conscripted.

When will he ever serve? Conscript the boys from 19 to 25; excuse me, but allow us to volunteer, which we will do when everybody else is conscripted. When will this man serve? He tells you—

I will volunteer for anything after eligibles are conscripted. Thousands and tens of thousands of real patriots anxious to go to the front. Await news that those who owe the same duty will be required to pay it along with the brave enthusiasts. Let the noncommissions of the Regulars become officers of the new men. Perdition to the green politician volunteer officer.

JOHN BASKERVILLE.

Thousands of real patriots anxious to go to the front! But these men say they will go. When? When you take the boys from 19 to 25 and put them in the trenches. The argument of those who advocate conscription is that every man owes a duty to his country, even his life. This man says, in effect, I will not give mine until you make everybody else give up his first. To illustrate his position, we owe a man money. I come up and say, "I will pay you when the other man pays you. If you do not make the loafer pay you up first, I will never pay you." [Applause.] And yet that is what the argument of many of these people who send these telegrams amounts to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman give the name of the sender of the telegram?

Mr. WISE. John Baskerville. Many Members no doubt have received similar messages. If Members could know the origin of this campaign that is being carried on for conscription and the real motives behind it all, one of which is illustrated by this telegram, and the other by interests that have been and are now seeking to establish compulsory military service in this country, they would hesitate before taking this step. The word is sent out all over this country: "Have your man wire Representative; get up a mass meeting; call chamber of commerce together; pass a resolution"; and so forth. It is done, often unthoughtedly, and we think the country is demanding it, and then we are advised to vote for a bill they never saw. They do not know what it contains, and would not vote for it themselves if they did. [Applause.]

Having said this, I now desire to discuss the bill more in detail. The question now before Congress is not one of raising an army, for every Member of this House is in favor of rendering all the aid possible and doing everything in his power to raise an army for the successful prosecution of the war. The real difference of opinion comes in the method that is to be employed; that is, whether an army shall be raised by conscription at the present time or whether there shall be given a chance to those to volunteer who so desire.

In the first place, it is argued by those who want conscription that it makes every man of military age bear his share of the burden. The fact that it does not do this is one of the reasons why I oppose conscription. It is impossible for me to understand, when the military age under existing law is from 18 to 45, how it compels every man to do his part to conscript only those men or boys between the ages of 19 and 25 years. By this plan about 15,000,000 of those subject to military duty are absolutely excused and exempted from doing any real military service. And that is not all; even out of this number between 19 and 25 which you propose to conscript it is to be done by selection. In other words, it is selective conscription—to select just such as they want and to excuse such others as they do not desire to take, giving to the War Department the power to arbitrarily select one man's son and excuse another's. This is not just, fair, nor equitable.

Again, another reason given as to why we should depart from our past methods—depart from the volunteer system and adopt conscription—is that under the volunteer system all the best and most patriotic citizens will go and the others will stay at home. Good men will go and volunteer, and good men—just as good as those who go—will not volunteer at the first call. Each man, with equal patriotism and love of country, will exercise his American privilege and, considering all his environments, decide for himself his duty. That is the American way—the democratic way. In other words, some with family ties and obligations to those dependent upon them will not feel that they ought to leave their home and country and go to Europe at this time, but that they ought to stay at home until the emergency is greater, while others who are not so situated will promptly volunteer and go. We all know this is true, however skillfully the contrary may be argued and presented.

I desire to call attention to another fact with reference to the contention that is usually made—that under the volunteer system the best will go and the industries will suffer; that is, under the present bill the department can decline—and, in fact, they can do so now—to receive and enlist any man in the Army under the volunteer system if it is absolutely necessary to retain him at home. One of the strongest reasons urged that we have selective conscription is that they can conscript such as they want and leave at home such as they desire to work in other industries. Anyone with any judgment at all or any knowledge of the situation knows that this can be done better under the volunteer system than under the method proposed by conscription. Under the conscription proposal they take them all into the Army and weed them out afterwards as they desire, whereas under the volunteer system every time a man enlists or makes application he gives his age, occupation, and so forth, and if he is urgently needed at home the enlisting officer could decline to receive his application and let him go back to his work. So there is no real merit in the contention that it is necessary to have conscription in order to select such as ought to go and leave such at home as ought to stay.

Again, it is argued that the volunteer system has always been a failure, has failed in England in the present war, and that it failed during the Civil War, and that in every case where it has ever been tried it has been a failure. These general declarations and assertions are carried all over the country by the newspapers until I am convinced that a great many people really think they are true. Why do not these people state the facts instead of stating general conclusions? If they did, it would become evident at once that there are no facts upon which to base this argument. Now, what are the facts? As to the present war, England, under the volunteer system, has over 5,000,000 of troops at the front; they have not a single conscript in their army. Canada has between four and five hundred thousand volunteers. Australia has raised between three and four hundred thousand volunteers. New Zealand has done equally as well, and Ireland. In fact, there is not a single conscript among the armies of the allies above mentioned now in the trenches of Europe. Yet the assertion is carried everywhere that the volunteer system has been a failure. Canada, Australia, and other countries have refused to adopt conscription, not because they were not willing to do their part, but for the good and sufficient reason that they did not propose, in fighting for democracy, to establish an autocracy in their own Government.

Now, what are the facts as to the Civil War? There were over 2,000,000 soldiers in the Union Army. There were only about 52,000 raised, toward the close of the war, by conscription. The real mistake that was made in that war was in adopting conscription at all, which is clearly shown by the following quotation. I quote the following from "Regimental losses in the American Civil War," by William F. Fox, lieutenant colonel, United States Volunteers, pages 532–533:

> Desertions were frequent among the drafted men, for their service was compulsory; but there were not many of this class in the ranks. The Union Army was essentially a Volunteer Army. True, a conscription act was enforced; but its provisions for exemption were so lenient that the number of drafted men actually held to service was only 52,068, a small number as compared with the total enlistment.

A distinguished Senator, who is familiar with the situation, recently in speaking in the Senate with reference to the value of the conscript in war, said:

> Mr. President, I want to make a further suggestion, if the Senator will permit me, and that is that conscription in our State toward the close of the war did not produce very desirable results. We sent one regiment from New Hampshire, of the members of which, I think it is safe to say, 90 per cent deserted before the close of the war, and, while the Government was under obligations to pay us $400,000 for recruiting and equipping that regiment, we have not had the audacity to seek a refund of the money that the State expended, because of the fact that those troops were so utterly worthless.

And the testimony before the committee will show that in enforcing the conscription act, thousands of soldiers had to be taken from the Army and sent back home to quell riots. Will anyone say this conscription was a success? And I call your attention to the fact that there are now pending before the Military Affairs Committee over 1,000 applications to have military records corrected, the records showing the soldier deserted, and there are hundreds every year. We are told that nearly all of them were conscripts. The volunteers did not desert. And my opinion is that if you have many "slackers" conscripted, you will have many desertions in this Army.

But you hear it argued here that you do not call for volunteers to pay taxes. Why not pass the hat around, they say? Let us examine this a little and see if you would be willing to apply the same rule in raising revenue as you propose to do in raising an army. The reason given here for selective conscription is that you will be able to take the man not engaged in some industry essential to carrying on the war, that he is not making ammunition, guns, food, and so forth, and because he is not you will take him, conscript his life, take all he has, for the benefit of the Government. Now, apply the same rule to money. Here is a man worth millions; he is not fighting; he is not using his money to aid in the war; he is not making use of his money in making munitions, guns, food, or in any way with it assisting the Army or the Government in carrying on the war. He is just buying bonds, lending his money for the interest, for his own selfish benefit. Another man, equally rich, is using every dollar he has in manufacturing ammunition, guns, food—everything essential to successful warfare. He is using all his money, and needs more. It will reduce to some extent, at least, the efficiency of his plant if he is heavily taxed. Now, if the rule or reasons are good for taking human life and liberty, why not conscript all this man's money who is using it only for his own interests, and excuse entirely the other? If you would do this, you would not be pressed for finances. But how many of you conscriptionists would stand for that? Do you place property above human life? Is a sheep worth more than a man? I do not believe in conscripting either, but if compelled to choose either I would decide in favor of life and liberty as against property.

Again you hear the argument that we want to get the "slackers." Will this bill get them? One of the reasons I oppose this plan to conscript is that it is so unfair, makes so many exemptions, and does not bear equally on all. How do they propose to manage it? The sheriff, say, of each county, and in large cities the mayor, will appoint a registrar in each voting precinct; a day is named for all between 19 and 25 to appear at the voting place and register; proclamation is issued to that effect by the governor or other authority. Now, do you suppose that the "slacker," as he is called, will voluntarily come up and register to go to Europe any quicker than he would volunteer? No; he will be sick, or away from home, or have some other excuse; and only the honest young man, willing to volunteer, will come. Oh, they say he will be put in the penitentiary. Do not you suppose that a man who has made up his mind not to go to the battle fields of Europe had rather serve his time in the penitentiary? He would be fed, clothed, and comfortably cared for, and still have his life. You may increase the population of the penitentiaries considerably, but you would not get many of them in the Army; and if you did, what good would they be as soldiers? And then, after they register, what is to be the process? They must stand a physical examination. The boy's father is rich, influential; he does not want his boy sent to Europe. The physician may be his friend. It would be very easy for him to find some physical trouble, and have him dismissed. If he does not, he can still apply to the courts and have the question tried as to whether his boy should be sent or excused. So you need not be deceived as to the class that will go under this selective conscription. It will be the poor, unfortunate devil that can not hurt the politician after he is sent. We need not fool ourselves about who will do the fighting and dying in this war. It will be the same old story. The helpless will be compelled to go; others excused.

When I hear all these arguments, and hear men proclaiming how fair and just this bill is and how equally it bears on all, and so forth, and then hear them talk about who is going to be excused, I think maybe it would be fair, for we would have no Army. Who are to be excused by this bill? Everybody over 25 years of age—that is, about 15,000,000 who are now subject to military duty—all ministers of the Gospel—that is a good many now, and the number will possibly be largely increased; all members of certain religious organizations whose creed is opposed to war. I imagine that the memberships may be largely increased of both preachers and churches if there are as many slackers as we hear there are in this country. And the conscriptionists say that the President, under other provisions of this bill, will excuse about as follows: All married men; all having dependents, whether married or single; all farmers; all railroad employees; all engaged in making war materials of any kind; and so forth. This kind of talk has gone about all over the country until the people who do not know any better believe it. If it is true, pray tell me who is going to fight? Where will there be any left to fight? The trouble is it is not true, and when you go to conscripting and the people realize that they have been deceived in this, that is when trouble and dissatisfaction will arise among our people and they will see the injustice of it. It is only another reason why I oppose this bill. I believe if there ever was a time when we needed the support and good will of every man and woman in this country it is now. When you go into the home of one man and compel his boy, maybe his only son, the boy around whose life all the hopes of his parents hang; they have sacrificed for him, the mother has deprived herself of some of the necessities of life to prepare him for a successful future; I say when you compel him to go to Europe to die in the trenches and leave his neighbor's son to stay at home, enjoy life, and earn good wages, they will not feel that their Government has been exactly fair to them. I say it is not. Yet this is selective conscription. But there are other bills coming, all based on the same principle.

Authority will be asked by the departments to regulate and control, as they see proper, the production, distribution, and price of all products. Under it any little clerk in the department can decide how much of any one thing you may plant, when you shall sell it, and what price you shall have for it. Also bills to authorize the taking over of all railroads, shipping, and to make regulations as to what shall be hauled, how and when. In fact, when these bills are all passed all the lives, property, and business of every kind will be placed in the hands of the different departments to do with as they please, and the people will be only pawns to be moved about as they may decide. Talk of fighting to establish democracy the world over and at the same time destroy it all here! When this proposed legislation is finished no despot on earth will have such dominion and power as will be in the centralized Government of the United States. No king, no czar, no emperor can approach it anywhere.

Let us not be deceived. When this war is ended there will still be kings, czars, and emperors, and we as a Nation will be much nearer a kingdom and an empire than ever before. Congress is surrendering its constitutional right to legislate; it is turning this function over, under all these bills, to the different departments to, by regulations, legislate. Under the stress of the moment we in effect are asked and urged to pass a general resolution to turn all legislative functions over to the President, with authority to set aside all statutes and by regulations to enact such others as the different departments see proper.

Those who are now urging conscription, I imagine, will soon change their cry. Other bills and powers are asked. It is amusing how all of the great daily newspapers clamored for conscription, urging that we stand by the administration, and so forth. Now a bill is proposed to merely establish a censorship over them—that is, prevent them from publishing information valuable to the common enemy—and they at once all raise the cry that it will undermine our liberties, destroy free institutions; that it is unconstitutional and destroys free speech. With them it is all right to conscript the life and liberty of the individual, but it is an awful thing to even say they must not talk too much. I place life above property or even above the right to publish some item of news that might add a few pennies to the paper.

On this question of conscription it might be interesting to quote from some of the English papers, to show how they view it.

Canada has plainly intimated its dissent from conscription, and, with the Irish example before us, we may conclude that the advance of force in the domain of military service has been definitely stayed within the British Empire. Those are good tidings—

Adds The Nation.

So long as our armies consist in the main of volunteers, they retain rights of citizenship, which the conscript has been forced to yield. We have no fear that when they return to civil life they will vote for placing on their own and their children's necks a burden which they cheerfully lifted when the appeal was made to them in an hour of special emergency and trial.

DURATION OF THE WAR ONLY.

Our statesmen have—

fair warning to regard the conscription they imposed without the mandate which Mr. Hughes was forced to seek as for the "duration of the war" only. They desire—we all desire—a closer union of the free British nations who compose the armed strength of the Empire. It is now clear that this union can not be founded on a form of forced imperial service. So long as our general aims commend themselves to the dominions, Australia, Canada, South Africa, and New Zealand will see us through. No thought of disloyalty or weakness resides in the bosoms whose fiber is fully as tough as our own. But, so far as imperial wars are concerned, it is clear that the dominions wish to retain their liberty.

Colonial democracy remains, and we shall never be able to force it a step further than it will go. Is it not time for us to ask what is happening to ours?

That is from a paper in England. Might we not well ask the same question—what is now happening to our democracy? Yea, to our Constitution? I presume I will be excused for referring to the Constitution here. But the impression seems to be not whether it is constitutional but whether the department wants it. However, just as a reminder, I will give a few quotations showing the views on this question of conscription of those whom we have been taught to believe were entitled to some consideration at least. They, however, are considered out of date now.

Senator Bayard, of Delaware, in discussing proposed draft legislation during the Civil War, said:

The bill obliterates the militia system, leaves the States powerless to resist Federal aggression, and destroys the constitutional check upon centralized power in the Executive. Was not the object to prevent abuse by a centralized power? The whole Government is based on a system of checks and balances. If Congress can obliterate the militia of the States, no check or balance remains. How can such a power be reconciled with the doctrine of the second article of the amendments that "a well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free State"? It is well understood that if this and other amendments had not been adopted the Constitution would never have been ratified. The provision that the States shall appoint the officers and discipline the militia and that the militia shall not be under the control of the President until in actual service must be stricken from the Constitution before Congress has power to authorize the President to conscript into a regular army of which he appoints the officers and over which he has absolute control. Without an abandonment of the power of legislation in violation of the Constitution, Congress can not delegate to the President the authority to raise and organize armies at will.

In this same discussion Senator SAULSBURY, of Delaware, said:

In the constitutional debates in the Federal convention and in the State conventions it was never pretended that Congress should have power to raise armies by conscription, but that the reliance for national defense should be upon the militia to be furnished by the States. The reason for the exemption of persons in the military service from the constitutional guarantee against prosecution for crime except on presentment or indictment was on the assumption that entrance into the military service should be purely voluntary. Enforced service deprives a man of that guaranteed right without waiver by the person concerned.

In 1814 Daniel Webster, in discussing this same question, spoke as follows:

Laws, sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad, like the fabled serpent's teeth they will spring up into armed men. A military force can not be raised in this manner but by means of a military force. If the administration has found that it can not form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it can not enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail, and having already thrown away our peace we may thereby throw away our Government.

But it is argued with much earnestness that experts have figured it out and say this is the thing we ought to do. I want to call your attention to the experts, and I do not do this for the purpose of criticizing the War Department, but to show by the plan of the experts as originally made that it is unnecessary to have conscription. Remember here are our experts that my friend from Georgia asked a question of some Member—he asked if you wanted a horse shod would you go to a blacksmith or a lawyer. That is answered easily—the blacksmith. But my friend, what would you do if you went to the blacksmith that you had been employing to shoe your horse for years and years—you had won every race; had never failed—and when you went there he prepared the horse's foot and when he went to nail the shoe on he turned it around, put the toe to the heel? Would you, because he was an expert, say go on and nail it on, without investigating, or would you want a good reason for it? Here we are confronted by the experts, who say things have changed, and we must turn this shoe around and nail it on the other way; and now because some of us want to investigate or change it just a little and follow the old and tried way, they say we are not patriots, we are cowards and guilty of treason.

Let us examine the experts' plan and see how unnecessary this is at this time. The General Staff or War College, after thorough consideration, decided that we ought to raise a million men; that was as many as we could equip and use in one year. This was to be done by increasing the Regular Army one increment, the National Guard one increment, and by conscripting 500,000 men. They asked for an appropriation for the same and submitted this plan to the committee. If I am wrong, any man who is voting for conscription can correct me. How many men did they want in their original plan? One million men, in round numbers, and a few over. Composed of what? The Regular Army and the National Guard and 500,000 drafted men. Now the plan was to take only one increment of the Regular Army and one of the National Guard, and then the other 500,000 drafted men. The committee, knowing that under the national-defense act passed June 3, 1916, the President in time of war had authority to increase the Regular Army and the National Guard not only one increment, as proposed, but all five increments, as therein provided, wanted to know what reason there was for not doing this. You have the Regular Army, and under the law you can take in all the increments and increase the National Guard to its full strength. Why not do this? The Secretary of War resubmitted this to the General Staff, and in one night's time they changed their former decision and the next day reported that the department had changed its plan, reconsidered that decision about one increment only, and was going to raise both Regular Army and National Guard to full war strength.

In submitting the plan they submitted the money required also—$3,000,000,000. That is in this bill, for a million soldiers, and they gave an itemized statement that it would take that much money. When they changed their plan, they did not change the amount. When they increase the National Guard and the Regular Army to full war strength, it produces a million men. All they had in the original plan will be raised by increasing the Regular Army and the National Guard to full war strength, the number that the War Department asked for. Now, that is the situation. Oh, they say they will not enlist, "We can not get the men." Let me read you something. Everybody knows that they have not encouraged enlistments anywhere. On yesterday Senator REED put in the RECORD replies from the adjutant generals of 15 or 20 States, in answer to a question he asked them about recruiting in the National Guard. Listen:

HARRISBURG, PA.

Telegram received. Returns not in showing recruits enlisted in Pennsylvania National Guard since declaration of war. Four regiments of Infantry now in United States service. All regiments now above minimum peace strength. Have not been authorized to recruit to war strength, but if so authorized can do so promptly, as many organizations have waiting lists to bring to war strength.

THOMAS J. STEWART,
Adjutant General.

ALBANY, N. Y.

Reference your telegram, about 3,000 recruits New York National Guard since declaration of war. Six regiments Infantry and one squadron of Cavalry in Federal service. Not all at maximum peace strength. State authorities have not authority to recruit for organizations in Federal service. War Department has not granted authority to recruit to war strength. Could promptly recruit at this time to war strength if we could get authority from War Department to do so. Withholding of this authority very discouraging and has bad effect on National Guard.

LOUIS W. STOTESBURY,
Adjutant General.

And that applies to all this list of States here, in reply to every telegram sent out, that they had already increased the National Guard to peace strength and can promptly increase it to war strength if the War Department will give them the chance, and yet they say they will not volunteer or enlist.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read in this connection, for I think it is important, the statement of the Secretary of War as to the National Guard, since that is the issue. Here is his statement made at the last hearing:

The National Guard was called out under circumstances more unfavorable than any military organization in this country ever encountered, and it did a service which was beyond criticism, and deserves no criticism at the hands of this country; and it came back from the border a better trained military force than we ever had in this country under any circumstances outside of the small Regular Army.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, the point I was making was this: You are appropriating for 1,000,000 men to be raised in the Regular Army and the National Guard. The National Guard has in every State recruited up to peace strength, and they say they can do it promptly to war strength. That would make 1,000,000 in the Regular Army and the National Guard, the number of men the War Department wanted and could equip. Why is it so important, then, to conscript now? It is not because they want these men, it is not because they want the 500,000 now, but it is only to establish the principle in this country of compulsory military service, which, when once on the statute books, will forever remain.

Many people in the country think that this is universal military training; they have this bill and universal military training confused. This is compulsory service and has nothing on the face of the earth to do with any bill that may be reported here in respect to the universal training of men. The Secretary of War expressly stated in the hearings, and it can be read to you, that he did not recommend universal training at this time, neither he nor the President.

The people are being deceived in another way; I will not say that it is deliberate, but they are deceived, because they believe—and I know from letters and telegrams that I get—that you are not going to take the farmer, for they think that he is going to be exempt. They do not believe that you are going to take the man who is employed in the munition factory, or the man that is employed in the mine or in the coal field; they believe that they are all to be exempted, and that only loafers and vagrants are to be conscripted. They think married men are going to be exempted. There is not a word in the bill that exempts any of them, and it is not the plan of the War Department to exempt them, and members of the committee know it.

They know that every man between the age limits, whether a farmer or a merchant or a lawyer, whether married or single, whether he be working in a munition factory or a cotton factory or anywhere else, is put into the box, and once his name is drawn he is not given an examination even at that time, or excused then, but he is taken into the Army, and the question as to whether or not he will be excused may be brought up later. That is what the Secretary of War said. When asked specifically about farm labor and other industries, he said that it will be after the crop is planted and after it is worked before they can get this plan in operation; and then here are his exact words:

If at the peak load of the harvest it becomes necessary to have men on the farms, and it seems desirable, we can furlough them back and let them gather the crop.

And then what will they do? Come on back into the Army and take their places again. That is what he said, and that is what they are going to do; and every married man and every other man whose name is put into the box and drawn will go into the Army, regardless of where he is employed or what he is doing. And yet the impression is carried all over this country that they are all exempt. Is it for the purpose of making this bill popular?

Take the preachers. I had a letter the other day from a preacher, and he said I was undemocratic and unpatriotic; and I wrote to him in reply and said that it was strange that the preachers were preaching every Sunday for war and urging the passage of the bill, and yet they were asking to be excused, and he replied:

Well, perhaps we are wrong about being exempted entirely. We would not mind being put in for some kinds of military service.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WISE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think that preachers ought to be exempted?

Mr. WISE. No; I do not. If you are going to conscript, conscript everybody. Show no special favors. Yet this bill is full of them.

Mr. BLACK. Neither do I.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WISE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman stated that a million men are all that are needed.

Mr. WISE. No; I did not state that. I stated that is what the War Department said they wanted.

Mr. HOWARD. If they said they wanted only a million men, that is all they needed or they would have asked for more. Why did you bring in a bill to give them a million and a half?

Mr. WISE. Because after the War Department changed its original plan and decided to increase the Regular Army and the National Guard to full strength, as authorized by law, which gave them a million men, the number originally deemed sufficient, they still wanted to conscript 500,000, and we decided to let them do it on the same terms of enlistment as the Regular Army and the National Guard. They wanted that number, and we gave it to them.

Mr. HOWARD. Why did you not bring in a straight volunteer proposition instead of this mongrel?

Mr. WISE. Why did not the War Department ask for one?

Mr. HOWARD. You brought in not what the War Department asked for.

Mr. WISE. Yes, we did.

Mr. HOWARD. You did not comply with their wishes.

Mr. WISE. Yes, we did; except that we applied the volunteer plan to every man who would come into either branch of the service, exactly alike, whether in the Regular Army or the National Guard or in the 500,000. We just simply said, "Let them come exactly alike; put them all on an equal footing," and what is wrong about that? That is all there is in this bill. That is what all this fuss is about. Just because the committee decided that the 500,000 should be recruited in exactly the same way as the department asked to fill up to war strength the Regular Army and the National Guard; that is, by volunteering first; afterwards, if the President decides it is necessary, by draft. What is wrong about that; why should anybody object to that?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman's colleague, asked the gentleman why the gentleman placed this draft-conscription feature in his bill at all and asks this House to vote for it.

Mr. WISE. I will answer the gentleman. If the gentleman does not believe in the volunteer system, why does he support on the floor of this House a bill to allow volunteers to fill up the ranks of the Regular Army and National Guard and then put in a provision afterwards to draft——

Mr. BORLAND. Answer my question.

Mr. WISE. I will tell you why—we believe, and every man in this House believes, we will raise all these soldiers by volunteers.

Mr. BORLAND. Why?

Mr. WISE. Oh, I will tell the gentleman if he will wait. But we say that if they do not, we will not leave this country in a position where it can not defend itself, and where it can not win this war. We say give volunteering a fair trial, and if you do not get the volunteers then we will go and conscript these men up to 40 years of age to fight, and make it impossible for any man to say that we did not make proper provision. Now, is that an answer? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. That is no answer at all. [Laughter.] If the gentleman had any confidence in his proposition, he would stand on his volunteer proposition.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman vote to strike out the draft proposition?

Mr. BORLAND. No; but I will vote to strike out the volunteer system.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, the gentleman will?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I will stand on one thing and not two things.

Mr. WISE. I will say to the gentleman if it were left to me I would not at this time place a stigma upon the patriotism of the people of this country by enacting any compulsory service. I do not believe in slavery, either military or industrial. [Applause.] I would have issued a call for volunteers the next day after war was declared, and you would have had now in the field more than 500,000 men. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. I would like to ask a question. If the volunteer system is so abhorrent to the gentleman from Missouri, why does he insist on the volunteer system for the National Guard and the Regular Army——

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, the gentleman is entirely mistaken with reference to the volunteer system——

Mr. KEARNS (continuing). And why does the gentleman object to it in this instance?

Mr. BORLAND. I object to it because we have already provided for a volunteer system and here the bill provides for another.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, it is insisted that having volunteers and conscripts together creates classes; the volunteer looks upon the conscript as a "slacker"—one compelled to serve. Have you ever thought, if that is true, of the position you are going to place our boys in when they go to the trenches of Europe? They will be placed along by the side of the great volunteer armies of England, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand; how, then will they be regarded? Will these volunteers of other nations look upon them as slackers, as slaves compelled to serve, and, therefore, inferior? You conscriptionists say so. How embarrassing, humiliating it will be to every true American to have his representative on the battle field so regarded. Would it not be a thousand times better to have an army of volunteers there, showing to the world that Americans do not have to be compelled to fight for democracy; that they are ready, as other Anglo-Saxon races are, to voluntarily give their lives for their country? In my judgment, if we adopt this conscription bill and send an army under it to Europe, it will be the one dark spot in our history that Americans of future generations will look back upon with sorrow and regret. Let us have a volunteer army to represent us, so that the real spirit of our country will be shown, that we, the one great democracy of the world, will not be the first to destroy democratic institutions, and be practically the only country represented by a conscript army in this great conflict; that we will not, in setting up democracy in the world, for which we are now fighting, destroy democracy at home.

I want an army of free men; not slaves. An American army, one representing American thought and sentiment, one representing American institutions and traditions, one showing to the world that democratic government is sufficient in time of war as well as peace, thereby showing to all nations that they should establish a republican form of government, where the people rule; that all government, in war or peace, should be by the consent of the governed. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman on that side if he desires to use some time now?

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE]. I have listened to arguments from that side of the question attentively for several days, and when boiled down to their essence it seems to me that the issue here is not the plan proposed by the President, the War College, and the General Staff or the plan proposed by the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, but whether or not the War Department ought to be abolished. Every gentleman who has spoken in favor of the volunteer system has felt it incumbent upon himself to attack the War Department and declare its inefficiency, a department of the Government which of necessity must lead our boys on the battle front. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I have taken no referendum of the people of my district as to the relative merits of the volunteer and selective draft systems of raising an army of 500,000 men, proposed to be raised in the pending bills, both majority and minority. I have had practically no indications in the way of letters or telegrams from the people I represent as to their feelings. I am sure they are not indifferent to it, and I take their silence to indicate that they continue to trust my conscience and judgment, as they have always done, to do the wise and right thing in the light of the opinion and facts which I, as their Representative in Congress, should have in larger abundance than they can possibly have. My friends, this is not a time when men can afford, as patriots and statesmen undertaking to do their best for their country, to try to ascertain what the feeling at home is.

We are a representative Government. We are not a pure democracy, as is so often thought. Two hundred thousand people in the district which I have the honor to represent have commissioned me for 15 long years to be their spokesman on the floor of this House. I have undertaken to be their spokesman, to be their conscience, their judgment, and their patriotism. I believe when I stand here to-day throwing my voice and my influence in behalf of the plan proposed by the President of the United States for raising this army, I am speaking their judgment and their conscience. [Applause.]

A representative Government; our Government! Mr. Chairman, if there was ever a time in the history of Congress when Members in their actions should be thoughtless of self, that time is now. My political life is of small concern to the future of this Republic. I might die and pass over the river and rest under the shade of the trees, and to-morrow there would not be a ripple on the water. That is unimportant, but my country's future is all important. I would sacrifice my political future willingly a thousand times in helping formulate wise policies for the successful conduct of this war, if to do so meant the saving of the life of one American boy who may be called to the colors.

Mr. Chairman, the country faces a grave situation. We are at war with the greatest and most autocratic power on earth. No prophet among us is wise enough to foretell the burden of blood, the sacrifice that this country may be called upon to give in the struggle ahead of us. We only know that in the end American resources and American valor will bring glorious victory to our standard. That is all we know. How long will it take? No one can say. When the end will come, no one can foresee. If Russia should collapse, if she should be forced into a separate peace, if Germany were able to transfer her forces now engaged on the eastern border to the Hindenberg line during the spring or summer, nothing save the power of this great country could stop her in her mad career in the direction of world dominancy.

Is there danger of that happening? Is there a possibility of Russia collapsing? We had as well face the fact. We had as well know what the future may have in store for us that we may prepare ourselves against the evil day. I read in the morning papers a statement from a gentleman before the National Press Club last night. He says this:

"There is more than a military possibility in any attempt the Germans may make to take Petrograd between now and September 1," said Stanley Washburn, newspaper correspondent, who has just returned from the Russian front, at the National Press Club last night.

"The United States must act at once to save Russia, for if Russia is allowed to slip out of the war this summer by making a separate peace, as she will probably be forced to do, even with a new rule by twelve most capable men, hampered by German intrigue, American soldiers will have to take the places of the Russian peasants in the struggle, and the United States will have to pay in the blood of thousands of its men just as the European nations are doing.

URGES 5,000,000.

"Let Germany know that America will be able to furnish 5,000,000 men in 1918, 1919, 1920, and the the war will be over in a year, and we will not have to send more than an expeditionary force to Europe," he said. "But if we raise a trifling Army of 500,000 to 1,000,000 men it is quite possible that the war will last at least three years, and we may lose a million on the west front alone.

"If Petrograd is taken the greatest munition and manufacturing base in Russia will be taken, the Russian fleet in the Baltic would be isolated, the lines of communication between England and Russia will be threatened, and the trans-Siberian Railroad will be given a terrific burden," he said.

WAR NOT TO BE SHORT.

"The Government must commence striking at the enemy with every means which is at its disposal—moral, financial, economic, and military," he added.

"The war is not going to end in a few months, regardless of what the current talk in America may be," he continued. "In England, Russia, and Roumania," he said, "the seeds of later disaster were sown in the belief among the people that the war was to be short."

This man speaking is a newspaper man who has been within the Russian lines and knows the situation. Can we afford in the face of testimony of that kind, testimony that has been repeated over and over again of the danger of a Russian collapse, not to prepare ourselves for it, for the tremendous undertaking that may be ahead of us? Suppose the Russian lines should collapse. Suppose there is truth in the statement that Russia proposes to fight a defensive fight only, what would it mean to us? It would mean a contest that would be drawn out probably four, five, or six years. It would mean the giving of billions in treasure and millions in American lives. Do not shut your eyes to the fact.

The sea supremacy of Great Britain alone would stand between us and actual territorial invasion from Germany.

The issues in this war are large, beyond the imagination of men. Civilization itself is at stake. American life itself is at stake. American institutions themselves are at stake. This is not a war of children. This is not a child-play game. This is a war that is going to tax the very best of the resources and the courage of the American people. And in laying the foundation upon which we shall stand or fall in this conflict we can not, we must not, fall into the errors and pitfalls which have cost our allies so much in money and in blood. We must profit by their experience. We must learn by their costly example; we must be guided by the soundest reason; we must look, much as you dislike to own the fact, to the naval and military experts of the Government, whose education and training, whose experience and whose duty it is to study these problems, for suggestion and advice in the matter of the method of the raising of our armies and conducting them on the field of battle. [Applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if I should offer one prayer to Congress this afternoon, it would be, "God deliver us from our own prejudices and preconceived ideas upon this proposition." If I should offer a prayer for my country this day, so pregnant with fate, it would be, "God deliver it from having its military and naval affairs in this war conducted by laymen and politicians." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to study the two propositions between which we must decide. I have read every line of testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs. I have followed this debate, the ablest I have heard in my experience in this body, closely and with great care. I have tried to find a difference in the two propositions upon which we divide, namely, whether the army which we are about to raise shall be raised as proposed by the majority of the committee, under a system of volunteering for a limited time and then by conscription if necessary, or whether it shall be raised in the very beginning by the selective-draft plan as proposed by the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the country, made so by the Constitution, and indorsed not only by the military experts of this Nation but by the military experts of every nation engaged in this horrible war. [Applause.]

This is the issue—the only issue about which we debate. Neither my conscience nor my judgment hesitates for a moment in pointing out my plain duty. I shall support the plan which has back of it the experience of the military experts and the unqualified support of one of the wisest and most far-seeing men who ever held the exalted position of President of the United States. [Applause.]

What is there about the plan proposed by the President, the conscription method of raising the army, that should call for this long-drawn out debate, this excitement, this bitter difference of opinion? Is there something in the word "conscription" that is abhorrent to the minds of the Representatives of the American people in this Congress? Does this word have a fatal meaning to those who support the volunteer system of raising an army? This can not be, Mr. Chairman, because the majority bill, supported by those who are clamoring for the volunteer system, recognizes the principle of conscription as a part of their plan if volunteering shall fail to raise the army. You can not get away from that. More than that, if the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to strike out certain sections of the committee bill and insert the conscription plan is carried, as it will undoubtedly be, you gentlemen who are favoring the volunteer system, in the end will be forced to the alternative either of accepting the conscription plan or voting against the bill to raise the army. Which are you going to do? There is no choice for you. You have either got to take conscription, if the amendment carries in the Committee of the Whole, or you must put yourself in the attitude of having voted for war and then refusing to raise an army with which to fight it.

The majority bill gives to the President, in the view of certain members of the Military Affairs Committee supporting the majority bill, the authority, in his discretion, to put into operation forthwith, immediately, the conscription plan of raising the Army. It is only a question of when he shall do it—now or when the volunteer system has broken down. That is all there is to it.

Is the opposition to the selective draft based upon the idea that such a plan is undemocratic, unrepublican, and un-American, as is alleged? That can not be, because is has been shown repeatedly in this debate that the plan has been used time and time again in the history of this country. It has been shown in this debate and in the debate in the Senate that Thomas Jefferson himself, the founder of democratic thought in this country, was in favor of some such plan as is proposed by the present administration.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I understand the gentleman says Jefferson advocated such a plan?

Mr. LEVER. I said it has been shown in debate on this floor, notably by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], representing Jefferson's old district, and in the Senate, that Mr. Jefferson had in mind the idea of universal military obligation.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does the gentleman identify universal military training with conscription?

Mr. LEVER. The underlying idea in conscription to my mind is that every American citizen who receives the blessings of our free institutions is under obligation at the call of his country to go to its flag in support of these institutions.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Just for a question.

Mr. PLATT. I wonder if my colleague did not hear Mr. WISE, of Georgia, say a while ago that this bill provided for the beginning of universal military training?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. He says he did not say that.

Mr. LEVER. I do not desire to yield to a colloquy between the gentlemen from New York.

Mr. Chairman, is the opposition to the administration plan based upon the thought that it is un-Southern? Is this the reason why we find some southern Members opposing it? This can not be, because the only southern government that ever existed, representing southern sentiment and southern hopes, enacted a conscript measure. This same southern statesmanship, brave and courageous, even idealistic in its patriotism, which for 60 years had been the dominating influence in the conduct of this Government, early in 1862, in the Confederate Congress, adopted the idea of conscription to meet the necessities of the situation. It was the same idea precisely as is contained in the plan proposed now by the President of the United States.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is it not a fact that the fortunes of the Confederacy began to wane right after the conscription?

Mr. LEVER. Surely; yes; and for this reason, if the gentleman from Kentucky will permit: Under the volunteer system the flower, the spirit, the patriotism of the South rushed to the colors at first. They were those who won the first battle of Manassas. I am not in favor of a system that is going to make the burden bearers of this country in the conduct of its wars a certain, selected highly impulsive patriotic class, while the slacker and the laggard and the sluggard stays behind. Not much.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Which of those two classes do you think makes better soldiers?

Mr. LANGLEY. He has already indicated that. He says the volunteers do.

Mr. LEVER. Of course. I concede the argument very frankly. But let me tell you, my friends, that there is very much more involved in war than the enormous loss of life or the spending of money and the loss of blood. It will take from three to five generations for those European countries engaged in this war to have their citizenship again reach the average which it had when this war began. I am not willing to send to the front the very best of our blood and our brain in order that they may bear the burdens of the country, while the man with much disloyalty in his heart, with no patriotic impulses, is permitted to stay at home and see his country suffer.

But, Mr. Chairman, is the opposition to this plan based upon the experience of the military officers of the Government? Is it due to the fact that the trained military experts of the Nation—men trained and educated at public expense—are against this plan suggested by the President?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield me a little more time?

Mr. OLNEY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LEVER. This can not be, because every military man in the country, the General Staff, the War College, the civilian head of the War Department, all without hesitation tell us—who are laymen, who are not trained fighting men, who can have no special reason for expertness in military affairs and methods—that the plan proposed here by the majority of the committee must prove a failure under the circumstances, and that the plan of raising the army by the conscription method is the only efficient plan upon which we can rely in this our great crisis.

Is the opposition to this plan based upon the experience of the warring nations of Europe? This can not be. Capt. Benson, of the English Army, before the Committee on Military Affairs, set out in detail the reasons why the conscription plan is the more practicable and sensible plan.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I am sorry I have only five minutes.

Mr. WISE. Do you not know that Capt. Benson testified in answer to a direct question that if England were in the same situation as the United States, to wit, if it had 22,000,000 men subject to military duty and wanted only 500,000 and were asked to adopt conscription, it would not? That is what he said.

Mr. LEVER. I know that Capt. Benson testified that the adoption of the volunteer system at the beginning of this war had cost the English people hundreds of thousands of lives and billions of treasure. [Applause.] I defy you or anyone to deny that proposition.

That is not all. Even in this morning's paper Lieut. Gen. Bridges, who is over here with the British mission, and who is a veteran of nine wars, is quoted as saying that the volunteer system had cost England thousands of her best lives, demoralized her whole industrial mobilization, and set the country back immeasurably in the prosecution of this war. That is what he says.

Lord Northcliffe, the great English newspaper man, who probably has done more than any other man in England to prepare his country for the awful sacrifices it is now making and to direct it away from the pitfalls and follies of sentimentalism, is reported as saying:

> In the vibrant days of the summer and autumn of 1914, in the first rush of patriotic volunteers, resulting in the greatest volunteer force ever raised in the world's history, all manner of important matters broke down—most notably, perhaps, that of the medical examination of recruits.

Even in the morning papers Lieut. Gen. Bridges, veteran of nine wars, and the first British officer to meet the Germans, is reported as saying:

> The volunteer system had cost England thousands of her best lives, demoralized her whole industrial mobilization, and set the country back immeasurably in the prosecution of the war.

This is the kind of testimony the experience of Europe brings us.

Shall we shut our eyes to it? Shall we refuse to heed such warnings because of the sentiment found in the expression "Let the boys volunteer"? I can not think so. War is a terrible thing, and this is the most terrible war of history.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina five minutes more.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, we must start right, or the blood of our boys who die in the trenches or in the training camps because of our mistakes, because of our refusal to heed the teachings of experience and wisdom will be upon our heads. Let us not deceive ourselves. The talked-of responsibility of a Member of Congress is at this hour really upon him. The American people have never failed to measure up to any responsibility, and I believe this Congress to be truly representative of the very best capacity and patriotism of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I intend to support the conscription plan for raising our Army, because, in addition to the reasons already indicated, I believe every citizen of military age owes this country military service in its hour of peril.

Mr. GORDON. Why do you not include ages above 25 years then?

Mr. LEVER. I am perfectly willing. Why didn't you do it?

Mr. GORDON. I did, sir.

Mr. LEVER. Then I am with you. We have no quarrel.

Mr. GORDON. The War Department did not, though.

Mr. LEVER. I am not with the War Department on that.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, well, I thought you were.

Mr. LEVER. I am unwilling that the high-spirited, patriotic boys of my State and country shall be the sole burden bearers of defending its institutions. This duty should be borne by each alike. I am in favor of this plan because it places a duty on each alike, upon the rich and the poor alike, upon him in high place and him in low place alike, upon the farm boy and the son of the banker alike, upon the son of the humblest mill operative and the son of the owner of that mill alike.

I support it because it is the very essence of democracy, of fairness, of genuine Americanism, where in sovereign power and duty each is the equal of every other citizen.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country and their trusted leaders are thinking. They will not be deceived. I want to read in this connection and in this hearing a telegram received yesterday from a great South Carolinian, now enfeebled by age, but, thank God, undiminished in patriotism, a man who for 27 years has been a leader in the thought of the people of his State, and the Nation as well, a statesman and a seer. This telegram is addressed to me, from Trenton, S. C.:

TRENTON, S. C.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Washington, D. C.:

Before leaving Washington I was very much opposed to raising an army by conscription. I have changed my mind, and would vote for it now for these reasons: The volunteer system would demoralize business throughout the country and cause great loss to the people by the rise in price of commodities. The forceful men, who could least be spared from the walks of industry, would volunteer. England was forced to return many thousands of this kind of men to civil life after having spent much precious time and money to train them as soldiers. Conditions of war have changed since our civil conflict. Then conscript and convict were closely akin in the opinion of good people, whereas we now realize that the same democratic doctrine which gives every man a voice in the Government forces him to bear his just share of its military burdens. We can not afford to risk a failure of volunteers. The fact is we must come forward to resort to a draft at last. It would hearten Germany too much. Time is precious and we should get an army in training at the earliest possible moment. Please show this telegram to the other members of our delegation and urge them for me to stand as a unit behind the President's bill. I changed my mind after letting it be known that I was opposed to conscription, considering it more manly to acknowledge error than to stand by it. Hence, I telegraphed a friend in the Senate to announce how I would vote if I were present, and to so arrange my pair.

B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senator.

[Applause.]

The difference, Mr. Chairman, between the majority bill and the administration proposal does not constitute a difference in principle, but only a difference in policy or method. Bear that in mind.

Mr. Chairman, one other thought and I am through: To my mind we are dealing to-day not so much with a legislative enactment as with a psychological situation. We are called upon to raise an army. This we must and will do. The President of the United States, his Cabinet, and advisers have called upon us to raise it in a certain way. That the way proposed is the best way, in my way of thinking, has ceased to be the vital question. The German Kaiser is supposed to rule by Divine right. The German people have been taught for generations to believe this. They look upon him as the responsible head of the Government; yea, even as the Government itself. They do not and can not have any conception of the ideas which underlie our system of government. In their mind the President of the United States bears the same relationship to the American citizen that the German Kaiser bears to the German individual. In their conception of this relationship they feel that when the Kaiser goes down the Government goes down; when the Kaiser suffers defeat the Government suffers defeat. They can not see things as we see them. The German press, the German writers and publicists, and German statesmanship for the past 12 months have combined in a campaign of undertaking to teach the German people the thought that they need have no fear of America, because the German sentiment in America would stand as a safeguard to them and as a barrier against danger from us. No man denies that they have attempted to create this idea among the German people. I have no doubt that the German press this morning—because yesterday was a field day here—have chronicled in black type the progress of this debate. I have no doubt that the German soldiers in the trenches are being told by their officers, and by leaflets distributed among them, that the American President is about to be defeated by the American Congress in his effort to raise an army.

Suppose the German press to-morrow morning should carry in great headlines the statement, "The American Congress repudiates President Wilson's plan for raising an army. The President suffers crushing defeat," and so on; what would be the effect, gentlemen of the committee, upon the German mind? How much would it hearten them? How much encouragement would it give them to continue the desperate and bloody struggle? How long would it prolong this war? We can not shut our eyes to the effect of such an announcement to the German people. We can not afford to underestimate the power of psychology in any situation. How many American boys will have to die in the trenches across the water because we refuse to recognize that? Reverse the situation and let our newspapers to-morrow morning carry with appropriate headlines the statement that the German Reichstag has refused to follow the suggestion of the Kaiser, indorsed by his ministry and his military advisers, Von Hindenburg, Von Tirpitz, and others, in a matter of vital concern to the German military establishment, and what would be our feeling of rejoicing because of these glad tidings? We would not hesitate to reach the conclusion that the German autocracy was breaking and that peace, blessed peace, peace for all the ages, was near at hand. [Applause.]

The German people are no less sensible and impressionable than are we. To defeat the President's plan under circumstances like these will be to prolong this war from three to six months; it would mean, I fear, the sending of thousands of additional men, American men, into the trenches.

In almost unanimously adopting the war resolution, in unanimously passing the $7,000,000,000 appropriation for the conduct of the war we have shown a spirit of American unanimity which must bring small comfort to our enemies. We have put our hands to the plow. To turn back would be fatal; to hesitate, to quibble, to split hairs on technical differences, to refuse to go forward for sentimental or traditional reasons, to fail to measure up to the high courage required by the occasion and the issue, would be almost as fatal. We must show a solid front.

If my future is to be sacrificed because I stand for what I conceive to be my duty in the interest of American manhood and womanhood, then I tender that future as a willing sacrifice upon the altar of my country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am proud to-day to be a Member of this House of Representatives. I have never known the House of Representatives when I believed so many of them were determined to vote as they thought right, and to vote without regard to political consequences to themselves. [Applause.] I never heard a better debate than I have listened to in the last three days. I never heard fairer arguments, I never heard truer eloquence, I never heard more sincerity nor sounder reasoning, than I have listened to in this debate. It makes me very proud to be able to say that I think that the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress, no matter which side of this question they have taken, have risen superbly to the occasion. [Applause.]

I have always spoken in favor of universal military training, but I have generally said that I did not approve of that particular part of the plan which requires compulsory military service in time of war. Possibly my attitude at this time may be regarded as inconsistent with the doctrine which I have heretofore preached. I do not think my attitude inconsistent, but even if it is so I do not much care, and I doubt whether it is going to keep anybody awake at night whether I am consistent or inconsistent. A practical situation confronts us and a counsel of perfection is not very practical at the present time.

I am going to start by admitting the soundness of certain positions assumed by my opponents. Of course, I know that, other things being equal, an army of 500,000 volunteers is better than an army of 500,000 conscripts. [Applause.] That goes without saying, assuming that they are of the same age and equally well trained. That is incontrovertible. Every man knows in his own breast that in any given situation he himself would fight better if he felt that he was a volunteer than he would if he were forced to engage in battle whether he wished to do so or not. That is agreed, to begin with.

Now, for another premise. Here is a doctrine which I lay down as basic. I have no common ground for argument with anyone who does not agree to it. I regard it as a fundamental principle that we should adopt every measure which will bring this war as speedily as possible to a victorious ending and that we should put aside every measure which will in any way delay or render less certain that victory. Therefore, to my mind, it is only a secondary consideration whether or not we impose a stigma on some of our citizens. If that stigma is an incident to the most speedy plan for raising an efficient army, then the public welfare demands that that stigma must be borne. In this emergency the test of every measure must be its military effect.

This bill provides an opportunity for six or seven hundred thousand men to volunteer in the Regular Army and in the National Guard. Personally, I do not think we shall get much volunteering for the Regular Army or the National Guard so long as we continue to pay our privates only half as much as our next-door neighbor, Canada, pays her privates.

Possibly the immediate effect of this measure may be to increase enlistment in the National Guard, and for this reason: Many a young man, finding himself likely to be conscripted, may say, "I will anticipate that event rather than take the chance of having my name drawn in the lottery." Therefore I expect that a good many young men, after the passage of this act, will enlist in the National Guard. I am sorry to say so, because I do not believe that the National Guard is a solid foundation for an army fit for the business which we have in hand. There is altogether too much deadwood among the officers of the National Guard.

Now, let us see just where my position differs from the position of those of you who oppose the administration's program. I say, "Let us have conscription right away." You say, "Let us have conscription only in case voluntary enlistment shall first have proved a failure; let us try the volunteer plan for a while."

I admit that hitherto there has been no fair chance for voluntary enlistment. Of course there has not. No man who enlists to-day knows whether he is mortgaging his future for a long period of years or only for the duration of the war. No man as yet knows just what Uncle Sam wants of him. I grant all that. Yet it is the duty of every Representative in this body to say to himself, "Do you in your heart believe that the situation as to voluntary enlistment would be much more satisfactory to-day if every young man in the Nation knew exactly the conditions under which he might enlist and if the President had issued a call for volunteers?" I for one do not think that, under any circumstances, volunteers would be crowding forward. I believe that this country has not yet awakened to the requisite pitch of enthusiasm about this war. The war is being fought for an ideal. As the gentleman from Kentucky said yesterday, it is a holy war; and everyone knows that mere holiness does not, in the first instance, arouse enthusiasm in our breasts. We are fighting for a principle of government, for democracy against autocracy; but abstract principles at first seem a long way off to the man in the street, while the machine gun seems formidably near. But let the rank and file once get through their heads the principle for which we have gone to war, and they will outstrip their leaders in fidelity to that principle.

So, then, I admit that we are fighting a war in which the people's enthusiasm has not yet been awakened, and that is why I believe we should not depend upon volunteers.

You say that in 1914 and 1915 there were plenty of volunteers in Great Britain. That is true, but the situation was very different. The enemy was near at hand and imminently menacing. But far more cardinal than that circumstance, there was a moral issue which every Briton could understand. That Germany could possibly injure him he would not concede; that the future of Great Britain was bound up in the inviolability of the rights of small nations he did not understand and probably did not admit; but that his government had made a promise and that promise must be kept was as plain as daylight to the Briton in the street. He knew that without protest from him his government had agreed with France and Russia that the three nations should stand shoulder to shoulder against an attack on any one of them. He knew that his country had promised to protect Belgium. So John Bull became Thomas Atkins and went to war to keep his promise like a gentleman. In Great Britain the appeal was simple and obvious; with us the appeal is instinctive and idealistic.

Let us see if we can not get the issue framed between us. I have admitted that your volunteer army, if you can get it promptly, would be a better army. If you knew that you could speedily raise a volunteer army of 500,000 young men, and if you knew that you could follow it in a few months with another army of 500,000 volunteers, your position would be strong; but even if you honestly believe that you can raise those two armies, yet in the nature of things you can not know it and so your course would project even more uncertainty into our warfare. Nowadays, in order to prepare in advance for each move and each campaign, generals must long beforehand know to a certainty what troops they can count on. In modern warfare you must not guess that you can get your men, you must know that you can get your men; you must know when you can get your men, where you can get your men, and how you can get your men, the ages of those men and their qualifications; otherwise you are not prepared to make modern warfare. Without masses of trained young men in the land, you can not possibly on a volunteer basis be sure of getting the troops which you need.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has taken into account in his estimating the value of those two groups of 500,000 each the fact that if raised by volunteers we would have a lot of untrained officers, if raised in the usual way—a lot of officers who know nothing whatever about military matters—whereas if raised by the other plan they would have knowledge?

Mr. GARDNER. For the present I shall not take up the question of officers, because I am anxious to pursue my comparison between the two different ways in which it is suggested that the men should be raised.

The Dent bill, which we are considering, provides that all the young men in the country shall be enrolled, and that while enrollment is going on the volunteer system shall be given a trial. If successful, it is to be continued. If it fails, then conscription is to take its place. The Kahn amendment, which I am advocating, cuts out this volunteering feature, so far as the new army is concerned. Many of you believe that the Dent plan would not delay the organization of the new army a single day. I am going to take up that question of delay, but first I want to call your attention to the lamentable moral effect which the defeat of the administration's plan would entail. If the wide world finds that the President is defeated in his conscription program, do you not know that it will have a most depressing effect upon our allies and a most exhilarating effect upon our enemies? The President is the head of the war party in this country. That is why I follow him at present. If so early in the war you break down the plans of the President, your war party will not be able to act efficiently in conjunction with the other powers at war with Germany.

Now, suppose that we take a square look at this question of delay which I spoke of a minute ago. The enrollment will be complete inside of 30 days from the time this bill becomes a law. I understand that such was the estimate sent to Senator CHAMBERLAIN to-day by the Secretary of War. Suppose you go ahead upon your volunteer basis. Suppose the whole War Department turns to and prepares to raise volunteers in every village and town throughout the land. At the end of 30 days we shall scarcely have our recruiting stations open and our mass meetings arranged. If the President were to interpret the Dent bill exactly, he could then declare the volunteering plan a failure, and he could order immediate conscription. But he would not do so.

If we adopt the Dent bill as it stands and if we reject the Kahn amendment, the President will not discontinue the volunteering experiment in 30 days, even if the enrollment is complete and few volunteers in sight. On the contrary, the President will be bound to say, "I shall interpret this law according to the intent of Congress, and the intent of Congress was to give the volunteer plan a trial." Suppose, as I believe is inevitable, that you fail to attract your volunteers, what is going to happen? Pretty soon the President will say, "This has got to stop; this is a manifest failure," whereupon we shall find in my State and in your State companies half filled with volunteers; we shall find regiments half filled with volunteers; we shall find units of all sorts half filled with volunteers, and all of a sudden will come the order to stop volunteering and go upon the conscript basis, because volunteering is a failure. That means that those units will be half volunteer and half conscript. Can you imagine any more unhappy situation? That is what would happen if you were to start in on a basis of volunteering and if the volunteering proved to be a failure, as I believe would be the case.

Suppose you were a Frenchman in a Flanders trench and you heard that we had tried the volunteer system and that it had broken down. Would you not feel discouraged? Would you not say, "I do not know much about those Americans. The Russians are making us pretty uneasy and now it looks as if our new allies were not going to make good." Do you think that that sort of thing is likely to be conducive to a speedy termination of this war?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes and has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARDNER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the fact that England ordered conscription cause a destruction of the morale in the trenches of the English troops?

Mr. GARDNER. No; but the situation was entirely different. The British raised about 5,000,000 volunteers before they resorted to conscription.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, for information I would like to ask the gentleman how many conscripts the English had under their system?

Mr. GARDNER. I think the British conscripted about a million and a half men, according to the testimony. Of course, that figure includes those boys who have come of military age since the conscription law was passed.

Gentlemen fear that a stigma will attach to all young men who are conscripted. Even if that were the case, it would be a secondary consideration in this war. But I think the fear quite groundless. It is true that in our Civil War the men who were drafted in the North were but lightly regarded by the volunteers; but let us look into the history of the northern draft. It was instituted in 1863, when the patriotism of the North was at the lowest ebb, when the authorities permitted organizations to be formed to oppose at every step the law's execution, when governors seemed to vie with each other to defeat its purpose. The cream of northern youth had already been skimmed, and the result of the draft was a beggarly handful of culls. I am ready to admit that the northern draft was a failure. But not so with the South. I have here the report of Gen. John S. Preston, superintendent of conscription of the southern Confederacy. I find that the first conscription law was passed in April, 1862, and after that date no volunteer law was passed which applied to men of an age subject to conscription. The Confederate act of April 16, 1862, conscripted every man already in the Confederate Army. It conscripted them for three years, although the enlistments of 100,000 of them were on the point of expiring.

Besides the soldiers already in the army who were conscripted by the passage of the law 81,993 other men were enrolled and assigned to the army camps of instruction. Furthermore, there were, in addition, at least 76,206 men subject to conscription who anticipated the action of the Confederate military authorities by repairing direct to the southern army. By the way, Gen. Preston, in his report, expresses the opinion that this last figure is too low. So the Confederate Army, as a result of conscription, secured over 150,000 men, although it is fair to suppose that many of those who repaired direct to the army would have done so as volunteers, any way. Now, did any of you ever hear any criticism of any of those men because they were conscripts? Did you ever hear that a stigma was cast on them by anyone in or out of the Confederacy. Most people either never knew or else have totally forgotten that the South adopted conscription. Certainly no one ever heard of any stigma.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman approve of the exemptions made in the conscription bill of the Confederate States?

Mr. GARDNER. No; I do not.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman approve of the exemption of all newspaper editors?

Mr. GARDNER. No; I do not believe in that kind of exemption, and I object to the substitute system. I believe that Secretary Seddon estimated the number of southern substitutes at 50,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. I recall the gentleman to the fact that the first conscription law passed by the Confederacy contained no exemptions at all.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield? The law was passed in April, and when they began to conscript them they tried to secure exemptions, and in October, 1862, the newspaper editors got these exemptions——

Mr. GARDNER. I would rather make my own speech. [Laughter.] The original conscription act did not contain the provisions for exemptions. They were specified in a separate act passed five or six days later. A good many people have said lately that it was not conscription which enabled the South to fight so long. I am going to read from a letter written by Jefferson Davis, President of the Southern Confederacy, to the governor of Georgia, Joseph E. Brown. Gov. Brown fought the conscription law, partly on constitutional grounds and partly on grounds of public policy. President Davis's letter can be found in "The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government." It is dated May 29, 1862, and runs, in part, as follows:

I would have very little difficulty in establishing to your entire satisfaction that the passage of the law was not only necessary but that it was absolutely indispensable; that numerous regiments of 12 months' men were on the eve of being disbanded, whose places could not be supplied by raw levies in the face of superior numbers of the foe, without entailing the most disastrous results; that the position of our armies was so critical as to fill the bosom of every patriot with the liveliest apprehension; and that the provisions of this law were effective in warding off a pressing danger. But I prefer to answer your objection on other and broader grounds.

Now, I want to read this:

On July 17, 1862, the Confederate Secretary of War wrote a confidential letter to the governors of the Confederate States, which opens with the following language:

"Our armies are so much weakened by desertions and by the absence of officers and men without leave that we are unable to reap the fruits of our victories and to invade the territory of the enemy."

This letter was written after the defeat of McClellan in the Peninsular campaign. The full text may be found in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, series 4, volume 2, page 7.

So we see that conscription in the Confederacy carried no stigma.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that with all of the talk that we have had for several days this whole matter when brought down to its last analysis involves only two questions, one a very important question; the other, I think, not so important. The administration bill, or the bill of the War Department, as I understand it, provides for a volunteer system to fill up the Regular Army and to fill up the National Guard to war strength. If this should prove a failure in those two branches of the service, then conscription is to be resorted to. The bill reported by the majority of the committee also provides for volunteer service to fill up the Regular Army and to fill up the National Guard to war strength, and if that shall prove a failure, then resort is to be had to conscription.

So thus far the two propositions are identical. It is only when we come to raising the additional army of 500,000, or perhaps a million, of men that a difference of opinion arises.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me as an ordinary layman, with no military experience and no military knowledge, that if a system is good for the purpose of raising about 150,000 men to bring the Regular Army to its war strength and for raising about 500,000 men to bring the National Guard to its war strength, it ought to be good enough to raise an additional army of 500,000 or 1,000,000 men for the purposes of this war. I can not understand the reason which prompts gentlemen to insist that the volunteer system is right to raise 650,000 men for the Regular Army and the National Guard, but is all wrong when you come to raise 500,000 men for an additional army.

But there is a reason for that in the Army bill—and it is the Army bill. The reason is, or the purpose is, to make volunteering obnoxious to the people of this country. They know that men will not volunteer to go into the Regular Army. They know that a large proportion of our citizenship will not volunteer to go into the National Guard. It means practically seven years of service. The men of America are willing and anxious to volunteer to go into the Army to fight this war, but they are not willing to tie themselves up for seven years of service in the Regular Army or the National Guard.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Is the gentleman informed that more than two weeks ago orders were issued by the Secretary of War to give to all the recruiting officers, that all enlistments since the beginning of the war would be for the term of the war?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not understand how they can issue an order of that character when the law is otherwise.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will state to the gentleman that that is the order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It may be the order, but as I understand the law to-day, when you enlist in the Regular Army you enlist for three years, and then you go out into civil life, but you can be recalled into the service at any time during four years. That is the law as I understand it, and it makes no difference what orders they may issue such orders can not change the law. The gentlemen say, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has been harping upon the proposition, that the volunteer system is having a fair test now, because men can volunteer in the Regular Army and in the National Guard, and they are not doing it as rapidly as they ought to do it. It has been asserted that the volunteer system is having a fair test now in that respect, and they say it is a failure because we are getting only about 1,000 men a day; but the fact remains that while men may be willing to volunteer to fight this war, they are unwilling to bind themselves to a humdrum existence in the Regular Army or in the National Guard for a period of seven years.

I hold in my hand a clipping taken from the Washington Post of this morning, and I want to read it to those gentlemen. It says:

FLOCK TO ENLIST UNDER ROOSEVELT—OF 123,000 APPLICANTS 60 PER CENT ARE FROM THE SOUTH.

NEW YORK, April 25.

Approximately 123,000 men have applied thus far and been found to meet the necessary requirements for membership in Col. Theodore Roosevelt's proposed army division, it was announced here to-night at enrollment headquarters, which were opened some time ago with the former President's approval.

One hundred and twenty-three thousand, one-fourth of the 500,000 desired, have already volunteered to go with Roosevelt to France. [Applause.] And yet these gentlemen tell us that the American spirit is dead and you have got to conscript your men to get them into the Army. "Conscript" sounds like "convict" to me, and it carries on its very face the stigma of disgrace.

Mr. DALE of New York. Has the gentleman from Florida any knowledge of the number of men who reside in the State of New York who have volunteered for this Roosevelt army, so called?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To the shame of the gentleman's State, I will say that this article says:

Only 50 of the applicants, it was said, were under 25 years old. None below this age are now being accepted.

Sixty per cent of the volunteers are from Virginia, North and South Carolina, and other Southern States, while in New York City not more than 1,000 have enrolled.

One thousand! I say it is to the shame of the gentleman's State.

Mr. DALE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question only.

Mr. DALE of New York. Is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind that when the real call comes it will not be well answered by the people of the State of New York?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. When it comes to the draft; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know whether the gentleman means by the "real call" conscription or volunteering. If it means volunteering, they have been given a chance now with Roosevelt.

Mr. DALE of New York. Either call.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And, say what you please about Roosevelt—I do not agree with him in his political ideas—but he is a red-blooded American and he is ready to go. [Applause.] And the solid Americans of this country will go with Roosevelt and other men of that character if volunteers are allowed to go.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the figures quoted by the gentleman, do you take into consideration the number of men in the National Guard of the State of New York?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am reading simply what the Washington Post, the great advocate of conscription, said.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In quoting the figures concerning men who have enlisted from the State of New York, please take into consideration the National Guard of the State of New York as well as the number of men they sent to the border, compared with those from other States.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg your pardon, but I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said here better than I can say it that every war that this country has ever been engaged in has been won by the volunteer soldiers of America. Take the War between the States. The Regular Army of the Union—the flower of the Regular Army—went down in Virginia to Bull Run to meet the undisciplined, untrained volunteers of the South. When they met them this Regular Army went flying back to Washington in wild confusion and disorder. And so it was all during that struggle. And the Union soldiery never began to touch the Confederate soldiers until the volunteers from Ohio and Illinois and Indiana and these other States went into the ranks. Your Regular Army did not feaze them.

And yet we are told that conscripts must fight our wars, and, as has been so well said, you are going to conscript, but you are going to release the farmer, you are going to release the mine worker, you are going to release any man working in an industrial enterprise. The man who is needed at home, the man who is doing something, is not going to the front. You are going to excuse them and send an army of loafers and ragamuffins and ne'er-do-wells to fight the battles of this country against the trained soldiers of Germany. The flower of the English Army and the flower of the French Army and of the Russian Army and of the Italian Army and all those nations have not been able to conquer the indomitable spirit of Germany yet. When it comes to America to take her stand and go into this great world struggle, instead of sending the brave, the noble, the true, the patriotic, you are going to send the loafer, the barroom bum, the tramp, those who do nothing and who are worth nothing, to fight your battles——

Mr. SIMS. And the knights of the pool room.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; as suggested by my friend from Tennessee, the knights of the pool room. My God, what a commentary upon America!

Oh, they say, the volunteer system is going to cause some one to sneer at somebody else. They contend that conscription will work more smoothly. They say there will be no trouble about it at all. Let me call your attention to an instance to-day: You will remember that the National Guard was on the border for nine months. There was a regiment from my State down there. They have been sent home. They have been disbanded. Those boys to-day are expecting the call every hour. What is the result? They can not get employment anywhere. Everywhere they go and apply for employment the prospective employer says, "I can not take you because you are liable to be called into the service to-morrow. I must have somebody that I can rely on, somebody who is going to stay here in my business." The result is that those boys are down there to-day without employment and depending upon their friends for support until they are called into the service again.

What will be the result if you adopt a conscription law? Every man in this country between the ages of 19 and 25 will be denied employment until it is determined whether he is to go into the service or not. Let him apply for employment where he pleases, and his prospective employer will say, "No; you are of military age; you are under the ban of this conscript act. You are liable to be called into the service any day. I have got to have men upon whom I can reply, who will stay with me, and therefore I can not give you employment." [Applause.]

This uncertainty will disorganize our economic system and leave the industries of this country at the mercy of some little military martinet who happens for the time being to be in charge of this merciless and conscienceless draft.

Mr. Chairman, the bill proposed by the War Department and advocated by the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs is the beginning of an era of militarism in this Republic which bodes no good for republican institutions. Let no man lull his conscience to sleep with the thought that this conscription plan is temporary and only intended for the period of the war with Germany. Once fastened upon our system of government it is there to stay for all time, and we might as well face this fact right here and now.

Mr. Chairman, I stated in the beginning of my remarks that one very important question was involved in this controversy, and I now desire briefly to refer to that important question. I sincerely and honestly believe that the further existence in this Republic of representative government itself depends upon the conclusion which Congress shall reach on this bill. If the views of the minority shall be adopted, then there will be no further need for a Congress. Why should we be here if our only function is to swallow each and every measure sent here by a department without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"? Has Congress lost its every sense of independence? Are we no longer the chosen Representatives of the people? Have we degenerated to mere legislative eunuchs? Are we simply rubber stamps in the hands of a bureaucrat? If these things be true no one should wonder that the House of Representatives has sunk to such a level that it no longer claims the respect of the average American citizen.

It has been said that "there was only one greater coward than a Member of Congress, and that was two Members of Congress." How long will we allow this thought to be prevalent in the public mind? How long, oh, how long before the American Congress will assert itself and rise to the summit occupied by this body in the old days?

We are told we must stand by the President. I want to stand by and act with the President. But if he is the honorable, brave, high-minded, and patriotic man I believe, yea, that I know him to be, he would despise me if he thought that I deliberately sacrificed my honest, conscientious convictions in an effort to curry favor with him. I voted for the war resolution. I voted for the issue of $7,000,000,000 of bonds and shall vote for each and every measure necessary to bring this war to a successful conclusion, but, so help me God, as long as I am a Member of this House I shall think and act as the chosen Representative of a free people, uninfluenced and unawed by any outside consideration.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I presume that no Member of Congress will question the patriotism of any other Member of Congress on the issue now pending. When the issue was submitted to this House to determine whether or not a state of war existed between the United States and Germany, every Member present, except 50, voted that a state of war did exist, and authorized the President of the United States to use all of the means necessary to bring this war to a quick and successful conclusion.

When the bill was before the House to take from the assets of the country $7,000,000,000, the most stupendous sum ever voted by a legislative body in any one sitting in the history of the world, it passed this House without a single dissenting vote. So it does not lie in the mouth of any Member to question the motives of another.

I believe that every Member of Congress now desires to do that which he deems is the best for the country, and to raise the best and the quickest and most efficient army to fight the battles of the Union.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that I have no other motive and am moved by the highest sense of patriotism in every word that I utter and every vote that I cast.

The question is, Shall we have conscription or shall we have the volunteer system? The fight for conscription is being led by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who was born in Germany. It is natural that he should be for the conscript system. I do not blame him in the least. But it strikes me, gentlemen, that we are going far afield in a new and untried experiment.

This plan of the so-called selective draft has not been tried by any Nation in the history of the entire world.

GERMANY.

In Germany, where they have had universal military training for more than 40 years, no such system would be tolerated. It is entirely too Prussian for Prussia itself. Under the German system, which is universal in its application, when a call is made to colors every man of the age within the class is called to the colors without discrimination or selection.

FRANCE.

In France, where they have had military training, at the beginning of this war a general call was issued for volunteers, and every citizen able to bear arms was called to the front. Those who had had military training went immediately to the defense of their country, and all the others went immediately into training.

ENGLAND.

In England, where the people have been, as in America, opposed to large standing armies and large military establishments, where liberty is respected and freedom prevails, the English Parliament would not pass a conscription law of any sort, either general or selective, but the call was issued for volunteers, and more men enlisted than the army officers could take care of, and more enlisted than could be immediately trained. England was criticized because she did not instantly put an army into the field. The German Government was disposed to laugh at the English system, and did not believe that it would be effective, but under the volunteer system miracles apparently have since been wrought. The English people volunteered, were rapidly trained, and England soon began pouring troops into Europe, until to-day it is estimated that England has more than 5,000,000 soldiers on the battle lines of Europe, and there is not a single conscript in this vast English Army in Europe.

It is urged that England had to finally go to conscription. That is not the truth, that England had to go to conscription to get men, but it is true that the British Parliament did pass last year, after she had more than 5,000,000 volunteers, a conscription law; but that law provided that every Englishman should have 30 days after the call for troops of a certain class within which time to volunteer. The passage of that conscription law was avowedly for the purpose of compelling all men in England, Scotland, and Wales who were of military age and physically strong, and who had declined to volunteer, to go into the army. This conscript law was for the purpose of getting what they called "slackers." It was not for the purpose of taking the brave and willing soldier, but for the purpose of taking the shirkers of public duty and compelling them to go in training. Why do not these gentlemen who have shouted loudly on the floor of this House that England had to go to conscription tell the whole truth about it?

CANADA.

When the statement was made on the floor of this House that England had to finally pass the conscription law, they failed to state that there has been no conscription law in Canada. On the contrary, the Canadian Parliament declined to pass a conscription law. Our neighbors just north of us love liberty and freedom, hate Prussianism and militarism, and declined to adopt any of the Prussian military principles. Notwithstanding the fact that Canada has no conscription law, she has furnished vastly more troops than the English Parliament said was her quota.

AUSTRALIA.

In Australia, when this matter was up before the Australian Parliament, they had a referendum on it, and the people of Australia voted it down by an overwhelming majority, said to be 9 or 10 to 1. The Australian people declined to subject themselves to conscript officers. Notwithstanding this fact, Australia has furnished vastly more than her quota of troops to England, and they are now fighting gloriously on the battle fields of Europe.

IRELAND.

The English Parliament also especially exempted Ireland from the conscription law, and not a single soldier has been conscripted in all of Ireland, yet the Irish people, who were thought to be disloyal to England, have by the volunteer system furnished more than her quota of troops. Nor did England apply the conscript law to her South African and Asiatic colonies. Every soldier from India has been a volunteer soldier.

It is strange to me how men can on the floor of this House say that the volunteer system is a failure and that we can not get soldiers to fight the battles of the Republic unless we conscript them. Every gentleman who makes that statement knows, or should know, that the General Staff of the Army has been unalterably opposed to the volunteer system, and that the War Department some time ago stopped the volunteer system and ordered the adjutant generals of the National Guard of the several States to stop enlisting men in the National Guard. It is contended that the Government has established recruiting offices throughout the United States and that they are getting no men. Why, of course not. These recruiting officers are recruiting for the Regular Standing Army. Our boys do not want to get into the Standing Army. When they enlist in the Standing Army no assurance can be given them as to what company they will belong to or who their captain will be, what regiment they will serve in, or where they will be sent, whether to the Philippines, Mexico, Porto Rico, Cuba, or the European trenches. There is not a Member of this House but that knows that this system is not popular with the American boy and with the American citizen.

If the present National Guard law had been simply amended so as to authorize the President of the United States to enlist a million men in the National Guard, and the President would issue his call upon the States of the Union for their quota of troops, as has always been done in the past from the Revolutionary War down to the present time, we would get a million men before the enrollment authorized under this bill could possibly be made. Because if the call is made upon the governor of the State, and the governor issues his proclamation within the State calling for volunteers and asking the State to do its full duty, show its patriotism, and State pride by not lagging behind, the young men of every county could be relied upon to get together at the courthouse in the county and in the towns and villages, organize themselves into companies, and select their lieutenants and captains. When this is done, they would tender their services to the governor of the State, and he in turn would tender them to the President, and the President, under the present law, would cover them into the Regular Army and assign the regiments from Mississippi for duty as has been done in the past. That is to say, Mississippians would, as far as possible, be brigaded together, North Carolinians together, and Tennesseeans together, and thus preserve the American idea of an army.

The men who are selected as captains by the various companies would be men of their choice and men whom they are willing to follow. Oh, but it is contended that they would not be trained. Of course, many of them would not be trained, but as has been stated before that would be true under either system. So I think it better, wiser, and more American to let the members of the company select their own officers, send these officers to the officers' training camps to receive the training necessary to acquaint them with their duties, and instead of sending a stranger who had been trained in this way back to command the company send back the officer of their choice.

The American boys are brave, but they are human beings. It is a severe trial to a young man to enlist in a company where he will be with his friends, acquaintances, and neighbors; but under the system proposed by the War Department and vigorously insisted upon by them, they do not want young men who are neighbors put in the same company, they want to take them and send them into the Regular Army of the United States—take a Mississippian and put him in a company which will be made up of boys from every State in the Union. It is their hope to thus destroy all State and local pride. They want all of the regiments to be known by number, eliminating entirely the State units, and it is this that prevents our young men enlisting. But if this Congress will adopt the American and democratic system of permitting the young men in every community of the United States to come together, organize themselves into companies, tender full units to the Government so that they will be kept together, there will be absolutely no trouble in raising a ready and willing army. This volunteer system will get soldiers quick and all we will need. It takes soldiers to fight a war.

It is contended, however, that under the volunteer system only such men as want to go will be called upon to serve. This is to an extent true, but let us look for a moment at the proposition and not try to deceive ourselves. Under the system proposed by the General Staff, which is embodied in this bill, who is to determine who shall go? They first contended that the Government should determine who shall go and who shall remain at home, but they soon found out that that would not do, so they now say that it shall be determined by lot. That there shall be a chuck-a-luck game; that all those of a certain age shall be drawn.

What will be the result if you have 4,000,000 names in the various wheels throughout the United States, one out of every eight men to go, you turn the wheel, draw out his name, and it may be that there are five or six young men anxious to go, or at least willing to go, and the one drawn would be the one most unwilling to go, and we will presume that he endeavors to claim his exemption for some reason or other, then is the Army officer to determine whether this young man shall go or not? I do not care what sort of board you have, whether a local board made up of county officers as proposed by some, whether you send a board from the Army, or whether you have men specially selected from civil life, this board will finally determine whether the young man shall go or not, upon the theory that he owes a duty to the Government. This we concede. We all know that he owes a duty to the Government, but I contend that he owes it under the American system, and that he can better determine for himself whether he can afford to leave home than for some Army officer or civil board to determine that question. At any rate, if he goes unwillingly he is a dissatisfied soldier, more liable to shirk and more liable to desert. But the Army officers take the position that after they get him in the Army they will see that he is taken and trained and compelled to be a soldier. This is the Prussian method, which I hate and despise. I do not believe that you can thus instill true courage and true patriotism in a boy. You may harass him into a brute by "bucking and gagging" him and placing him in the guardhouse, punishing him in all sorts of ways until he gets reckless and does not care much what he does, and at the first opportunity he is going to desert.

What is the testimony of all the Army officers throughout the history of the world? They will tell you that the volunteer has always made the best soldier. From the discussion on this floor you would imagine that the most disgraceful human being on earth is the volunteer soldier. So much so that Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, the strongest supporter in the House of the selective-draft system, rushed to the defense of the volunteer soldier because he realized the untenable and defenseless position that they were being left in before the people of the United States, whose fathers and grandfathers had been volunteer soldiers and had made the pages of American history glorious. [Applause.]

So I say, Mr. Chairman, if I were a strong advocate of Germany, I know of no better way of helping the German cause than by the adoption of the heartless method proposed by the General Staff of the Army. Provost marshals and conscript officers will not make this war popular with the people. When you take an unwilling son from his home and place him in the Army you will render the war odious to his mother and to his father. What we need above all things is to make this war the war of the fathers and mothers as well as the war of the boys in the Army.

It is contended that the passage of this bill will strike terror into German hearts. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that statement. On the contrary, if the conscript officers go out and arrest the boys and drive them into the Army with bayonets, they are likely to be resisted, and news of rioting all over the United States will add more joy to the German hearts than any news that could be conveyed to them. What would strike terror to the German hearts would be to adopt a system where every man, woman, and child would stand behind the army of volunteers. In union there is strength; in discord there is weakness.

In certain sections of this country this is not a popular war. For God's sake let us not, as patriotic Americans, render it more odious and obnoxious to our people. [Applause.]

It is also contended that we need an army, and need it at once. This is the cry of the General Staff of the Army, and yet when you ask them how long it will take to raise an army under this system they propose, not one of them will dare tell you how long. If they want an army quick, why is it that the General Staff opposed so vigorously the proposition of Theodore Roosevelt to raise at once throughout the United States an army of at least 125,000 men, and within the last few days he says he can make it 150,000 men, many of them trained soldiers and all of them over 25 years of age, thus guaranteeing to the General Staff that he would not in any wise interfere with their choice of the young men of America. I can see no earthly reason why this proposition of his can not be accepted. I have no brief to speak for Theodore Roosevelt. I have never liked his politics nor his governmental policies; but if he can, as he says, within 90 days from the time he gets the authority, land 125,000 men on French soil, it looks to me like the height of folly to deny him and those who desire to go with him this opportunity. It can spring from but one source, and that is the hatred of the General Staff of the Army for the volunteer soldier.

This General Staff of the Army is not infallible. Why, when they first came before the Military Affairs Committee the staff said that they wanted authority to raise a million men, including the Regular Army and the National Guard. The members of the Military Affairs Committee called their attention to the fact that under the present law they could enlist the Regular Army to over 241,000 men and the National Guard to over 666,000 men, or, in other words, that they already had authority to enlist something more than 900,000 men, and that it was only necessary for the committee to pass a law to increase the Army about a hundred thousand men to get the number demanded. When their attention was called to this fact, the staff left the committee that afternoon, and the next morning came back before the committee with an entirely new plan, stating that they wanted a million men in addition to the Regular Army and the National Guard. Gentlemen of the House, this was done overnight. Is it possible that these men could have thus blundered if they had given this subject real and genuine thought? Ah, no, Mr. Chairman, they had issued an order that the National Guard should not be permitted to enlist any more men. This board of Army officers, who claim to have all wisdom in reference to military affairs, is the same board that criticized through the public press the National Guard system on the border of Mexico. That was the most unjust, most unfair criticism ever made of a magnificent body of fighting men. In many States within 24 hours after the order was issued to mobilize the National Guard the entire National Guard was ready to entrain. And yet, owing to the incompetence and unpreparedness of the General Staff to take care of them, many of these guardsmen were kept in their respective States for months until the General Staff could arrange for their transportation and secure for them the necessary means of being cared for on the border. In order to prevent criticism of themselves they filled the public press with criticism of the National Guard, and yet every fair-minded man who will investigate the facts will find that that criticism was unjust and unfair. The fault was at the door of the Regular Army officers and not at the door of the National Guard. Yet these men we are asked to follow blindly.

PROFESSIONAL SOLDIER.

This simply illustrates that the theoretical soldier is not always the practical soldier. At the outbreak of the Civil War the city of Washington was filled with theoretical soldiers. Abraham Lincoln became President of the United States. The theoretical soldiers were in command of the Army, and there were no victories to amount to anything during the first two years of the war. But in 1863 the Battle of Gettysburg was fought, on the 1st, 2d, and 3d days of July, and was the first great victory to the credit of the northern army. The next day, the 4th of July, Vicksburg fell, and in the rejoicings here at the Capital some of the friends of Lincoln asked him why it was that he won no victories during the first two years of the war and that all of these victories came at practically the same time. Lincoln's reply was: "It took me two years to weed out the carpet knights and raise me up some generals." [Applause.]

I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but if we go into this war and it becomes a real fight and a real war the generals now in Washington constituting the body of "carpet knights" will have to be replaced by men developed in the field. If their calculations in the fight are not more accurate than their calculations when they come before the Military Affairs Committee, what man can say what great blunders they will make in the organization of the Army and in fighting the battles in the field? I do not say this out of criticism or for the purpose of doing any injury to the magnificent body of men who make up the officers of the United States Army. I know many of them personally and they are a magnificent lot of gentlemen, men of high character and high standing, but I do not concede that these men are infallible, and I am unwilling that Congress should surrender to these gentlemen all control of the purse strings of the Government and the appointment of all of the officers who shall go to make up the Army.

All of the Regular Army officers hold their jobs for life and are paid princely salaries. A general's salary is $9,300 a year as long as he remains active, and when he retires to private life he retires with three-fourths pay as long as he lives. These men have been educated by the Government, having gone into the academy by appointment from some Congressman or Senator when they were still in their teens.

The entire expense of their education at the academy is borne by the Government. As soon as they graduate they take their positions in the Regular Army as second lieutenants, at a salary of $1,800 a year. Therefore these men know absolutely nothing about the practical side of life. They are trained to have a contempt for politics—I do not complain at this—and I fear that they do not have much respect for the rights of a private citizen. Army life becomes attractive. They begin to look at once for promotion—I do not complain at this—but I do not think that they ought to criticize the patriotism of the people who do not do their bidding at all times. It is in time of war that promotions to the Army officers come thick and fast. The lieutenants and captains of the Regular Army look with great disfavor on the Volunteer Army in time of war coming into the Regular Army with lieutenants and captains and majors and colonels from civil life, while they remain lieutenants and captains in the Regular Army. So if they can break up this volunteer system as it has heretofore existed, and the General Staff is permitted to select all of the officers, the strong fraternity existing between the graduates from the West Point Military Academy will insure the lieutenant in the Regular Army the position at once as colonel, and promotions would go all up the line. The statement is perhaps true that of the 7,500 officers on the roster roll of the Regular Army every one of them would be promoted three or four grades the very moment the million men are mustered into the service under the plan proposed by the General Staff, whereas if the million men were organized under the volunteer system there would be no promotions, or very few promotions, in the ranks of the officers of the standing army. This, Mr. Chairman, is perhaps the principal reason why the General Staff and those holding jobs for life are so unalterably opposed to the volunteer system.

THE VOLUNTEER AND LIBERTY.

The statement has been repeatedly made on the floor of this House since this debate commenced, and no human being has denied it, that liberty has been established on earth by the volunteer soldier. I challenge the advocates of this selective-draft plan to point out a single instance in the history of the world where a volunteer army has enslaved a people. I make the statement without fear of successful contradiction that but for the volunteer soldier the human family would still be serfs and slaves to some monarchical form of government and kept in subjection by a standing army. I also make the statement without fear of successful contradiction that it has been the conscript soldier who has overturned every free government on earth.

When we established independence in America we fought the English conscript soldier. Many interesting stories are told as to how the British Government conscripted the Irish soldier, placed him in the holds of their ships, transported him across the Atlantic, forced him to don the uniform of the British conscript soldier, and drove him into line to fight the battles against the freedom of America. As soon as the Irishman, conscripted against his will, got an opportunity he deserted and joined the ragged continentals to help fight the battles of American liberty. How many, many times has the Irish orator on the Fourth of July referred to this page in the history of our country.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, I hear the volunteer army which achieved our independence sneered at. I never believed that I would live to see the day that the Army officers should so completely control this House that they could induce the Members of the House of Representatives, descendants of the volunteer soldiers, to speak contemptuously of the services they rendered. Ah, these men are now saying that it has not been the volunteer soldier whom they denounced, but that it has been the volunteer system which they denounced. That, Mr. Chairman, is just as contemptible in my eyes, for without the volunteer system there could be no volunteer soldier. [Applause.]

I do not believe that because a man volunteers he can not be trained as quickly into an effective soldier as when he is conscripted. Nor am I willing to admit that the time has come in America when patriotism and bravery has reached such low ebb that the American boy can not be depended upon to volunteer to do his duty. Nor am I willing to stand by the principle that the man who really wants to go to war shall not be permitted to go, and that the man who does not want to go shall be made to go. Nor am I willing to admit that there should be any Government supervision of what a man shall do with his own life.

CONSCRIPTION COMPLICATES.

If the General Staff will be honest in their efforts, and the administration will adopt the plan to secure soldiers by the volunteer system, permitting the young men from the various communities to organize their companies, if within 60 days there should be no living evidence of the fact that the boys of America and the young men of America will do their full duty by their Government, then, and not until then, will I insult them by voting to conscript them.

You may sugar coat the system proposed in this bill as much as you please by calling it "selective draft," but it is conscription just the same; conscription, to my mind, in its most hideous form; conscription where all sorts of partiality and favoritism may be shown; conscription where a few shall be taken and many shall be left, although they are of the same age and owe the same duty to the Government; conscription which is bound to be undemocratic, because it is admitted that in the first draft only 1 out of 8 can be taken; and if the age limit is raised from 21 to 40, then only 1 out of 24 will be taken and 23 will be left behind.

Just stop a moment, gentlemen of the House, and consider what an army it will take to organize the machinery necessary to select these men, whether the age limit be from 19 to 25 or from 21 to 40. It is estimated that at least 3,000 conscript stations will have to be established throughout the United States, that at each one of these stations there shall be three conscript officers who shall constitute the board to pass upon the young men as their names are drawn out of the chuck-a-luck box. Just how many officers will be needed to go and hunt these young men up when it is decided who shall be taken no one can estimate. The cost alone would be startling but for the billions which we are already paying out.

But this is not all of the horrible story that is pictured in my mind. When the news shall go forth—and it is stated by some that it will not be possible to enlist a single man under the proposed plan before the 1st of September—but when the news is given out that all of these millions of men shall report, and a few thousand of them shall fail to report, then warrants will be issued, United States marshals will hunt these boys up, arrest them, try them in courts, charge them with desertion, place fines and prison sentences upon them which they will have to work out in the Federal prisons.

But this is not all of the horrible picture. When the proclamation goes forth that all of these millions of men shall report at a certain place, and only 1 out of 20 fails to respond, he becomes guilty of a crime, and that would mean that not less than 1,000,000 warrants would have to be issued for the arrest of 1,000,000 men, just exactly the number of men that this bill proposes to raise by conscription, and yet among these arrests, under the provisions of this bill unless amended, not a single one of these men would go into the Army, but would go to a Federal prison.

CORRUPT INFLUENCE.

Yet Members of this Congress have yielded their convictions under coercion from the great financial interests of the country, who are sending out telegrams, at the cost of many thousands of dollars, to the banks, boards of trade, and other organizations throughout the United States misrepresenting the facts in reference to this bill, misrepresenting the truth as to what the bill contains, contending that the bill is democratic and universal, and calling upon them to send telegrams to their Congressmen and Senators to compel them to vote for a system which in my judgment will bring America into disgrace and shame.

Mr. Chairman, I love the indorsement of my people as much as any man on this floor. I love to hear the plaudits of those people when they indorse me and honor me by saying, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant"; but they elected me to Congress believing that I was a Democrat, believing that under all circumstances, even though the heavens should fall, I would vote my honest and conscientious judgment and for the best interests of our country, and I can not now at this hour betray them. I can not find in my heart a single good reason why I should favor or vote for conscription, but a thousand reasons rush to my mind why I should not vote for it. [Applause.]

I know that when I cast the vote which I shall cast against this measure that the great newspapers throughout the country will malign and traduce me, will call me a German sympathizer, will call me a slacker, and attempt to place numerous other slurs upon me to bring me into disgrace, and that if I should vote for the measure I would be hailed by them as a patriot and as a liberty-loving American. So it would be easier for me to pursue the line of least resistance, surrender my heart, my mind, my convictions on this Army bill to the clamor of the public press and to the demand of the financial interests, and vote for this selective-draft bill. But, Mr. Chairman, that I will not do.

This is the opportunity which the General Staff and Army Board have of getting that which has been denied them in times of peace for so many years, a standing army of a million men and 44,000 officers fastened upon the American people for all time to come, costing the taxpayers of America the stupendous sum of $2,500,000,000 annually. Oh, I hear men say that there is nothing to that; Members of Congress can control the situation. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I saw a week ago an overwhelming majority of this Congress standing ready to vote against the hateful selective-draft system and shouting for the volunteer system; many Members of the House saying that they would under no circumstances vote for the conscription bill.

The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee has stated on the floor of the House that hundreds of Members of Congress came to him and urged him not to yield to the demand of the great interests for the conscription system, and yet when the public press began to traduce them, when the propaganda went out from New York to the various districts of the United States embodying the following telegram:

"Representative ———, from your district, is reported opposed to universal military service and blocking President Wilson in his war program. We suggest that you organize mass meetings to show Representative ——— that Americans who sent him to Congress demand that he support universal military training and the President. Have asked cooperation of your local business association. Please work with it and enlist strong newspaper support for this campaign. Please wire us your willingness to fight for a united Nation now."

And when telegrams and letters, influenced by this propaganda campaign, began to flood the mails of the Congressmen, these same Members of Congress, yielding to the pressure, have now changed their minds and now announce their intention of supporting the conscription bill.

WHEN THE WAR IS OVER.

Why, Mr. Chairman, do you not know when this war is over and the Army is to be disbanded these same influences will go to work through the same channels and by the same methods cause these same men to vote for a standing Army of a million men and 44,000 officers. The cry will then go up that these are trained men, trained soldiers, and that the Government needs them to protect itself against some imaginary foreign foe, and the same influences that control this Congress will control the next one. So, Mr. Chairman, whether other men take this view or not, I see more danger to America in establishing the conscription system than I do from any German invasion or any German Army. I am unwilling by any vote of mine to surrender my American ideals of freedom, liberty, and justice and adopt the Prussian ideals of force, strength, oppression, and injustice. [Applause.]

Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that there are now over 16,000,000 Germans in the United States? It is because these same Germans fled from Germany to escape the Prussian militarism; and I can not, while voting to go to war to defend us from Prussianism, establish Prussianism here in America. Let us retain our American system of Government and preserve our American system of organizing an army.

STATE UNITS.

Of course, the majority of my colleagues will be able to put this bill through; but when you do, let me beseech you to retain in the bill the State units, so that our boys may not be broken up and sent among strangers. When he is conscripted, let him be conscripted to go as nearly as possible with his friends and neighbors. Do not make it impossible for the people of America when they listen for news from the European war front to hear anything except as hearing from convicts, "United States Regiment No. 269 engaged the enemy to-day." Oh, how the hearts of the loyal citizens of Mississippi would swell with pride if they could read in the morning papers that the "Mississippi troops behaved like men," or an item like this: "The Mississippi troops engaged the enemy and drove them from the field and won for American arms a glorious victory."

Why, Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning, even the German system realizes the love of home, the love of locality, the love of neighbors. There is a German expression which when being translated means "Can I ever forget the place where my cradle stood." So, in organizing the German Army, the Bavarians, the Prussians, the Germans are known by their locality, and not by numbers of regiments. The English armies are known by the communities which they represent. The Scotch troops are organized as Scotchmen, and they feel that they are adding glory to old Scotland by conducting themselves as Scotchmen in the fight. The Canadians read with pride of the heroic daring of the Canadian regiments, and the same is true of the inhabitants of Australia. Why should we in America endeavor to destroy in the organization of our Army the fact that we are a Government of united States? Why should the citizens of Maine, or Mississippi, Massachusetts, or Missouri be denied the honor of having their troops brigaded together? I must confess that I have no patience with the idea that an Army officer should be a stranger to his troops, that the captain should not know a single man in his company, that the colonel should be a stranger to everyone except the officers with whom he associates. This is worse than Prussianism, and God knows that it is not Americanism. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. DENT. I have many requests for time; but I hate to refuse the gentleman, and I yield him five minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the great daily press of our country has done much to becloud the real issue in this debate. They say the President is for the General Staff bill as they wanted it, and neither the House nor the Senate committees would take the General Staff bill. Do the people know that on the 8th of December, 1914, President Wilson, when the General Staff of the Army were pressing him and the militarists of the country were denouncing him for not advocating a large standing army, delivered a speech, in which he dealt with this very subject. I quote him literally. He said:

"It is said in some quarters that we are not prepared for war. What is meant by being prepared? Is it meant that we are not ready upon brief notice to put a Nation in the field, a Nation of men trained to arms? Of course we are not ready to do that, and we shall never be in time of peace so long as we retain our present political principles and institutions. And what is it that it is suggested that we should be prepared to do? To defend ourselves against attack? We have always found means to do that, and shall find them whenever it is necessary without calling our people away from their necessary tasks to render compulsory military service in times of peace."

Further he says:

"From the first we have had a clear and settled policy with regard to military establishments. We never have had, and while we retain our present principles and ideals we never shall have, a large standing army. If asked, Are you ready to defend yourselves? we reply most assuredly; to the utmost; and yet we shall not turn America into a military camp. We will not ask our young men to spend the best years of their lives making soldiers of themselves."

Continuing in the same address, President Wilson said:

"Let us remind ourselves, therefore, of the only thing we can do or will do. We must depend in every time of national peril, in the future as in the past, not upon a standing army, nor yet upon a reserve army, but upon a citizenry trained and accustomed to arms. It will be right enough, right American policy, based upon our accustomed principles and practices, to provide a system by which every citizen who will volunteer for the training may be made familiar with the use of modern arms, the rudiments of drill and maneuver, and the maintenance and sanitation of camps."

Let me call your attention sharply to so much of the President's address contained in the last quotation, which says:

"It will be right enough, right American policy, based upon our accustomed principles and practices, to provide a system whereby every citizen who will volunteer for the training may be made familiar with the use of modern arms," and so forth. The use of the words "who will volunteer" clearly excludes compulsion or any element or principle of force.

Speaking with reference to the National Guard, President Wilson in the same address said:

"It is right, too, that the National Guard of the States should be developed and strengthened by every means not inconsistent with our obligations to our own people or with the established policy of our Government. And this, also, not because the time or occasion specially calls for such measures, but because it should be our constant policy to make these provisions for our national peace and safety.

"More than this carries with it a reversal of the whole history and character of our polity."

This is not all, Mr. Chairman. Only one year ago, in an address about the time Secretary of War Garrison was endeavoring to swing the President for conscription or for a continental army in lieu of the democratic National Guard system, the President took the same position, and because the President would not yield Secretary Garrison resigned from the Cabinet.

The President states that he believed in a policy that where "every citizen who will volunteer for training may be made familiar with the use of arms," and to go further "than this carries with it a reversal of the whole history and character of our polity." Such is my view, Mr. Chairman, and this being my conviction I must stand by this announcement of our great President. We have preserved our liberties and our freedom thus long by adhering without deviation from this truth. Principles are eternal. Men may change, but principles never. So let us who believe in the fundamental truths of democracy adhere to them with courage. Majorities do not make right. When the Master was on earth, He was in a hopeless minority, and if His apostles had been swayed from the truth by men in high places, by men of great power and wealth, and by majorities there would have been no Christian religion now on earth.

I shall strike no blow at freedom. I do not want Old Glory to wave over a nation of people oppressed by militarism. If this bill passes, then the volunteer will pass into history until our Government becomes so oppressive that in the distant future the volunteer will again appear, not alone with ballots but perhaps with bayonets in his hands to overthrow this oppression.

Mr. Chairman, this is a sad occasion to me, for I know that when this vote is taken the volunteer soldier is a thing of the past and militarism has come. Your vote for conscription means that the volunteer system is a failure. Your vote means that when you abolish the volunteer system something must take its place, and that something will be the Prussian militarism, or so-called universal military training, which will be forever a burden upon the backs of the people of America who labor and toil.

The people, the real people, the people who will have to die and pay, have not been heard from on this question. Only those who have grown rich out of the war, and who will grow richer, have bombarded the country banks and the business leagues of the small towns with telegrams calling on them to telegraph their Congressmen and Senators have been heard in these Halls, and this bombardment has caused Congressmen to surrender their convictions on this question.

When the war is over, as I have said before, these same influences will saddle on the backs of the American people a standing Army of a million men. The great financial interests think that they need this to protect their bonds and their holdings. They now control Congress. The question is how long will they continue in this control? Just so long as the people who hold the ballots permit it.

Gentleman of the House, before concluding my remarks, if you will bear with me a moment, let me picture to you a scene which will be staged in many a home in this broad land when by your votes you saddle this conscription law upon the American people. Let me picture to you a home, a young man unwilling to go after his name has been drawn, a squad of conscript officers sent to arrest him, approach the front door and knock. The father appears, and they ask, "Does Mr. John Smith live here?" The boy's father says, "I do; that is my name." They then ask, "Where is your son?" The father answers, "He is out at the store, or he is in the lot." They go out, find the boy, he is arrested and marched off in front of bayonets. What is the effect upon the mother's heart and upon the father's heart? They hate that law, that conscription, which took their boy from them. This is what this conscript bill means.

Let me draw you another picture in a similar home. The boy who has been to the place where a volunteer company is being organized, returns to his home fired with patriotism, and approaching his father says, "Father, I want to join the Army." His father says, "My boy, I hate to see you go." His mother weeps on his neck and says, "Son, I do not want you to go. Do not go to the war." The boy answers, "I think I ought to go." They talk it over. The boy goes to bed, and the old father and mother sit there in the quiet hours of the night. The father says, "Wife, I went to the war. I reckon that boy has got the same feeling that I had. I love him, but down in my soul I am glad that he wants to volunteer." The wife, with tears in her eyes, answers, "Yes; my father volunteered. I reckon our boy is right." They drop down on their knees and ask God's blessing upon the boy. The next morning at the breakfast table the father places his hand on the shoulder of his son and says, "John, we have talked the matter over during the night, and while your mother and I do not want you to go, we say to you, if you feel it your duty to go, go, and may God's blessing rest with you." The boy goes, and with him go the prayers of the mother and father. Whose war is that? That is the mother's and father's war. The first picture, gentlemen of the House, shows the conscript. The second picture is the volunteer, and if we adopt that system, Mr. Chairman, then this war which we have entered for the preservation of the foundation principles of our Government becomes the people's war, and not an Army officer's war.

Mr. Chairman, feeling as I do, I can not vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, you need not be alarmed, because the object I have before me is not a bomb, but only a copy of the Washington Times newspaper. I will admit, however, that I ought to have a pair of tongs with which to handle it. [Laughter.] We have fallen upon strange times. No measure of importance can come before this House for its consideration without the yellow and disreputable portion of the press unmercifully lashing and vilifying those Members who dare to vote contrary to the ideas of those hawkers of opinions that have been furnished by various so-called patriotic leagues and associations whose chief business is to talk and not to fight. I do not mean to say that the press as a whole is yellow and disreputable, for it is not. There are disreputable characters in all trades, professions, and occupations. In the law there are shysters; in medicine, quacks; and fakers in all the avocations of human endeavor, and my remarks apply to that part of the press that the shoe fits.

It is a fact well known to the Members of this House that representatives of disreputable and mendacious yellow journalism flock in the corridors of this Capitol Building like unclean birds of prey, anxious to glut their filthy beaks in the vitals of the reputation of any Members of Congress they can not browbeat and sandbag into supporting those measures which appeal to the interest and venality of such journalism. I will read to you a sample editorial falsehood, evidence of the moral delinquency and general malice of newspapers of this character. To-day the Washington Times states in an editorial that—

> The Legislature of Missouri has passed unanimously a resolution indorsing this measure which CLARK and REED opposed.

The reference is to Speaker CLARK and Senator REED, of Missouri, and this conscript measure. The mendacity of the Washington Times in that statement is equaled only by its insolence and stupidity. The Legislature of Missouri did not pass any such resolution, or any resolution whatever on that subject. It adjourned about the 1st of March, long before this measure was presented and before the extra session of Congress was called, and never in a legislative capacity heard of the matter. This newspaper in support of its ideas does not hesitate to libel the Senator from Missouri and the Speaker of this House right about the hour when this bill will be voted upon, and should be expelled from the press gallery. [Applause.] The name of Mr. Speaker CLARK, one of the fairest and best-beloved Speakers who ever presided over this House, will live in the history of this Republic when his newspaper detractors are dead and forgotten forever. I believe in calling a spade a spade instead of an agricultural implement, if it becomes necessary so to do. No Member of Congress who votes as his conscience dictates, and as he believes his duty demands, should stand in awe of all the newspaper hawkers in the world. Any man can afford to stand for his rights and the sentiments of his constituents without fear or favor, and he who does so will in the end have the approval of his own conscience and the support of his constituents.

Mr. Chairman, there is not, so far as I know, a drop of German blood in my veins. My ancestors came to this country before the Revolutionary War. I do not believe there are 200 German voters in my district. No man can excel me in patriotism and devotion to the flag. No man can truthfully assert that I am controlled by any ulterior motive in this or any vote I may cast. I believe in the volunteer method of raising an army. Should the House defeat the volunteer plan and adopt conscription, as much as I dislike to, rather than have no army I shall vote for that plan; but I am not one of those who have suddenly seen a great light [laughter], and I shall vote against the Kahn conscription amendment. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] admits that his conversion, while not so righteous, was more sudden than that of Saul of Tarsus. I can not be accused of anything of that kind. I believe in the old-time religion, and the old-time democracy of the fathers, and, so far as this question is concerned, I am still an unconverted sinner, not even on the mourners' bench.

I have supported the President on all important measures. I voted for the war resolution and the bond issue for $7,000,000,000 to feed the warring millions of Europe. In so doing I feel I went a far call from Washington's advice to form no entangling alliance with foreign nations. I will support any measure that I believe necessary to prosecute the war to a successful termination, and I believe every Member of this House will do the same thing even if some of us do not agree with the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. It may be if the General Staff and the War College get full control of the affairs of this country, as is the evident intention, there may be erected a military oligarchy on the ruins of our boasted liberty, and we may have dukes and earls and counts, and other evidences of aristocracy. Should such new order of things obtain, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will be entitled to first honors and should be created a nobleman with the title of the Duke of Conscription. [Applause.] Without jesting, gentlemen, such a state of affairs is far from the regions of improbable fancy. Unless the people of this country call a halt on militarism such a state of affairs is by no means impossible. If militarism comes in full force, it will come to stay. Never in the history of the world has military power once obtained been relinquished. Two bloody-handed tyrants—militarism and hereditary autocracy—have marched along the pathway of all the centuries, trampling on human rights, and they are rearing their repulsive heads in this House, seeking to strike their poisonous fangs into the vitals of constitutional liberty. [Applause.] You may say what you please about it, but I know it and you know it. From militarism we may pass to food control, and next a commission may be appointed to direct just what occupation each citizen must pursue, and finally, if things go on as they are now going, our individual liberty may become a thing of mournful memory. The people in my part of the country have always enjoyed liberty and the blessings of life, and have an abundance to eat and wear, and if any food commission attempts to take the food from their children to send it to the people of Europe who are fighting and do not know what they are fighting about, I predict it will cause the biggest sort of disturbance. [Applause.]

Conscription—another name for slavery—seems to be the order of the day, and has become a disease like a consuming fever. I understand there is a proposition to conscript men to work on farms. That is one kind of conscription I would favor if confined to the lazy city loafers and pool-room sharks who refuse to fight or to work.

The trouble with that proposition, however, is that some theoretical agriculturist, who probably does not know whether potatoes grow in the ground or on trees, might be appointed to superintend the job. [Laughter and applause.]

We need, instead of a useless commission, the enactment and enforcement of laws sufficiently comprehensive and drastic to insure the proper punishment of the vultures of commerce. Commissions, in my opinion, have become a liability and not an asset to this Government.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who is an able man, made a speech in this House yesterday which, in my opinion, was more fitted for the German Reichstag. Speaking on conscription, he declared that no man has a right to volunteer his services to his country because he owes it to his country as an obligation to fight when needed, and therefore should not be permitted to volunteer. That statement is the concentrated essence of Kaiserism and Prussian militarism. It is true there is an obligation resting on every citizen to defend his country, and it is just as true that he has the right to voluntarily offer his services for that purpose. The voluntary performance of obligations to country is one of the foundation stones of our Government, and one of the greatest incentives to patriotism. If the duty to serve the Government is obligatory and no one should be permitted to voluntarily perform that duty, then it inevitably follows that no one should be permitted to voluntarily perform any obligation he owes to the Government.

That is the doctrice of absolute government control over the action of the individual, and direction of all the activities of its citizens. Under that doctrine no citizen has a right to voluntarily perform any duty, but must perform it only under the direction of constituted authority. It is absolutism pure and simple. Some one stated in this debate that conscription is like paying taxes; that the citizen owes an obligation to the Government to pay taxes. That is true. The speaker compared the obligation to pay taxes to conscription. There is no analogy whatever between the two. Is not the citizen given the right to voluntarily pay taxes? He owes the tax. Can he not go voluntarily to the proper office and make payment? If we proceed on the assumption of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the proper officer should make out the tax roll of every citizen and send the sheriff with an execution to levy on the property of each individual and sell it for the amount of tax due, without giving the opportunity to voluntarily make payment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. THOMAS. Gentlemen have stated that the volunteer system of raising an army is a failure, and they cite the assertion that the President is in favor of conscription. We have no evidence before this House as to the correctness of that statement, except that of newspapers, which, if any evidence at all, is certainly not the best evidence. The President has never communicated his views to this body on that subject except to state in his last message that he is in favor of universal service, and that may mean universal training and not conscription.

Some gentlemen are laboring zealously to make the country believe that everyone who is not for the Kahn amendment is opposing the President. That statement is untrue. The amendment substituting conscription alone for the committee bill, which provides for both volunteers and conscription, is not the same as that sent to the committee by the War College and General Staff, and supposed to be approved by the President. The War College bill provides that persons between the ages of 19 and 25 only shall be subject to draft, while the Kahn substitute provides that those between the ages of 21 and 40 may be conscripted. It therefore follows that if those who adhere to the volunteer system are opposing the President, so are those who favor the Kahn bill.

It is well known to the Members of this House that Secretary Garrison resigned as a member of the Cabinet because he and the President could not agree on the subject of military compulsion. The President on February 10, 1916, wrote Mr. Garrison as follows:

> As you know, I do not at all agree with you in favoring compulsory enlistment for training, and I fear the advocacy of compulsion before the committee of the House on the part of representatives of the Department of War has greatly prejudiced the House against the proposal for a continental Army, little connection as there is between the plan and the opinion of the Chief of Staff of compulsory enlistment.

Again, on May 30, 1916, in a memorial address at Arlington, the President declared:

> I have heard a great many people talk about universal training. Universal voluntary training with all my heart, if you wish it, but America does not wish anything but compulsion of the spirit of America.

These statements of the President seem to be emphatic and clear against the idea of military compulsion. If he has seen another and clearer light since then he has not seen fit to communicate it to this House.

The committee proposes the double plan of volunteers and conscription. It provides first for the raising of a volunteer army, and should that plan prove a failure then the President may, at his option, and when he deems proper, order an army to be raised by conscription.

The Kahn amendment provides only for conscription. This is the one essential difference between the two plans. The committee bill provides that the patriotic citizen may volunteer his services to fight for his country. The conscription plan says to the citizen: "You shall not be permitted to volunteer as the brave soldiers of our country's past have done." Conscription places an odium on the soldier. In some communities a conscript and a convict, however unjust the sentiment may be, are considered with almost equal aversion.

The committee bill will separate the sheep from the goats, the brave and patriotic from the cowardly and unpatriotic. It is claimed that conscription will bring into the Army all classes, the slacker as well as the man who is willing to fight. It may in some instances, but in others it will not, and in addition it will take much longer to raise and equip a conscript army than it will a volunteer army. A volunteer army can be raised and equipped and put in the field before a census can be taken and other necessary machinery put into operation to raise a conscript army. Under the Kahn amendment about 1 citizen out of every 8 or 10 subject to military duty will be selected. The names will be put in a wheel and drawn out, after the manner of selecting a jury. When the wheel in that lottery of death is turned and the only son of the widow and the poor man with a dependent family are drawn from its gloomy recesses, then there will be weeping and mourning throughout all the land.

It is claimed we are to have a selective draft. Selective in what manner? By chance in a drawing, and the man who would willingly volunteer may be drawn, while the one unwilling to volunteer may not be selected at all. This method, we are told by the proponents of conscription, is eminently fair and just and will insure the performance of equal military service by every citizen of military age. Nothing could be further from the truth. Conscription as proposed is merely the service of chance, and is neither equal nor just. I do not believe that conscription is needed to inspire courage in the heart of American manhood. I believe the indomitable spirit and heroic fortitude of the men who sowed the seeds of liberty in this fair land still lives in the hearts of their children.

I recently received a letter from an ex-Confederate soldier who resides in my district. He fought all through the Civil War. He was a member of the glorious "Orphan Brigade," whose bravery on many a hard-fought field made the name of that brigade immortal. He writes:

> One willing soldier is worth a half dozen unwilling conscripts. This was our experience in the southern armies. Bragg had the conscripts shot by the dozens to deter other conscripts from deserting. The "Orphan Brigade" was only drilled a few weeks before going into battle, and there were never better soldiers. We have won all our wars with volunteers. Why Germanize us now?

But little has been said about the constitutionality of conscription. The Constitution, however, by judicial construction, has almost become a rope of sand. Under the Articles of Confederation between the States, conscription was not legal.

The Constitution of the United States expressly declares that Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. All these constitutional guaranties are swept aside at one stroke by the pending measure. It takes all control of the militia from the States, and vests the authority belonging to the States in the Federal Government. Under this bill as proposed by the ultraconscriptionists, the authority to train the militia is taken from the States and placed in the hands of the Central Government, and the appointment of officers is taken from the States and vested in the President.

There has never been in the history of the country a bolder, more insidious violation of constitutional provisions. Under the volunteer system the State organizations can be kept intact. In all our wars the State units have been preserved and the soldiers from the same State fought together and together died. If a soldier became sick or was wounded, a comrade from the same State and perhaps the same community, was near to administer to his necessities. Under the proposed conscript system, the State units will be abolished and the soldier may find himself in a regiment from a distant State, deprived of the comradeship of his friends and those he loves.

The system of caste and pseudoaristocracy now prevail in the Army and Navy of the United States. The only constitutional right Congress has is to pass a law calling for a specified number of men, to make requisition on each State for its quota, and to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia when in the service of the United States.

Gentlemen contend that we should have conscription so that the law may apply equally to all men, the shirkers as well as those who are willing to enlist in defense of their country. They claim that under this system all will be grist that comes to the conscript mill. They aver that the men who refuse to enlist will be disgraced unless conscription is resorted to as a shield to cover their delinquency. Under this selective-draft system, it seems to me the purpose is not to select those who might refuse to volunteer, but to save them from the admitted odium that attaches to a refusal to serve their country in the day of dire necessity. Odium should attach to the man of military age and condition who refuses to enlist to fight for his homeland, provided there are no pressing domestic obligations that rightfully and honorably exempt him.

The law never brings disgrace on any man. A man may disgrace himself by violating the law or by failing to perform his duty. A man can bring contumely on himself by his own conduct. That is the fault of himself and not the fault of the law. If the volunteer system is approved, all men of military fitness will have an opportunity to enlist, and those who fail to avail themselves of the privilege will bring merited reproach upon their own heads.

After all that may be said, the fact still remains that in the Southland odium, like a festering sore, still clings to the name of conscript, and to this day no drafted man is admitted to the camps of Confederate Veterans. Where a man's interest is, there also is his heart. The glory and honor of the volunteer military system is that such soldiers are willing fighters, and on the field of battle are most valorous and efficient. When war is ended, the volunteer with the pride of duty willingly and faithfully performed, returns home from the tented field and honorably takes a place in the quiet and private walks of life.

I am by no means convinced of the efficiency of the Regular Army under the present management of the War College and General Staff. The fiasco of the Regulars at Columbus, N. Mex., is not a crown of laurel on the record of that army. It is claimed that Villa came while the Army slept. Maybe, and I doubt not he did. The regulars detailed to guard the tomb of Christ claimed that his disciples stole the body away while they slumbered, and such excuses have been made at intervals through all the ages.

In the passage of this conscript measure the demand is made that we repudiate the military policy that has made our Nation free and glorious and a world power. We are asked to adopt instead the autocratic methods and oppressive measures of the tottering empires of the Old World.

The plan of the General Staff is to raise an army of boys 19 years of age. War, with its cruel savagery, does not exempt youth, and age and babyhood suffers by its ravages.

John Temple Graves, a man of national reputation, who is conversant with the plans of the General Staff, in a recent statement said:

> The first grand army of 500,000 men, according to the staff officers, will be raised under the selective draft from men not over 20 years of age. It will be the first class. The process of the original levy of the beardless first army of a half million was explained by a member of the General Staff. * * * The staff officers express full confidence there will be enough men of the 19-year class to make the complement of 500,000 and to render unnecessary the immediate calling of the "20-year class." If, however, the registration of 19-year old men is not sufficient, the 20-year class will be called, and out of this second class will be selected by lot a sufficient number to make up the first 500,000. It is reasonably certain that this is the plan under which the first American Army will be selected and trained for the battle field.

This statement shows the milk in the coconut, the sugar in the gourd, and the colored gentleman in the woodpile. The plan evidently is to draft and drill an army of beardless boys and send them to the blood-drenched trenches of Europe, where they will be slaughtered like sheep in the shambles. Under this system the rich and influential, in my opinion, will be selected by selective draft, but will be selected to remain at home and enrich their coffers through the profits of blood and the slaughter of the hope and expectancy of our fair land. The statement has been made in this House that it is easier to train a conscript army than an army of volunteers. That statement is the perfection of unreason and a thinly veiled sophistry that is not calculated to deceive any thinking mind. It passes human understanding that anyone should contend that the unwilling conscript is easier to train and discipline than the willing volunteer. What evidence has been offered in support of that assertion? None whatever, and none can be offered. The committee measure and the Kahn amendment both provide the same methods of training after enlistment. They both provide that the same officers shall train and drill the men, and are alike in every essential particular except that of compulsion. It is therefore absurd to claim that with the same officers and the same methods the unwilling conscript will be easier to train than the willing volunteer.

Intolerance of opinion has been one of the chief watchwords among the conscriptionists in the consideration of this measure. Many conscriptionists would, if they had the power, deny freedom of thought and speech and action to those who do not adhere to their particular views. Many excited and sulphurous gentlemen in the House, in the Senate, in the pulpit, and among the newspaper fraternity who never trained in any camp, never enlisted in any army, never fought in any battle, never rendered any military service to their country, and are beyond the limit of military age have now become heroic lip warriors and are exceedingly busy denouncing as unpatriotic those who hold opinions contrary to their own peculiar and pet ideas. The day will come when the sunlight of thought and reason will shine through the clouds that now obscure the darkened mental vision of these excited men, and the doughty warriors who are now fighting the battle with paper pellets and bitter tongues will regret their hasty, unwise action and unwarranted denunciation of those who conscientiously oppose them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, conscriptionists assert that the volunteer military system is a failure. There is no evidence whatever of the truth of that assertion, and all the facts and the history of our country furnish abundant proof to the contrary. We judge of the tree by its fruit. If the fruit it bears is good, we say it is a good tree. We judge of the volunteer military system by the results it has accomplished. If the results are good, we say the system is good. If the results are bad, we say the system is bad, and by these tokens the system should stand or fall.

During our national life our volunteer armies, the men fresh from field and forest, from mine and factory and workshop, men of valor and patriotism, have accomplished more tremendous results for liberty and humanity than all the conscript armies that have ever been marshaled under all the banners of all the kings and princes of the earth. Our volunteers have never yet lost a cause for which they fought. Their courage and valor and efficiency have never been surpassed and seldom equaled, and have been thoroughly tested in many a hard-fought battle. Under the banner borne by our volunteer armies our national life has grown and expanded until the sun never sets on our dominions. We have widened our territory, extended our commerce, built railroads, made internal improvements, and increased our population to over a hundred million prosperous people. These mighty results have been accomplished under the voluntary military system and without the aid of "compulsory" slavery. [Applause.]

The volunteers of 1774, when there were no railroads, no telegraph system, no telephones, and no means of communication except post riders, and with no organization, left the plow in the furrow and mobilized 16,000 strong, and in less than a week were in front of Boston besieging the veteran forces of Gen. Gates. No conscript army could equal that swift and wonderful uprising of the heroic farmers of New England. The English of that day talked as do the compulsionists of this day. They declared that the colonists were ignorant and cowardly and inefficient and incapable of fighting, and would take to flight at the first appearance of the red-coated regulars.

The first shot for liberty that was heard around the world was fired at Lexington by volunteers. At Bunker Hill the valorous volunteers withstood the assaults of the trained British veterans until their ammunition became exhausted, and the Continental Volunteers won victory from the mightiest trained legions of England and established a Nation of liberty, ruled not by compulsion but by the consent of the governed. At New Orleans the undrilled riflemen of Kentucky and Tennessee defeated the veteran soldiers of Britain fresh from the battles of the Spanish peninsular campaign. In the War between the States the heroic valor of the volunteer soldiers in both armies will live forever in story and in song. The volunteers who composed the armies of Grant and Lee were as brave and courageous soldiers and as effective fighters as ever followed a flag or stepped time to the inspiring strains of martial music. There were no conscripts in those immortal ranks. [Applause.]

The military history of this land is filled with eloquent evidence of the courage and might of the volunteer soldier, and the proof is convincing that he is the most willing, most intelligent, most effective, and bravest fighting man in the world.

After all, war is horrid, cruel, heart-rending, and always brings untold hardship and suffering alike to victor and vanquished. Every mother's heart in all this land is apprehensive. A world war that may be the Armageddon of human happiness and liberty is raging. Wealth is being destroyed in uncounted millions and the youth of our land are to be sacrificed, the victims of the unholy passion for military glory.

The young soldier goes to war and considers it a splendid game. He thinks only of battle, the cannon's roar, the deadly charge, and victory. He does not think of the damps and putrefaction of tent and ship and hospital, where he may languish consumed by disease, uncared for and unpitied, and at last may die and be thrown unwept and unremembered into a burial trench or into the sea.

Old-fashioned democracy and government by the consent of the governed have no place in the liturgy of the new disciples of compulsion.

This war is begun, and I am in favor of prosecuting it to the bitter end and to a successful termination, and I shall vote for the last man and last dollar necessary for that purpose. America has put her hand to the plow, and she will not look back. I believe a successful result can best be accomplished by the organization of a volunteer army and after that the conscription of those of military age who refuse to volunteer. A nation whose citizens will not voluntarily come to its defense in time of need does not deserve to exist as a nation.

As for myself, I prefer the old lights and the old pathways and the old doctrines of the fathers. I adhere to the just principles of democracy. They are older than the Egyptian Sphinx, which for more than 6,000 years has mutely stood in the trackless Libyan waste; older than the Pyramids, those silent sentinels of the desert which have defied the storms of centuries; principles coeval with the birth of humanity, and which through all the ages must continue to be the hope and light of liberty throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I may say to begin with that I do not agree to the very mean opinion which has been expressed here so frequently of all men who fail to volunteer on the first call when their country is at war. Some of the best friends I have in the world, men honorable and patriotic and brave, did not volunteer when the first call was made in the Spanish-American War. And I know that they were willing then, as men are willing now, to make any sacrifice their country might call upon them to make. I know that many now look on the Spanish War more or less as a joke. And if this army we are now to raise is not sent abroad, if this war ends as we all pray it will end, before our boys are sent into battle, and their service amounts only to duty in the various training camps about the country, it will be only a few years hence when the veterans of the German war will be held in the same light esteem that we now hold the Spanish-American War veterans. When gentlemen, therefore, are denouncing the men who remain at home and propose "that they be gathered together in a slaughter pen and all knocked in the head," as was suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, let us think for a moment what would have happened in this country, how many strange faces there might now be in this Chamber, if we had pursued that same policy in 1898.

I do not agree to the proposition that only those should go to war who want to go, or that an opportunity to volunteer should be given to the men who want to go, and let those who want to remain at home do so. In the first place, it is not true, Mr. Chairman, and it is a reflection, it is an impeachment of the patriotism of the volunteers to say that the men who have volunteered in the various wars that our country has engaged in were men who wanted to go to war. Volunteers, I know by sad personal experience, have gone into the wars of this country not because they wanted to do so, but because they believed it was their patriotic duty to do so.

I have a letter, which I received this morning from a young man who is now a volunteer and is in the National Guard being trained. I would like to read this one paragraph from that letter to illustrate the accuracy of my statement.

He says:

> The Government earnestly and sincerely and in all good faith calls for all able-bodied unmarried men, and if I (who am more than twice the age of my father when he enlisted in the service of his country and went to war) said, 'Let those who want to fight go to the war," I would be shirking my duty, and would be a disgrace to the bravery of my father. I don't want to go to war; I don't want to kill and don't care to be killed, but it seems clear to me that I am needed to help preserve the honor and integrity of the Nation, and if it must be fight I can fight, and I want to be where I can do the most damage to the enemy.

[Applause.]

That is the sort of men who volunteer, and it is an injustice to them and, I repeat, an impeachment of their patriotism, to say that they went simply because they wanted to go.

Gentlemen who are opposing the plan of conscription are assuming to be the champions of the volunteer. I deny this, Mr. Chairman. What they champion is the volunteer system, but I deny that they represent the volunteer. There are six men in the House who served as volunteers in the Civil War, four of whom are now favoring the plan of conscription. There are 22 Members here who served as volunteers in the Spanish-American War and 17 of that number are now in favor of conscription, and I believe that this proportion of 17 out of 22 fairly represents the judgment of the men who would be volunteers in this war. These gentlemen are loud in their praise of the services heretofore rendered by the volunteers and are merciless in their denunciation of those who fail to volunteer; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I believe all will agree that the ones in this country who would rejoice the most heartily if the news were flashed across the country to-morrow that Congress had rejected the conscription plan and had determined to wage this war with volunteers would be, not those who intended to volunteer but those who, physically fit and morally bound to serve their country, have nevertheless determined in their own hearts not to do so! These, not the volunteers, are the ones who are praying for the success of the advocates who pose here as the champions of the volunteer. Whenever any change in any governmental policy is proposed, be it economic or military, those who oppose it point out that it is contrary to the teachings of the fathers. This argument has been worn threadbare almost in this debate, and yet I believe there is little to justify it. Throughout the long and weary years of the revolution Washington was begging the Continental Congress to resort to compulsory service in order to raise the army necessary to win our war of independence. Yesterday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], in a very scholarly presentation of this subject, quoted a letter from Thomas Jefferson, which I think will well bear repetition.

In a letter to J. W. Eppes, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

> I think the truth must now be obvious, that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing army; and that in doing this, all must be marshaled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

Abraham Lincoln, in his Gettysburg speech, declared that—

> This Government was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Equal in what, Mr. Chairman? In rights, privileges, and immunities only? Is this the sum total of that equality which this great patriot ascribed to all men? Does that equality carry with it no equal share in the burdens of citizenship? I believe that no man who has ever contemplated the character of this great man, who bore without complaining and suffered in silence the burdens and the anguish which few of his fellow men knew, will ever subscribe to any such suggestion. Every man who is physically fit is morally bound to serve his country where and how he can serve it best, and I do not believe that the determination of that question ought to be left to his judgment in such a crisis as now confronts us. His duty is to obey. The right and the responsibility of the Government is to command and direct.

On this point I would like to read a statement of a very distinguished Mississippian, no less a personage than Jefferson Davis. He says:

> The defense of home, family, and country is universally recognized as the paramount political duty of every member of society, and in a form of government where each citizen enjoys an equality of rights and privileges nothing can be more invidious than an unequal distribution of duties or obligations. No pursuit nor position should relieve anyone who is able to do actual duty from enrollment in the Army unless his functions or services are more useful to the defense of his country in another sphere.

[Applause.]

No clearer statement could be made of this proposition for selective conscription. Now, I wish to read just another statement of Mr. Davis on the subject of conscription. All of us, Mr. Chairman, are trying to do that which will best serve our country in this emergency. Whether we should have entered the war is no longer a proper subject for debate among patriots. We are at war, and no man can raise the veil of the future and see far enough to tell whether it is to last three years or one year. This is what Mr. Davis says:

> During the first year of the war the authority granted to the President to call for volunteers in the army for a short period was sufficient to secure all the military force which we could fit out and use advantageously. As it became evident that the contest would be long and severe, better measures of preparation were enacted.

Now, what were those "better measures of preparation"? He says:

> I was authorized to call out and place in the military service for three years, unless the war should sooner end, all white men residents of the Confederate States between the ages of 18 and 35 years, and to continue those already in the field until three years from the date of their enlistment.

Now, listen further to what he says:

> This was the first step toward placing the army in a permanent and efficient condition.

[Applause.]

This is the testimony of the President of the Confederate States, a graduate of the United States Military Academy, a distinguished officer in the United States Army, a man who, as a volunteer, rendered conspicuous service on the battle fields of Mexico. When gentlemen say that we are running counter to the principles upon which this Government was founded and running contrary to the doctrines of the fathers and the practices of our fathers, I submit this testimony of one who was in a much better position to speak on this subject than is anyone in this House.

Nobody questions the fact that the volunteer has rendered splendid service in all the wars of our history, and that question is not at all involved in the consideration of this measure. The fact that the proponents of the volunteer system rely exclusively, or almost exclusively, upon the historic and undisputed fact that the volunteers have won all of our wars for us is proof to me that there is no other argument in its favor. The volunteer system was never just. It put the burden of defending the country and the free institutions of our country upon the shoulders of those who were willing to make whatever sacrifices were necessary in order to win the battles and permitted those other citizens who were equally bound by every rule of patriotism and of righteousness to escape these burdens, if in their own opinion, or if in their own desire, they preferred that course. It matters not how many battles the volunteers won, how heroic their sacrifices, how splendid their performances upon the field of battle; the other fact remains that there were thousands of men back home, many of them waxing fat and enduring none of the hardships of war, claiming and enjoying all the rights of citizenship in a Government which Lincoln declared at the time was "dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." The system which permitted this, in my opinion, was wrong, and it can not be justified by the mere recital of the fact that the battles fought under it were won. Be that, however, as it may, it is a condition that confronts us now and not a theory, a condition the like of which the world has never witnessed. We have entered into a war which finds no counterpart in all the history of this turbulent earth. Never before in our history could we paraphrase with such ample truth Nelson's immortal signal, "America expects every man to do his duty."

In paying tribute to all the sailors of his fleet at Santiago, including not only the gunners but the men who worked the engines far below, Admiral Schley, with characteristic generosity and justness, said: "This was a battle of shovels, as well as shot." And so it is with this war. It will not and can not be won alone by the men who go upon the battle fields. In the old days when the soldiers carried muzzle-loading rifles and manned muzzle-loading cannon, the question of ammunition was not a particularly serious one. To-day, with all the improved implements of warfare; with rapid-fire guns, repeating rifles, machine guns, and all the modern equipment and complicated ammunition required for the Artillery, tons—yes, millions, even multiplied millions of tons—of ammmunition must be supplied and this will require the services of many, many thousands of able-bodied and patriotic men. As strange and incomprehensible as it may appear the whole world faces a shortage in food supplies; such a shortage that the thoughtful statesman contemplates the possibilities with gravest concern. We must not only feed, clothe, equip, transport, and maintain our own forces, but we must render the same service in a large measure for those of our allies upon whom we must depend to help us win the victory we have dedicated 'our lives, our fortunes, and most sacred honor" to attain. To say that we should proceed in such an emergency to enter upon an enterprise so inconceivably gigantic, without the directing hand of some central power to adjust the complicated machinery to the end that there may be a harmonious prosecution of the task, is to fly in the face of reason and common sense and exalt a sentimental theory beyond all justification or reason.

Jefferson Davis, in arguing one phase of the question of conscription to a member of the Confederate Senate who was opposing it, exclaimed almost in desperation, "If the Confederacy fails, there should be written on its tombstone, 'Died of a theory.'" If we undertake to fight this war leaving it to every citizen to determine for himself the manner in which he shall perform the duties which rest upon us all alike, and predicate our justification upon the fact that we have won our wars heretofore by similar methods, then when the day of awful judgment comes, as it will surely come, no more fitting epitaph than the one above quoted could be found to mark the resting place of our theory-stricken institutions.

In a letter written by Jefferson Davis to Gov. Joseph E. Brown, of Georgia, in 1862, which is reproduced in The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government, the whole subject of conscription is set out so forcefully that I commend its careful perusal to all who are interested in this subject. No man, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, in the long history of this Republic was better equipped from training and experience to speak on this subject than Jefferson Davis, and whenever I find authority and justification in any of his writings for the course which I am pursuing I confess that I have a most reassuring sense that my course is safe, and I thereafter proceed with confidence. It is urged by some not only that it is unfair but that it is wicked and outrageous to draft men for service except to repel an invasion. This was exactly the position taken by Gov. Brown.

Let me call your attention to the following extract from Mr. Davis's letter on that very point, and it is almost remarkable how thoroughly apt his statement is to this present controversy. To those who have and still are, unhappily, denouncing this country for engaging in a war to protect the rights of those of our citizens who go down to the sea in ships this quotation is especially commended. I read again from the letter to Gov. Brown:

> At some future day, after our independence shall have been established, it is no improbable supposition that our present enemy may be tempted to abuse his naval power by depredations on our commerce and that we may be compelled to assert our rights by offensive war. How is it to be carried on? Of what is the army to be composed? If this Government may not call on its arms-bearing population otherwise than militia and if the militia can only be called forth to repel invasion, we should be utterly helpless to vindicate our honor or protect our rights. War has been well styled "the terrible litigation of nations." Have we so formed our Government that in this litigation we must never be plaintiffs? Surely this can not have been the intention of the framers of our compact.

The committee bill provides that we shall call for volunteers, and that if they fail to respond then and in that event the President shall be authorized to resort to compulsory service. I believe this is a war in which every man in this country should and every man must be required to do that which not in his opinion is best for the Government but that which, in the opinion of the Government, is best for him to do. We can get volunteers, I believe. Many would go who ought not to go. I believe we would get them, but I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet. Suppose the volunteers would not go forward in sufficient numbers? Gentlemen who have been extolling the efficiency of the volunteer and who are assuming to represent the volunteer upon this floor have dealt in most extravagant abuse and unjust criticism, I think, of the men who fail to volunteer. Now, if we call for these volunteers and they do not go, then what? "Leave it to the citizen," they declare, "to decide whether he should enlist," and denounce him as a coward and a slacker if he decides not to do so. How can such a system be justified? Under the provision of the House bill, we are to put this stigma of cowardice and all the opprobrium that attaches to the word "slacker" upon the men of the country who fail to answer the first call by conscripting them and forcing them into the Army. In this way two distinct classes will be called upon to serve together—the patriotic volunteer and the so-called unpatriotic slacker.

In justice to all, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any such system. Let us start out with the theory that when it comes to serving the country all men are in fact equal. Let us say to all, "You owe a duty which you ought to perform in this crisis, and the Government proposes to determine what that duty shall be and not leave it to the fallible, though thoroughly patriotic, determination of the citizen." Let us be just and fear not. [Applause.]

We are frequently reminded that conscription in the South was not a success; that it was rather a "howling failure." This is only partly true. Of all the troops who were mustered into the service as volunteers, many—very many in fact—had enlisted for 12 months. Speaking of this, Mr. Davis says in his book explaining the effect of the conscription law of 1862:

> The existing organization of companies, regiments, etc., was preserved, but the former were filled up to the number of 125 men. * * * The term of service being lengthened, the changes by discharges and by receiving recruits were diminished, so that, while additions were made to the forces already in the field, the discipline was greatly improved.

And then he declared:

> This was the first step toward placing the army in a permanent and efficient condition.

The "howling failure" of the law referred to so frequently was occasioned not by the fact of enforced service but because of the unwise exemptions contained in the law. As it was written men who owned 20 slaves were exempt; overseers and various other classes were exempt from draft, and the cry was raised throughout the South that it was "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight." Unfortunately, that same criticism is being whispered somewhat to-day. I have heard of it, at any rate, coming from the State of Mississippi. The insidious and wicked doctrine is being preached that this war was brought about and that we have entered into it in order that certain interests may prosper and certain men grow rich; that in order that J. P. Morgan and his fellow plutocrats of Wall Street may fatten their already swollen purses, our boys are to be sent to war to die upon the battle fields of Europe. Every patriot knows that this is false and resents it as a wicked slander upon his country. If it was ever true in the history of our country, it is true to-day, that no sordid interest has tainted our purpose, but that we have entered this war in defense of the rights of our citizens and of the liberties of man, to the end "that government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let us remember that we are in war and that we have been drawn into that war by the most despotic military power that ever appeared upon the earth. A mad monarch, dreaming of world power, now threatens every free government in the world, and unless he is conquered in Europe we will have him to fight on American soil. God give us the foresight and the courage to prepare now and to strike, and strike hard, while other nations can help in putting down this brutal disturber of the world's peace. [Applause.]

Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma, in an able speech the other day, told of how the German autocracy had kept all Europe in a state of unrest and dread by her military preparations and how a few years ago, at The Hague, Germany prevented disarmament. And, Mr. Chairman, Senator JAMES, the able and eloquent Senator from Kentucky, in discussing war with Germany, told of attending the peace conference in London a few years ago. He said:

I attended a great peace conference in London about 11 years ago, where more than 20 nations of the world had assembled. England was there, France was there, Italy was there, Russia was there, but Germany was not there.

So it is clear that the German autocracy did not want peace. While other nations were talking disarmament and praying for universal peace, the German autocracy was preparing to live by the sword, and now, according to the Bible, she must die by the sword. [Applause.]

The President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, has asked for an army of a million men. I was under the impression at first that the plan proposed by the President for raising an army was the old conscript plan, and I know that under that plan those near at hand, who could be reached conveniently and quickly, were the ones upon whom the burdens and hardships of that system had fallen and would fall. The old conscript system was justly unpopular. Other gentlemen here, like myself, were opposed to what they supposed to be the plan of the President, and this was because we had not seen that plan and did not understand it. But, Mr. Chairman, I found, as other gentlemen here did, upon investigation that the President's plan for drawing and selecting an army from the men of the fighting age in the United States was not at all like the old conscript plan. There was nothing fair about the old conscript system. It was unintelligent and unscientific. The conscript officer went out and took men wherever he found them, without regard to their occupations and their usefulness to the country at home, and, as soon as his presence was narated around, those who could and wished to do so hid out. So they did not serve the country as soldiers, nor did they contribute to its support in farm or factory, for they were afraid of being arrested and dragged into the Army. So under the old unintelligent conscript system men were taken who ought to have been left on the farms and in factories and other occupations, and others escaped who ought to have gone to the front, and still others were frightened away from useful service to the country. Under the plan suggested by the President—that of drawing and selecting an army from the list of men of the fighting age—names of men on the new Army registration list will be placed in a box and shaken up, and then, one by one, they will be drawn out and announced. Then the occupation of the man will be inquired into, and if it is found that he can best serve the country by continuing the work that he is doing he will be designated by the Government to do that work. In that event he will not be required to go to a training camp or to undergo physical examination. The boys selected will go into training camps, where they will be well cared for and thoroughly trained for service in the Army.

In this war every man must render service, and he must serve where the Government feels that he can do the most good. The farmer, producing food supplies, can best serve his country upon the farm. The gunmaker can best serve his country in a gun factory. The soldier in the camp or at the front must be supplied with shoes and clothes and tents, food, guns, and ammunition. The people of the Nation must be fed and clothed. The farm and the factory, the railroad trains, and all other useful industries must be kept going. The President's plan registers all men of the fighting age, and this roll enables the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to know just what the fighting strength of the country is; and it also enables him to raise an army and carry on war without demoralizing and crippling necessary agencies and productive industries at home. Every man of the fighting age owes military service to the country whenever the country needs that service. The obligation to fight when the country is at war rests alike upon all men of the fighting age. Now, then, if all these men of the fighting age owe military service in time of war, and if all of them are under the same obligation to fight for the country, why should the Government, in raising an army, adopt a plan that will permit thousands to ignore the call to service and escape their part of the burdens of the war while others with more pride and patriotism come forward and endure dangers and hardships in the discharge of a duty that rests not only upon them but upon thousands of others who decline to respond to the call? It is not fair to the boys of spirit and courage to raise this army by the volunteer plan. Why should these boys be permitted to come forward and make sacrifices and brave dangers in acknowledging their obligation to fight for the country, while thousands of others refuse to do their part and bear their share of the burden? If the men of the fighting age in the United States who, so far as they are concerned, really like the volunteer plan the best, had not seen the principle of justice and fair play in the President's plan, they would have flooded the President and the Congress with telegrams and petitions; but they have not done so, and why? Simply because they recognize that while they are willing to answer to the call of duty that there are others who need the assistance of the Government to help them hear and respond to the call of duty. [Applause.]

If all men of the fighting age owe military service and all are under the same obligation to fight, then there ought to be a fair and just plan devised by which service can be required. The brave man is always ready to do his duty, but he ought not to be required or permitted to do more than his part. The fathers and mothers of the country are willing for their boys to bear their fair share of the burdens of government, to contribute to its support in time of peace and to fight for its preservation in time of war, but they are not willing for their boys, simply because they have the courage and the disposition to volunteer and fight, to do so, while others who owe the same kind of service are permitted to shirk their duty. They do not like the system that permits their boys, from a sense of patriotic duty, to march off to war, while thousands who are under the same obligations to fight remain at home simply because they do not wish to do their part. Thousands of young men are ready and willing to fight, but they are not willing to risk their lives while thousands of others, upon whom the same kind of responsibility rests, remain out of service, simply because they do not wish to do their duty. The average young man had rather see the Government place the names of all the men of the fighting age upon a roll showing the fighting strength of the country and giving the number of all those who owe military service, and, Mr. Chairman, the young man of courage and intelligence had much rather be selected from a roll like that, where all, rich and poor alike, who owe military service, can be required to serve, than to volunteer his service and fight under a system that acknowledges equal obligation to fight but does not require equal responsibility in fulfilling the obligation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, society is an organism composed of mutually dependent members, and the Government, the constituted authority of society, has no right to permit one class of its male citizens of the fighting age to escape military service when the country needs that service and place the burden of defending the country upon men who are willing to volunteer. The country should draw its fighting force from the body of the people through a system fair and just to all. We do not rely upon voluntary contributions for taxes to support the Government in time of peace, and why should we rely upon voluntary service in time of war when the life of the Nation is at stake?

The Government has enacted laws which exact from every citizen the amount of taxes that it thinks he should pay, and that same Government has the right to expect and demand, if need be, military service from every able-bodied citizen of the fighting age. Men who are protected by the Government in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness are subject to the call of that Government when war comes and fighting is necessary. The man of the fighting age is transformed from citizen to soldier whenever the country calls him. He belongs to the standing Army of the United States and when Congress declares that the country is at war, no able-bodied man of the fighting age has the right to remain at home in his comfort and ease simply because he does not want to fight. Why should some individuals, on account of cowardice or other unworthy cause, be permitted to remain at home and force the responsibility of defending the Nation upon men who have spirit and patriotism enough to be willing to fight and to die for their country?

Mr. Chairman, we all agree that all men of the fighting age owe military service to the country and yet, under the volunteer plan, the newly naturalized foreigners and hundreds of thousands who have come into our country in the last few years can flatly refuse to render military service. This ought not to be. Then there is the negro problem, and it is largely confined to the Southern States. Young white men are already saying, "We are willing to go and fight for the country, but we do not feel that we should be taken out of communities where there are large negro populations and leave the negro boys at home to become the tools of German spies and agents in stirring up trouble for our people." Under your volunteer plan, you can not compel the negro to render military service and everyone of them can flatly refuse to serve, and, Mr. Chairman, I will not vote for a plan that will call the brave young white men out of these Southern States and leave thousands of negro boys behind to be a menace to the peace and happiness of the white people in these localities in the South. [Applause.] Under the selective-draft plan we can compel negro boys to do military service, and the fact that we can compel them to go to war will have a very wholesome effect upon the lawless element. It will rather encourage and promote good conduct on the part of the negro criminally inclined, and it will place some of that race in negro regiments for service in this war.

Under your volunteer plan the South would furnish more than her share of the soldiers. She has a litle more than one-fourth of the population of the country and yet the report on the number who have volunteered to serve with Col. Roosevelt shows that 60 per cent of them live in the South. The selective-draft plan will draw the soldiers according to the population of States. The power must be lodged somewhere to call out the fighting force to defend the life of the Nation from the dangers that may threaten it. Suppose you did not have this power anywhere and the country should be invaded by a foreign foe, and suppose he should land his forces at Mobile, Ala., or at New Orleans, La., and the North, the East, and the West should say, "We will not call upon our boys to volunteer to go into the South to help drive out the invader, but we will wait until he invades our particular territory." Why, we would say that this is not a sovereign Nation where the people are united in heart and purpose to stand together and fight together for the happiness and well-being of all. But, Mr. Chairman, under President Wilson's selective-draft plan, the Government would select soldiers from every State in the Union and send them to the section invaded and the blow against the South would be regarded as a blow against the Nation. [Applause.] You gentleman have coupled the volunteer plan with the selective-draft plan and you say by that that the selective-draft plan is sound and worthy of being used by the Government in raising an army. But you say use the volunteer plan first and if it fails why then use the selective-draft plan. So the plan that the President likes best and the one that he insists upon, you indorse, but you ask him to try the volunteer plan first. And yet you provide that he may reject at once your volunteer plan if he wishes to do so and put into operation immediately the selective-draft plan. Now, then, why will you cause delay and undertake to embarrass the President by tying onto the selective-draft system a plan that he has told you he does not want and a plan that has already failed in the National Guard and the Regular Army? [Applause.] Seven hundred thousand men can now volunteer and enter the National Guard and the Regular Army and all who wish to volunteer can now come into these branches of the service through the volunteer system.

The selective-draft plan will not keep out of the Army a very great many of those who wish to volunteer. It will be the means of rejecting some of them because they can better serve their country where they now are, and if there are those selected who have expressed a desire to volunteer, why let the record show, for instance, if they desire it, that John Paul Jones was selected September 1, tendered his services June 2. But, gentlemen, let us remember that we must raise an army quickly. Already German agents in the United States have been carrying on a propaganda against the volunteer enlistment of our boys. They are serving the German Government and doing that which they believe is to the best interest of Germany and a significant fact, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this matter of raising an army to fight Germany is that every German agent and sympathizer in the United States is to-day advocating the voluntary system, and I have concluded that, as between the plan advocated by the agents of the German Government and the plan suggested by the President of the United States, it is my duty as an American citizen to stand with the President. [Applause.] It ought to be clear to the mind of every gentleman in this House that the agents of the German Government now operating in this country are doing all that they can to serve that Government, and when we find them flooding the country with literature opposing the quickest way of raising an army we may be sure that they are helping the German Government, and, gentlemen, innocently or otherwise, if we support their plan, we, too, are aiding the German Government. German money and German agents are active in opposing the President's plan for raising an army. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that some good and loyal Americans in this House and elsewhere are sincerely in favor of the volunteer plan. While that is true, it is also true that no disloyal American and no German spy or agent is in favor of the President's plan, which puts the man force of the country on the fighting list of the United States. [Applause.]

A Member of this House has just told me of a telegram that he received on yesterday from a German—not an American citizen of German blood, but a subject of the German Empire—urging this United States Congressman to vote for the volunteer plan for raising an army. Just think of that. This same German agent a few months ago had written a letter to this Congressman, and when he received the telegram he investigated the situation and found that this man was not a citizen of the United States, but was an agent of the German Government. These agents of the German Government are advocating the volunteer plan, and if we should adopt it, they would flood the country with literature urging the boys not to volunteer. Their purpose is to cause delay and to prevent the raising and the training of an army quickly. Mr. Chairman, if we should be compelled to rely solely upon the volunteer system, all kinds of efforts would be made to make it a failure. Misrepresentations would be made and various kinds of schemes would be resorted to to keep boys from attending the meetings where volunteers would be called for and the Government would be at the mercy of the enemies of the country. Suppose you should adopt the volunteer plan, coupled with the selective-draft plan, as you here propose, and you should ask 112,000,000 people to send into the Army 1,000,000 men, and after 60 days you should find that only 100,000 had volunteered, then, under your plan you have authorized the Government to go out and compel the other 900,000 men to come and serve, and when you do that you have class distinction in your Army. One would be called the volunteer and the other the conscript soldier. But if you place them all on the roll of the fighting men of the Nation and select the Army from that list you will never hear of class distinction. Uncle Sam will call the roll and in a fair and intelligent manner select his Army. He will say to the young man chosen, "Young man, you have been selected as one capable and in every way worthy to bear arms in defense of your country. You have responded nobly to the call of duty, and now in the name of a hundred million people I bid you go and battle in defense of American rights and liberties." [Applause.] And if this boy should die in battle, write upon his tomb, "Here lies an American soldier selected by his Government to fight in defense of his country. He did his duty nobly and died fighting for his country." [Applause.]

If you should force the country to rely solely upon your volunteer plan, what do you suppose would happen? Why, those German propagandists would do everything in their power to induce people not to volunteer, and they would make such a campaign against it that when you went out to force men into service you would have serious trouble. So when you postpone the selective-draft plan you simply give the enemies of the Government time and opportunity to delay and hinder the Government in its efforts to speedily raise and train an army. Why, Mr. Chairman, way back in the days of Moses the principle was recognized that all men of the fighting age owed military service to the country. The Bible tells us that Moses asked the children of Gad and the children of Reuben if they thought that it was right for them to remain at home while their brethren went to war. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to recall to the gentleman's mind the fact that Moses himself was a drafted man. When he was first drafted he wanted to stand aside and let Aaron go.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; that is true. And again, the Bible tells us that the army of the Lord was chosen from the sons of Reuben and from the Gadites and from the tribe of Manasseh, and that they were taken from the valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword and to shoot with bow, and so forth. And when the children of Ammon hired Syrians to battle against the army of the Lord, David, the man after God's own heart, sent Joab out to select from the choice men of Israel an army to go out and battle for the Lord against the Syrians. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield to the gentleman, although my time is very short.

Mr. ADAMSON. Just a word to help the gentleman and Brother BARKLEY with the Scripture a little bit. The churches will not allow a man to volunteer and preach. They are called. Jesus selected or drafted all of his Disciples, and when Judas went out his successor was selected.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; Jesus went amongst the people himself and picked out or selected his disciples. The Baptist and Presbyterian denominations select their preachers and the preachers of other denominations are selected by some authority in the church. We select school-teachers to instruct our children, and we pick out or select men for jury duty.

Mr. Chairman, let us say to the brave boys who are willing to volunteer, you honor yourselves and the Nation by tendering your services to the country, and we honor and commend you for your patriotic act, but you do not owe any more to your country and there is no more reason why you should go and fight than hundreds and thousands of American boys who are capable of rendering military service to the country, and young gentlemen, we do not propose that the men of patriotism and self-sacrificing spirit shall fight the battles of the country while thousands of able-bodied men of the war age escape service simply because they do not desire to fight. [Applause.] And, young gentlemen, while you are willing to fight and we welcome you into the service, it is not fair to permit you to make sacrifices and to brave dangers in defense of those who can, but who will not, do their part and render the same kind of service that you are willing to give. The Mississippi boy, mentioned in this debate to-day by Mr. HUMPHREYS, expressed the feeling of every brave boy in the country when he said, "No; I have not volunteered, and I am not going to volunteer; but I am ready to fight if necessary, and if it falls to my lot to be drawn or selected from the list of men who owe military service to the country, I am ready to do my part." [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] touched the very heart of this question when he told of his experience as a volunteer in the Spanish-American War. He was the youngest of six sons, and unmarried. His father gave his consent, and then he said, "My father and I went to my mother to get her consent, and while she gave it, I shall never forget that sad and trying ordeal, and from that day to this I have been against the volunteer plan, because I do not think that the mothers of the country should be called upon to decide the fate of their sons." [Applause.]

Why should you adopt a plan for raising an army that will put such an unpleasant task up to the mothers of the country. You are putting a terrible question up to the mother. It may be a life-and-death question, and why should you put her in the heart-rending position of feeling that she, by her consent, is responsible for the death of her boy if he should be killed in battle. The mother had rather see her boy of the fighting age take his chance of being drawn for service along with other boys of the fighting age, and then, if he is selected, she feels that he has responded to the call of his country, and if he should lose his life in the Army, she at least will be spared the sad reflection that she, by giving her consent for him to go, is responsible for his death. Gentlemen of the House, the mothers of the country feel that if all the boys of the fighting age owe military service to the country, then responsibility for fulfilling that obligation ought to rest upon all alike. [Applause.] But one gentleman suggests that he does not want to see the selective-draft plan adopted, because it might take some boys out of his district, and if it did and one of them should be killed, that the mother would say to him, "You voted for a measure that took my boy away." In reply to that suggestion, let me say, suppose we should adopt the volunteer plan and the President should call upon every Member of Congress to go home and speak all over his district calling for volunteers. You go and beg the boys to join the Army. Now, suppose 15 or 20 boys should come forward at one of these meetings and after awhile one of them is killed in battle and his mother should come to you and say, "You voted for a plan that called for volunteers and you put upon me the unpleasant duty of giving my consent for my boy to go, not only that but you came here and made a speech, and you asked the boys if they had any patriotism or if they were a lot of cowards, and under the plan that you proposed and through your campaign for volunteers, my boy responded and now he is dead. Hundreds of boys about the same age of mine did not even attend the meeting which called for volunteers. They did not respond to the call of duty. I would not complain if you had voted for a plan that put my boy on the same footing with other boys, where the principle of fairness would be employed and all would be required to do their part." [Applause.]

Let me present another scene to you, gentlemen. Suppose you should have the volunteer plan by itself and you should go out into your districts calling for volunteers, and suppose you were requested to get 50 boys from each county, and when you had finished the campaign in the first county only 10 boys had come forward to volunteer. Why, gentlemen, you would take these young men by the hand and say, "God bless you, boys. You have responded nobly to the call of your country, but the Government desires and expects 50 men to come from this county, and only 10 have responded." Then you would say, "Young gentlemen, do you believe that it is right and fair for you 10 young men to go and stand in battle line where the Government has said that 50 men from this county shall stand and permit the other 40 to escape their responsibility and remain at home?" Then they would say, "No. You ought to require them to come and share with us a duty that we all owe." [Applause.]

Under your volunteer plan you take boys 18 years of age and, if they will not volunteer, you compel them to serve by using the other plan that you have tied on to the volunteer plan. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this plan is not as fair and equitable as the President's plan. The selective-draft plan offers no opportunity for class distinction. It is fair for all and recognizes the principle of equal obligation and equal responsibility. [Applause.] It does not take the 18, the 19, or the 20 year old boy. It requires that he be 21 years old. I know that some as good men as ever came to this House favor the volunteer along with the selective-draft system, and one of them is the chairman of this committee—HUGH DENT, of Alabama. [Applause.] God never made a truer man. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, let us wake up to the fact that we are in war. Germany is making war upon us, while German spies and agents are stirring up trouble for us right here at home. The sooner the Secret Service force makes public the list of their names and the sooner this Government shoots to death some of these criminals and murderers the better it will be for this country. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; briefly.

Mr. GORDON. Would you shoot the spies to death without a trial?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I would not shoot them without giving them a trial. But they have got to be taught to respect our rights. I saw in the Washington Post this morning a notice where a party of patriotic Americans were having dinner in a hotel in New York. They sent word to the orchestra to play the Star-Spangled Banner, and the German agent in charge refused to permit that glorious old tune to be played. Something ought to have been done to him. [Applause.] I read in a Washington paper the other day that an old American patriot in Chicago had refused to shout for the German Government and German agents murdered him. But the old man was brave, and the last words he said were, "Long live America." [Applause.]

But some gentlemen remind us that Washington called for volunteers. Yes; but gentlemen, you must remember that in the colonial days we had no Government. We were fighting to establish one. Then, we called for men who were willing to come forward and fight to establish a government. Then, there was no constituted authority to act for the people. So it was necessary to call for volunteers. Nobody was authorized to compel service. But now we have a Government of the people to act for the people and to call them to its colors at a time like this. Why should this great Government, now more than a hundred years old, a giant in the family of nations, be required to employ the only means that it had when it was unorganized and struggling to become a nation. Why, gentlemen, you had just as well say that we should now use the old muzzle-loading rifle and musket in preserving our rights and liberties, because our forefathers used them in achieving those rights and liberties.

Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, declared in 1812 that every citizen must be subject to military duty, and that the country would not be safe until that principle was adopted. Washington, the leader of the Continental Army, declared that a peremptory draft of men was the only effectual plan. Here are the two greatest leaders of colonial times declaring against the volunteer system and giving us the benefit of their experience and counsel. [Applause.] And the recent sad experience of England with the volunteer system warns us to profit by her example.

And, Mr. Chairman, President Wilson, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, the man upon whom rests the responsibility of conducting this war, asks us to give him the selective-draft plan, and saying that he is convinced that it is the fairest, the wisest, and the best of all the plans proposed. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the committee, this country is now called upon to fight for her own preservation and for the preservation of the ideals and principles of Christian civilization. God pity the man who can not see and appreciate our situation. [Applause.] The God of our fathers kept this country hid from kings for thousands of years, and in His own good time He sent Columbus to lead the way for the persecuted men and women from every clime and country, and those who loved liberty and the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience came here and dedicated their all to the cause of liberty. [Applause.] Here we have grown to be a mighty people, more than a hundred millions strong. We have accumulated the wealth of the world, and to-day we are the richest Nation upon the globe. God had a purpose in permitting us to accumulate this wealth, and He had a purpose in making us a strong and mighty nation. [Applause.] To-day, in response to duty and destiny, we are getting ready to strike the blow that will end military despotism, secure our own safety, and bring lasting peace to the people of the world. [Applause.] Every liberty-loving nation upon the earth is looking to this giant Republic to strike the decisive blow for liberty and civilization. [Applause.] Mr. Balfour, the foremost statesman of the Old World, is here as our friend and ally in this mighty struggle, and Marshal Joffre—God bless him!—the intrepid and victorious commander of the French forces at the Battle of the Marne, is here as the friend and ally of our Nation. [Applause.]

In the old days the wise men of the East turned with faith and hope to the star that stood over the cradle of the infant Christ, and to-day the liberty-loving men of the Old World are turning with faith and hope to America, where the Bethlehem Star of the West shines above liberty's mighty stronghold. [Applause.] And, God helping us, we will not fail in our duty to ourselves, to God, and to humanity. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a little more than three weeks ago the President of these United States appealed to this Congress in his great war message, and this Congress, freed at last from diplomatic restraint, cast doubts and fears to the winds and followed him. To-day completes three weeks of war. What have these three weeks meant to us? We have calmly gone about the business of preparation. Why, sir, when Belgium had been three weeks at war her plains were drenched with the blood of her sons, France was reeling from the blows of the supermachine of German power, and England was reading her first casualty lists. Even Russia was at grips with the foe.

It is not a special providence or divine dispensation which has kept the Prussian wolf from our doors, but, on the contrary, it is the very human British Royal Navy to which we owe this breathing spell in which to gather our forces for the titanic struggle which is already dawning for this Republic with the bitterest and most implacable foe we have ever encountered, not even excepting the Apache and Comanche of our western border wars. The President says, "The supreme test of the Nation has come." What have we done to meet that test? We have passed a handful of bills, and among them the largest war credit ever voted by any nation at any time. Seven billion dollars is a sum so huge that it passeth comprehension. It represents the sum total of the minted gold of all the nations of the world, and should we gather together the gold in which we guarantee to repay that credit we would be required to collect every minted piece of coined gold from every nation to reach the great total which, great as it is, is still but a beggarly 2 per cent of our national wealth. Does any Member of this House, does any Member of the Senate, does any citizen of this country feel any glow of pride in that action? Can anyone feel that in voting the great loan we have actually accomplished anything? If such there be he must be of the kindred of that heedless householder who, on giving his patient grocer a promissory note for a long overdue bill, remarked in a voice of deep satisfaction, "Well, thank God, that is paid at last."

If there be those who hold this kind of hope as a bandage before their eyes, let them be roused to the fact that all the bonds of the entente allies never turned aside the bullet of a single Prussian grenadier nor swerved a single torpedo from the side of its intended victim. Money we must have, first and all the time; but money will not win this war. Munitions we must have, but money and munitions will not win this war. Men, sir, and more men, trained and equipped men, and money and munitions will win this war. Money we have voted, munitions we can manufacture, but, sir, the question before this House and this country is men and how we shall obtain them.

We have a leader, a Commander in Chief of our armed forces, our President. He is not a party leader, but is the leader of the people of these United States. He is in supreme command. At his behest we declared war on Germany; at his suggestion we mortgaged the resources of future generations to finance the war. His third request is for men to fight the battle of this country, men to carry the flag we love into the thick of the conflict, men to make our solemn declaration of war something more than high-sounding words, and how have we acceded to that request? This House to-day, when it should be a unit, stands divided against itself; and it is as surely true to-day as when it was written that "a city or house divided against itself shall not stand." To-day we stand at the forks of the road debating whether we shall take the primrose path of volunteer dalliance or the upward and straight path of obligatory service. Call it draft, conscription, compulsion, or universal obligation; call it what you will, we know what it is; we know what we want; we want and must have the services of the entire manhood of the Nation. We want enacted into law the President's plan. We must have selective draft.

Just so sure as the Nation embarks on a system of volunteer service just so sure history will write the record as it wrote it after that "rash and fatal charge" at Balaklava that "somebody blundered."

I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are about to commit such a blunder. The only reasons, if sentiment is ever a reason, in favor of the volunteer system are sentimental reasons. The reasons against it are the sound reasons of experience. First and foremost is that a volunteer system is not voluntary. First you call for volunteers, then what do you do? You organize a campaign, you employ speakers, you bring out all the brass bands, and then you proceed to badger, bully, browbeat, coax, cajole, and coerce the young men to volunteer. You teach the young women of the land to pin the white feather of the coward brigade to the lapel of the slacker, the man who is exempt, and the man who has been rejected. You make a hero out of the raw recruit and puff him up with unwon self-esteem. You get two classes of men by this system—first, men who come in on the first call who are brave enough to go; and second, you get those who are too cowardly to longer stay out and endure the goad of public opinion.

My State, Maryland, has just completed her quota of 800 for the Navy. These men came in at the first call. They are the men who are brave enough to go. They form now, as they ever have formed, the first line of defense. But in this war we must have new and more men. We must campaign steadily for men, if we are to get enough; and, sir, the men you round up on your recruiting drives are not volunteers, neither are they one whit more patriotic or better men than those we can pick by a selective draft.

The second objection I present to the volunteer system is that it is not democratic, in that it does not bear equally on all the manhood of the Nation. We have no volunteer system for obeying the laws of the Nation, no volunteer system for paying the Nation's taxes. These things are compulsory that all may bear the burden. Now, we fight for the Nation's life, the highest obligation of them all. Shall we thrust this burden on the shoulders of the willing few and those we can drive into the service. No; a thousand times no. Let the greatest burden rest where the lesser burdens of the Government rest, on the shoulders of all. It is the only fair, the only just, the only democratic levy we can make.

My third objection is that a volunteer system is not efficient. It is inefficient in that it does not produce enough men; it enrolls men who should be at work elsewhere and it protects the skulker, the shirker, and the coward. That it fails to produce enough men is the bitter, bitter experience of Great Britain. Volunteerists say, "Every Englishman to-day fighting in France volunteered for the war." Yes; that may be true, but to-day England is short about 2,000,000 men, which she ought now to have on the western front to strike the decisive blow. Why has she not those men? Because they failed to volunteer, and it took a cabinet upheaval to enact the conscription, and then, when it was a law, it took time to get the troops together and to train them. Lost time, lost opportunity, lost men by the thousands on thousands—that is the real story of the blunder England made, and is the fact behind the boast of the volunteerists.

We must learn our lesson from our enemies as well as from our allies. Germany mobilized her entire man power for this war, how—by volunteers? Hardly. Every German is a German soldier. We must fight fire with fire. We must soon legislate for universal service that will differ from that of Germany in one vital particular. There it is universal service by the will of the Emperor; here it shall be by the will of all the people. That difference is so vast that the cry of Prussianizing the United States is silly and childish. Why, France has had for generations universal service. Her trained soldiers served their terms in the army and went back into the citizenship of the country and merged as completely as rain upon the ocean. Yet France, with her trained citizenry unmobilized, mobilized, prepared, and stopped Germany in the flood tide of her success, and the battle of the Marne wrote the beginning of defeat for the German Empire. France was not militaristic, nor will it ever be. But France has called her entire man power into this fight for her national existence. We fight for no less, and we must fight on the scale laid down by our enemies. Not in numbers of thousands of men and millions of dollars, as all prior wars have been fought, but in numbers of millions of men and billions of dollars.

Because before Germany could cross the Swiss border she must face 300,000 trained men behind 300,000 modern rifles. Because when before the war a German officer said to a general in the Swiss Army, "but what will your 300,000 Swiss do in case twice the number come against them?" "In that case" said the general, "each Swiss soldier will be required to fire two shots." That is the result of universal service. That is the efficiency that spells peace for Switzerland. That is the universal service which is democracy itself in France.

Maryland, the birthplace of that immortal anthem, the Star-Spangled Banner, has ever done her duty when the independence, integrity, and defense of the country required. She stands for patriotism, justice, and the rights of humanity. Her people believe that if you would fight this war successfully and achieve victory, it is necessary to enter by definite and well-laid plans—plans upon which the War Department can definitely depend and act. Our Maryland delegation has weighed well the question and will follow the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the selective-draft feature of the bill now before the Senate, known as the Chamberlain bill, and which I understand embodies the views of the minority members of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House.

I feel that this is no time for experiments and that we can not afford to wait until the volunteer system has been tried, and then in the event of its failure attempt to raise an army when the enemy is at our gates.

We have been trying for months to fill up the Navy of the Nation by the volunteer system, and while I am proud to say that my own State of Maryland has raised her full allotment of 800 men after a most active campaign, here in Washington, the Nation's Capital, after a campaign covering weeks in which the aid and eloquence of high officials of the Government have been enlisted, they have not yet raised their quota. Many States have not raised a handful of men under the recent call of the Navy for 38,000 men; and if men can not be obtained for the Navy, what reason have we to believe they can be raised for the Army?

Great stress is being laid on the fact that the War Department wants to place the burden of this war on the young men of the country between the ages of 19 and 25 years. Do not the opponents of the selective draft realize that the Army and Navy are even now, while this bill is being considered, being filled by boys between the ages of 16 and 18 years, who have been attracted to the recruiting office by the blare of brass bands; and once their names are obtained committees are appointed to persuade parents to give their consent to the enlistments, and then these youths are marched away to the training ships, ofttimes without a handclasp from those who remain behind, many of whom are as physically and financially able to go as those who have enlisted to serve their country.

According to one of the metropolitan papers, more than 50 young men were marched through the streets of one of our large cities and allowed to stand for several hours in a cold rain without topcoats, and with nothing to protect them from the storm but their regulation blouses.

Make this obligation universal, falling alike on rich and poor, and when the Nation calls I venture the assertion that when they leave for the front they will be accorded the recognition to which they are entitled by a grateful people. A great deal has been said about the splendid traditions of the past, and no one has any more reverence than I for the wonderful courage of the men who for seven years fought as no men had ever fought before to make the Declaration of Independence a living reality, and of those who drove the English Army from our shores in 1812, and we all rejoice in the splendid courage displayed by the men who in 1861 enlisted on both sides in that great conflict and fought for what they believed to be the right; yet victory at this time, engaged as we are in a fight for liberty and the rights of humanity, is worth more than tradition.

They say that to draft men now would be a confession that the heart of the country is not at war. On the contrary, it would show to the world that the people of the United States mean business, and every man who offers himself will be anxious that all others who are physically able follow his example. These men will not oppose a selective draft.

The statement has also been made that one volunteer soldier is worth three who are drafted into the service, and this statement has been repeated over and over again, and this in the face of the fact that the brave men of France, whose soldiers have lived up to every high tradition of the men who fought under Lafayette for American liberty on our soil, to say nothing of the marvelous machine which Germany has builded and at which the world has marveled, are all drafted men.

We have been told that the selective-draft bill is unpopular and it is not politically expedient to support it. And I contend that in this great moment of national peril no man can afford to do otherwise than his duty to his country first and foremost and not take into consideration the political effect of his vote. And I have confidence in the membership of this House that it will so act and vote, having only in view the best interest of our common country as we see it.

I favor the selective draft as the most scientific method of raising an adequate Army and at the same time giving protection to the industrial and agricultural needs of the Nation, believing that if at the end of six months we are still at war with the Imperial German Government every American will be devoutly thankful that we have an adequate and well-trained Army. If peace is made before that time no great hardship will have been imposed on the men who are honored by being selected to serve the Nation in its hour of grave peril.

War has been declared, and we can no more afford to rest our national security on the uncertainties of the volunteer system than we can afford to send wooden ships, which might have been effective a hundred years ago, against the dreadnaughts of the German Navy.

Under the selective-draft system such men as are necessary in the production of foodstuffs and supplies will be utilized to produce these necessities. And those who must do the fighting will be assured that their every want will be supplied so far as the Government is able to regulate these matters.

Let us not make the mistake that was made by England, who, after taking men from the factory and training them in the army camps, was forced to bring them back from the firing line in order that they might be put to work making supplies to meet the needs of the army.

I believe, however, that the Government should establish a fair and more equitable basis of compensation for those who are selected for the Army, as I consider the pay of privates and noncommissioned officers entirely too low, and it is my purpose at the proper time to offer an amendment providing that the pay of privates shall not be less than $33 per month, corporals not less than $40, and sergeants not less than $50 per month.

During the threatened trouble on the Mexican border provisions were made by Congress to pay to the dependents of those who were drafted into the Federal service through the medium of the National Guard compensation not to exceed $50 per month. While this placed the dependents of those at the front in the position of receiving charity from the Government, at the same time it did prevent actual want.

It would be much more just and equitable to pay these men sufficient to contribute something to the support of those at home. And, aside from the justice of this, it would show that the Government is trying to be fair to those who are doing the fighting, and would, I feel sure, encourage and stimulate recruiting. We can not expect men who are earning four or five dollars per day in factories to enlist or to submit cheerfully to a draft when the Government pays them at the rate of $15 or $18 a month. And while $33 per month, as provided by my amendment, is not all they are entitled to, it will at least show that we are ready to recognize the sacrifices they are making by providing for this small increase in their pay.

England, which until a short time ago was the only other great nation entirely dependent on its volunteer system, formerly paid her private soldiers less than $8 per month, and I am informed that in Canada, where the splendid courage of the common soldier is without a superior in military annals, they will not only pay each private $33 per month, but provide $23 per month for his wife if he is married.

Out of the billions we are spending to carry on this war, let us provide a fair basis of pay for those who must go to the front and possibly into the trenches, and upon whose shoulders will fall the heaviest burden of this war.

Let us raise the basis of pay for the noncommissioned officers as well, so as to hold out encouragement to the young men of the country whom we are asking to sacrifice everything, even life itself, for the common welfare.

I, too, am a descendant of an immigrant from that mountainous Republic so eloquently referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska, which has maintained its freedom and independence as a Republic for a thousand years while surrounded on all sides by monarchies. And I am not unmindful of the fact that she has kept her land free from invasion in this war by mobilizing the citizens of the Swiss Republic, each one of whom is subject to universal military service, on her frontier, and has been prepared to prevent invasion at the point of the sword if necessary.

We are all trying here to take such steps as will best meet the needs of this trying hour, and I have faith in the American Congress to meet the problem which now confronts us, and that we will from this bill formulate the legislation necessary to put our country in a thorough and adequate state of preparedness. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief. If there ever was a time for cool-headed decision and calm, outspoken opinion, it is now. The whole world is apparently involuntarily "war mad," but underneath the surface of all this wild involuntary war hysteria is a stratum of good, old-fashioned, common-sense patriotism, which, after all, is the bedrock foundation of our institutions. Firmly embedded in that foundation are the very roots of our national life and existence. It is upon this broad base of democratic patriotism that the superstructure of our boasted civilization shines out as a bright star in the world's firmament of hope. It was on this foundation that our forefathers laid the corner stone of this Republic, which for more than a hundred years has withstood the assaults of warring nations from without and the consuming fires of dissolution and rebellion from within. As long as we preserve inviolate the foundation stones of this Republic cemented together by voluntary common-sense patriotism our Nation will continue to grow broader and stronger with the roll of ages. [Applause.]

It was the voluntary common-sense patriotism of our forefathers which caused them to leave their plows standing in the fields of promise and go forth to fight the battles of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill. It was this same patriotism of the American people which led them to fight under Abraham Lincoln the consuming fires of dissolution and rebellion which threatened to consume and destroy the great institutions which they had founded. In later years it was American patriotism that drove the last vestige of Spanish tyranny from the American continent and made the Cuban people free. To-day it is the same common-sense patriotism voiced by that great American Speaker of this House which is going to preserve for us and those who come after us the basic principles of democracy on which our institutions rest. It is the common-sense courage, judgment, and patriotism of such men that will preserve for us for all time a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

It takes courage to stand up and stem this tide of "involuntary-service" doctrine sweeping across the continent through the agency and concerted action of a class or caste of propagandists who would hastily fasten upon this Republic a system of involuntary servitude which would doom our institutions to certain destruction.

I believe in the principle of free speech and of the freedom of the press, but to-day the man who dares to voice his honest convictions on the questions of voluntary and involuntary servitude on the floor of this House, or in the Senate, or elsewhere, if his views differ from those who believe in involuntary military conscription, is forthwith denounced in the columns of the press as disloyal to his constituents and a traitor to his country. If it be traitorous to conscientiously oppose what you believe will lead to the establishment in this Republic of a despotic military system, then, gentlemen, do I plead guilty to the charge.

The Constitution of the United States was an instrument intended as the basis of a free Government, and its provisions should be construed in accordance with free principles and interpreted in the very spirit of freedom itself. Conscription or involuntary servitude is contrary to the very principles of our Government and inconsistent with the liberties and security of our people. Those of you who for one moment believe that the American people will approve of the establishment of an involuntary military system dangerous at all times to our free institutions and the life of the Nation itself are sadly mistaken. Such a system is repugnant to the American people, and its establishment would mark the beginning of the end of this Republic.

Issue a call for volunteers and millions will respond to fight—yes, die if need be, in defense of their country. We may select men to fight our battles and make them fight, but men who fight because the law compels them to fight when their hearts are not in it are worse than no men at all. The man who volunteers to fight for love of country and goes forth to answer to his country's call is worth a regiment of "odds and ends" conscripted for that purpose. The right kind of a fighter is a man who is good for something else, and yet by selection you could leave him out and take some "good for nothing" in his place. Monarchies and kingdoms might win battles with such men as these, but a Republic never. Let us not destroy our democracy in order to build up an autocracy. [Applause.]

Better for us and those who come after us that we had never entered this war than to do so at the price of the principles upon which our Government is based.

Better for us that we first protect and safeguard the sacred rights of our own people guaranteed to them under our Constitution than that we should destroy our own Constitution in an effort to destroy the Government o fsome other people. Better for us to depend upon voluntary patriots than that we should attempt to conscript patriots. True patriots need no conscription.

If all the people in this country who have been yelling their heads off for war and writing and petitioning Congress to declare war during the last three years would now come forward and volunteer their services like real men there would be no need for conscription. I have always noticed, however, that "dogs who bark seldom bite," and men who start fights seldom if ever engage. The patriotic propagandists of conscription on "leaky" old Wall Street would not furnish volunteers enough to man a Mullin duck boat, and if you try to secure them by selective conscription they would break their necks falling all over each other in their efforts to secure affidavits from politicians showing their special qualifications for duty at home. Yes; and they would get them, too.

As for the State I have the honor to represent, it will not be necessary to resort to conscription. Nevada is the first State in the Union to come forward with its full quota of troops. Conscription will not be needed there. [Applause.]

Let us not deceive ourselves. War is no picnic. There is a great deal of difference between a voluntary game of golf on the Chevy Chase golf links and a conscriptive game of "pussy wants a corner" in the trenches of Europe. [Laughter.]

No one doubts the patriotism of our President. God knows he is doing what he thinks is best. He is conscientiously performing his duty as he sees it. I am trying to perform mine. Many good and patriotic men in this House and some of the best and most patriotic citizens in my State honestly and conscientiously differ with me on these questions. I have no quarrel with them. They are entitled to their opinions. I also have some opinions of my own and will not hesitate to express them. The people of my State would not deny to me, I am sure, the rights which they reserve for themselves.

I know but one flag. That flag is the American flag. I am an American. [Applause.]

As a Member of this House, now serving my fourth term, I want to state that my vote has always been cast in favor of building up our Navy and our Army and for appropriations adequate to keep both branches in a state of preparation necessary for national defense. I want to have our men and boys who volunteer their services in either of those branches thoroughly equipped with all the necessary implements and accessories of modern warfare.

Those of us who oppose this system are just as patriotic as any of you, and when our country needs us will go just as far and fight just as hard anywhere, any old time, and any old place, and do not you forget it. Do not start off by trying to make American boys fight. They will fight when they want to, and not until then. Do not insult their pride and patriotism by lassoing them and bringing them in. If you need them, say so. Tell them why and ask them to come to the front like American volunteers and your recruiting offices will not be big enough to hold them. You can not make an autocracy out of this free country of ours by any such despotic legislation without doing so over my protest.

In the words of Daniel Webster, who spoke against conscription in his time when the question was up for consideration in Congress:

> A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction, a free government without adequate provisions for personal security is an absurdity, a free government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Once fasten such a system of conscription upon the American people as a starter and nothing will ever remove it. It will place in the hands of a chosen and select few arbitrary powers repugnant to our institutions and give to them the absolute and despotic control of the liberties of all. Such a system is not democratic.

If we had started years ago in this country to create a voluntary system of training in our schools, we would to-day have millions of men ready for active service, and they would not be boys, either. The administration's plan is to place the whole burden of this great war upon the shoulders of our boys. Yes; mere children, if you please. And yet they claim such a system is equitable. It may be, but I must confess I fail to see the equity. Are you going to drag from the homes of this country the flower of our young manhood and send them across the waters to fight and die? Why not let Col. Roosevelt, of "Rough Rider" fame, and whose very heart is in this fight, and who already has at his command thousands of men not subject to draft under the provisions of this bill, and who are anxious and ready to fight, go and get busy. The administration chiefs do not want him and his followers. They would rather take from our American homes the children from their parents and the parents from their children, officer them as conscripts, and compel them to fight for humanity. O democracy, what crimes are committed in thy name!

You are asking us to do what Great Britain herself did not do until she had raised between five and six millions of men as volunteers. None of her colonies have even dared to attempt conscription. Canada, our nearest neighbor, has not thought of conscription. She has raised upward of 400,000 volunteers, but not a conscript. Australia has refused to conscript her citizens as a contribution to the fighting millions across the seas. The best and bravest of all the fighting men at the front are the volunteers. They have always performed their duty as they saw it, and always will.

Yes; under the terms of this bill we have very carefully exempted ourselves. We are a very generous body of men. We are at least modest. It is easy enough to sit down here and provide means by which under the law you can go into the homes and drag from the firesides of this country anyone you desire and put him into the trenches of a foreign land. Such action is a "body blow" to liberty. It is wholly incompatible with any conception of personal liberty.

War is on. It is world-wide. We are in it now, and it is up to us to win it. We will win it no matter what it costs or how long it takes. As Americans we dedicate ourselves to the cause in which we are now engaged. We will win it not by conscription but by the patriotism of a hundred million patriotic Americans. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HOOD].

Mr. HOOD. Mr. Chairman, on account of the misrepresentations as to the provisions of the military bill reported by a majority of the Military Committee, I had concluded that the War Department bill, which was approved by the President, had been changed to such an extent that it was unrecognizable. I find, however, upon examination, that I was in error. The departmental bill reported by a majority of the Military Committee remains intact, with the exception of three amendments, to wit:

First. Changing the ages from 19 to 25 to that of 21 to 40.

Second. Providing for the organization of State or Territorial units.

Third. Providing for an opportunity to volunteer during the time that it will require to put into operation the machinery of the bill requiring registration of all available for military service in connection with this act.

I think these amendments wise and proper, and I shall heartily support them as reported by the committee.

The bill framed by the War Department would snatch from the parental roof immature, inexperienced infants and force them to go into a strange land, among strangers, and perchance be sent to the European trenches to die. I am unalterably opposed to this proposition, and I respectfully submit that the proper way to organize our military forces is to allow them to be organized in State and Territorial units, whereby they will be kept with their boyhood associates and friends. If a young man is required to serve in the Army, it will make it very much less burdensome for him to go with friends and comrades of his home section than be sent hundreds of miles away from home and go out with strangers. If at actual warfare he will have the consolation of realizing that in case of being wounded or killed he will have friends from his home to communicate with his loved ones.

It is practically agreed that the unanimous sentiment of the House will be to accept these two amendments. The controversy, therefore, upon the pending bill seems to hinge around the amendment proposed by the committee, authorizing the President to call for 500,000 volunteers, and, in the event that it becomes necessary, to raise an additional force of 500,000 volunteers during the time in which the military census is being taken. I am heartily and unreservedly in favor of it; I see absolutely no objection to this amendment. It does not interfere in any way with the power of the President, upon completion of the registration of those who are liable to military duty, to get them by selective draft if a sufficient number does not volunteer. Why deny the privilege to any citizen of this land of freedom and liberty an opportunity of tendering his services to the Government? It seems to me it would be undemocratic, unwise, subversive of the very principles of our Government to deny them that privilege. The War Department is willing to accept the volunteer system in increasing the Regular Army and National Guard to its maximum war strength, and then, in the event they fail to get the necessary recruits under that system, this bill gives them authority to draft them. Why should they not be willing to accept the same provisions in connection with the raising of the 500,000 additional increments? To do otherwise would reverse the policy of this country from its foundation. I hope that in compounding the medicine to suppress Prussian aristocracy we will not in doing so contract the same disease that we desire to subdue.

I believe a soldier who volunteers, with love of country in his heart, patriotism in his soul, and a flame of spirit burning within him that prompts the desire to sacrifice and serve his country, and, if needs be, die for it, should not be blotted from the pages of future American history.

I believe we all realize to the fullest extent that the Army we now have is totally inadequate to the needs of the country, and we are of one accord in favor of giving to our great President, Commander in Chief of our Armies, as many men as may be necessary for military purposes in this crucial hour of our Nation. If, of course, the men fail to respond, then the President will have authority, immediately upon completion of the military census, to put in force the selective-draft system as proposed by the department. I believe the volunteer amendment, including the other provisions of the bill, is in thorough accord with the military policies of our country hitherto put in force. There have been objections made to the volunteer system on account of the fact that the authority will be lacking in making the proper discriminations as to those who are to serve. This bill provides the same power for refusing to take the volunteer who is needed at home more than in the Army as that provided in the selective-draft portion of the bill. We hear a great deal about universal military training, and, according to the statistics of the War Department, there are about 22,000,000 men between the ages of 18 and 40 in the United States available for military service. The War Department's measure, as originally drawn, would include about 6,000,000 men from which to draft the increments and would exempt from military duties, for service, 15,000,000 men who are of military age. I do not think, therefore, that the bill proposed by the War Department provides for universal service.

It is understood that the President will be authorized to make such exemptions from military service as he may deem wise and proper. Mr. Chairman, I represent, in part, a State which is one of the thirteen original Colonies, and during her entire history the volunteers of that State in every war in our Nation's history have blazed the pathway of glory upon the battle field, and I am quite sure that she will be willing to do her part in the great struggle which now confronts us.

As a result of the unscrupulous, ruthless, and reckless submarine warfare of Germany that has provoked the antagonism of practically the whole world, I gladly voted that a state of war exists between this country and Germany. We are not prompted by selfishness, greed, conquest, or any other motive, save the cause of our own people, which is the cause of democracy, humanity, and love of right the world over. If the amendment refusing to allow volunteers is eliminated from the bill by a majority vote, I shall not shirk the great duty devolving upon me as a representative of the people. Irrespective of the consequences to me, I shall vote for the bill and take my part of the responsibility in organizing an army such as the demands of the hour require. I shall endeavor, in every way possible, to uphold the hands of our President in prosecuting vigorously, to a glorious termination, the righteous cause in which we are engaged. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE].

Mr. MCLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, for nearly two years a powerful and unscrupulous New York propaganda, composed of the American Defense Society, the National Security League, and other similar organizations, and said to be financed by munitions manufacturers and certain other selfish interests that make money out of war, has been exceedingly busy spreading the doctrine that the people of this country—the people, mind you, Mr. Chairman—"demanded that the United States declare war against Germany," and a war-mad and abusive press has worked overtime to impress upon the public mind the doctrine of this powerful propaganda. At last war was declared, and now this self-same propaganda, backed by this self-same, war-mad press, would deny the people the right to volunteer in the prosecution of a war they were said to have wanted, but instead it would first place upon them the brand of conscription. I believe in American ideals and American traditions, and so believing, I shall never, with my vote, force upon the people a condition that is so un-American and so totally at variance with the principles of our republican form of government as this measure of proscription, and in thus committing myself I believe I am voicing the sentiment of a large majority of the plain people of this country—the people who are the bulwark of the Nation and on whom the Nation must depend in those times of great stress that are usually brought about by the manipulations and machinations of selfish interests.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told, and it has been impressed upon us, that the war in which we are now engaged is for two purposes, namely: To overthrow Prussian militarism and to establish a world-wide democracy. Worthy reasons, no doubt, yet to accomplish them we are asked to ingraft upon our own Government that very military system against which we are now making war, and to replace our democracy with that very autocracy whose end we seek in Prussia. The enatcment of a conscription law will be the first big move in the formation of a military system in this country that can but lead to militarism, and militarism once established will be the beginning of the end of our republican form of government. And universal military training will only serve to perpetuate this militarism. All of our wars have been won with volunteers, and this is the first time in the country's history that conscription has been demanded before the volunteer plan was first given a trial. The War of the American Revolution was won with volunteers, and so was the War of 1812. The independence of Texas was won with volunteers, and 10 years later American volunteers conquered Mexico. And who can recall the War of 1812, Mr. Chairman, without recalling Andrew Jackson and his volunteers at New Orleans: and who can recall the War with Mexico without recalling Jefferson Davis and his Mississippi volunteers, who saved the day at the Battle of Buena Vista? In the War Between the North and South the conscription plan in both sections proved a failure, and in some of the large cities of the North the attempt to enforce conscription was met with serious rioting.

If we are to remain a free people, Mr. Chairman, we must oppose those things that lead to autocracy. With many men, in the mad rush of so-called progressivism, our Constitution is regarded as an ancient document merely designed for the period at which it was written. Its precepts have been trampled under foot until to-day it is referred to often to create a laugh and sometimes a sneer. The many rights it guarantees to the different States have been brushed aside, and to-day we are facing a centralized government that is not far removed from monarchy. And yet there are men who would not stop at this, but instead they would make more complete this centralization of power by placing upon our statute books a conscription law, that chief instrument by which autocratic Governments perpetuate themselves. I was one of the few who voted against the war resolution, and for so voting I have received worlds of censure and abuse from a war-mad press and from people in many sections of the country. Some of this abuse has come from Texas, and in each instance it has imitated the war-mad and abusive press, by charging that I did not represent the sentiment of a majority of the people; and it has been impressed upon me in various ways, that the people wanted this war. If that is true, Mr. Speaker, and the people really wanted this war, then it is quite reasonable to suppose that, wanting the war, they will be willing to prosecute it to a successful termination and will do so without having applied to them the brand of conscription. Anyway, since the charge of wanting the war has been placed upon the people by a subsidized press and its allies, the people then should at least be given a chance to volunteer and thus prove the truthfulness of the charge.

Mr. Chairman, thousands, or I may say millions, of telegrams have been received by the Members of this House the last few days urging them to vote for conscription, for compulsory military training, and for anything else the President may want in carrying out his war plan. Many of these telegrams have come from Texas—from commercial organizations, from so-called mass meetings held in that State. And do you know, Mr. Speaker, why it is that these many telegrams are being sent to Members of Congress? I will tell you: They were sent, and are being sent, at the instigation of the New York propaganda, and I am giving here, leaving a blank space for the name of the Congressman used, the form of telegram sent by the propaganda to some prominent man, usually a banker, in practically every town in Texas that maintains a commercial organization. The telegram bears the New York date line and is as follows:

Representative ———, from your district, is reported opposed to universal military service and blocking President Wilson in his war program. We suggest you organize mass meetings, to show Representative ——— that Americans who sent him to Congress demand that he support universal military training and the President. Have asked cooperation of your local business association. Please work with it and enlist strong newspaper support for this campaign. Please wire us your willingness to fight for a united Nation now.

This is the form of telegram sent out by the American Defense Society, and a similar form, perhaps a little differently worded, is used by the other organizations that help comprise the propaganda. And this accounts for the many telegrams and letters that are being sent from Texas, and I presume from other States as well, "demanding" Congressmen to vote for conscription and universal military training. Can you imagine anything more impudent than this New York propaganda, financed by the manufacturers of war munitions and other selfish interests, dictating to the people of Texas what to do? And can you imagine anything more humiliating than that Texas people should obey the behest of this New York propaganda and with seeming pride issue a "demand" to their Congressman to do the bidding of New York grafters, who have made many millions of dollars out of the European war and expect to make many millions more out of the war in which the United States is now engaged? Mr. Speaker, I am not yet ready to take orders from the American Defense Society—God save the name—or any other New York concern, even though such orders may be transmitted to me through the medium of certain of my constituents; and when I do so far forget myself as to turn to the American Defense Society for advice in casting my vote on any question of public interest, I will notify my constituents to that effect and thus save them the trouble and expense of wiring me the wishes of the New York propaganda.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said that our army of secret-service men is larger than our standing Army and Navy combined. How nearly correct this statement may be I have no way of determining, but I do know that our army of secret-service men is very large, and I also know that they are doing duty for their country—not as conscripts but as volunteers, one and all. Had it been necessary to conscript these men, do you believe our Government could have trusted them? It could not; and yet they are no better than their fellow citizens, who are not to be trusted but are to have placed upon them the brand of conscription before they are first given an opportunity to volunteer their services to their country. One great trouble, Mr. Chairman, is that we are too parsimonious when it comes to paying our soldier boys—the privates and up to and including the first sergeants—and, as they are the ones who must carry the guns and do the fighting, they should be paid in a measure commensurate with the services which they perform. The friends of conscription tell us that this conscription plan is only to last through the war. But they have not convinced me that it does not mean a great deal more, or that such a system as is proposed, when once ingrafted on our Government, will not remain, and changed, if changed at all, only to be made the stronger.

Mr. Chairman, I have received many letters and telegrams from the people of my State urging me to vote for or against conscription. Those from the cities have come principally from boards of trade and chambers of commerce and other commercial bodies, and were in favor of conscription; those from the country have come chiefly from farmers, and were against conscription. The commercial organizations of the cities received their "inspiration" from the New York propaganda; the farmers spoke their honest convictions, and did not have to go to New York for their "inspiration." Mr. Chairman, I have voted for every preparedness measure that has come before this House for the past year or more. I voted to spend billions of the people's money in the prosecution of the war, and I did so without giving scarce a thought to the burden of taxation that will be imposed upon the people for generations to come; but when it comes to voting to conscript our people before they are even given a chance to volunteer, and thus ingrafting upon our Government that very military system against which we are said to be making war, then, Mr. Chairman, I must demur and vote for what I believe to be in the best interests of the people generally, and not to please the American Defense Society of New York, from whom I have never yet taken instructions and to whom I shall never go for "inspiration."

But, Mr. Chairman, if we are to conscript the lives of men, then let us also conscript the excessive incomes to help pay the cost of war, because it takes money as well as men to fight battles. Such a proposition would only be just and fair, and then while some were paying with their lives, others could be paying with their money. Believing in the equity of such a thing, I shall, when the revenue bill comes before the House, offer the following amendment:

There shall be assessed levied and collected on all incomes during the present fiscal year, and during each year or part of year, while the war now existing between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany shall continue, the following rates or charges, to wit: On incomes exceeding $4,000 and not exceeding $10,000, 5 per cent; on incomes exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000, 10 per cent; and on all incomes exceeding $20,000, 100 per cent.

The form of this amendment assumes that the details will be arranged in the bill as it comes from the committee. If that should not happen I shall add such details as will insure the amendment's proper execution.

Mr. Chairman, the New York propaganda and other advocates of conscription and compulsory military training, have not been sincere in presenting the two propositions to the people. Deception has been used; the people have been misled; and, under a false impression, they are demanding that their Congressmen support measures which they—the people—do not themselves understand. A good illustration of how the deception is worked is in the instance of a southern governor. The story is told that this governor came to Washington a short time ago to encourage the Congressmen from his State to stand by the volunteer plan and to vote first, last, and all the time against conscription. After remaining in Washington a few days he came under the "spell," and returning home he issued a statement to his people in which he completely reversed his former position and came out squarely for conscription. In his statement he told the people that the selective plan meant that the barroom bums, the pool-hall loafers, and the loafers generally in the cities would be conscripted and that those on the farms and in the mills and workshops would not be disturbed. This honest advocate of conscription failed to mention in his statement, however, that while in Washington he secured a captain's commission for his son, presumably in the Reserve Corps. Mr. Speaker, I can not, of my own personal knowledge, vouch for the truthfulness of this story, but it has been told to me for the truth by Members of the House, and I have every reason to believe that it is true.

It is such things as this, Mr. Chairman, that have been used to mislead the people concerning selective conscription. What it really means is that all within the age limit will be conscripted. A certain number, let us say eight, may then be stood in a row, and the officer who is to do the selecting may select one from the number to perform the arduous duties of a soldier and the others will be sent back to the farm, the store, the mill, the workshop, etc., to pursue the even tenor of their way. That may be the way, for no one knows how the select conscription will be made. Mr. Speaker, I believe the European war will be at an end before we send any of our soldier boys across the Atlantic, and God grant that my prediction is right. But whether or not the war is soon over the enactment of a conscription and compulsory military training law will have served the purpose for which it was intended, and that will mean the establishment and perpetuation of a military system in this country that will soon see the end of our republican form of government. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when, on Friday, April 5, the resolution declaring war on Germany was before this House for consideration and vote I was one of the 50 who opposed it. My reasons for this action are no longer debatable, and I mention the fact of my opposition only because in my opinion the vote on the war resolution and selective conscription are closely connected.

Those of us who opposed the resolution have been variously described by different newspapers and individuals in the United States, and about all the adjectives or adverbs in the English language and several other languages have at different times been used in discussing us. I have never objected to the criticism of my vote, because I know that many of the newspaper men who have taken serious objection to it were and are my personal friends, and were actuated only by honest motives, and a man ought to expect the newspaper or individual who disagrees with him to criticize him if he is acting in a representative capacity, especially so long as that criticism is fair and is not continued until it becomes persecution.

I have little patience with the men who continue to talk about the subsidized press in connection with all these votes, because I know that the press in my own State that is finding fault with me is not subsidized by the munitions interests or anyone else. I only mention the matter because during the debate on this conscription law during the past few days I have heard a lot of men who patronizingly sympathized with those 50 of us who voted against the war resolution, and who tried to tell us that we were getting honest criticism, now commence to wail about the subsidized press. Some of us did not speak on the war resolution because we could not comply with the rules, and for practically the only time since I have been a Member of the House there was no division or control of the time; consequently many who opposed the resolution secured no opportunity to speak until 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, and that was a very inappropriate time to take the floor.

In looking over the RECORD I have been unable to find out what the rule was. First I thought it must be that old Members had the precedence, but an investigation of the RECORD for that day discloses the fact that one must either have been a very old Member or have supported the resolution or have been a member of the majority party or a Member from New York.

Up until the time when the war resolution was passed there was, and, in my opinion, should have been, a division of opinion among Members of this House, because all of us never will look at everything alike. Up until that time the question of loyalty could not and did not arrive. An honest division of opinion existed between those who thought we ought to go to war and those who thought we should not. Just the moment the majority of the Members said war it meant war, and I have been trying in every way to cooperate with the Government in its plans for carrying on the war.

I have stopped trying to satisfy anybody but myself in casting a vote in these matters, because in future years it makes very little difference whether I satisfy anyone else or not, but it does make a good deal of difference to me whether or not I vote my convictions and satisfy my own sense of right and justice.

My own judgment tells me at this time that I ought to support the selective draft, and I am going to do it under the following conditions:

First. That the troops from each State may enlist and fight with their own friends and neighbors, shoulder to shoulder, under their own State regimental designations. Every individual ought to have the right to live and die with his own friends, and I must insist that that right be not denied the boys who enlist for this war.

Second. The age limit must be raised in this bill so that all men of military age are included. I will not be a party in sending to the front boys of 19 and 20 whose lives are just beginning, who had nothing to say about this war, and who have never yet cast a vote, while men of my age and consequently all other men of military age are exempted from service.

There are many reasons for that vote.

First. The selective draft is democratic, and if properly administered will treat every individual in the United States alike, and we must assume that it will be properly administered.

Second. Every citizen of the United States has obligations to the Government, and if he will not fulfill them ought to be made to do so. He receives the benefit of this form of government and equity demands that he do his share to support the Government. If able, he has to pay his share of the taxes, perform jury duty, and when we are at war he ought to be liable to do his share of the fighting.

Third. The selective draft law will not create a so-called slacker class in the United States, and we want none created.

Fourth. No matter what anyone else may say, I am firmly convinced that in order to raise the army demanded by the President in his recent address conscription is necessary. No country in the world has been able to conduct a great war without conscription. The United States has not been able to do so heretofore, and we ought not to take a chance that it can do so now.

Fifth. We ought to have selective conscription because that method enables every man to know in advance when he will be called, if he is called at all, and will not disorganize the business of the United States. Men who are needed to conduct the business of the country and produce the necessary food ought to be left at home, and ought to be left there without the stigma of "slacker" being placed upon them.

Sixth. Selective conscription will not take all of the members of any family. Experience has proven that if one member of the family enlists they usually all enlist, and there is no reason in the world for one family sending all of its members to war and another family keeping all of its members at home to amass a fortune. I hope the selections can be fairly made, and would like to see the age limit raised, and it will be raised if the American people demand it. Personally I would just as soon see Members of Congress included, and I know that a lot of people in the United States think many of us could be spared from attendance at these sessions and would really like to see some of us in the trenches. I know that, because I have been told so in multitudinous words.

I do not see how anyone who voted for the war resolution can oppose this selective draft. The President in his message of April 5 stated:

> It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least 500,000 men, who should, in my judgment, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training.

He said "increments," not "increment," and that means that he intends to raise at least 1,500,000 men, not to resist invasion, but to send to Europe; and the man who voted for the war resolution has bound himself to this entire program. I consider myself bound to it, because we ought not to have a division of opinion. [Applause.]

An investigation will develop the fact that many men who vote against the President to-day will be in the position of having voted against the motion to recommit the naval bill for 1917, against the Senate amendment to that bill, against the Kahn amendment to the Army bill, and who therefore voted against preparedness measures, but who on April 5 voted to get us in this war are now going to vote against fighting after we get into it. I can never understand how a man would want to vote for war and then not want to fight after war was declared.

Where are all of these men who have been so vociferously demanding that we stand by the President? It may be that they have used the phrase so often that they are too hoarse to repeat it. They asked us to stand by the President when we sailed into Vera Cruz, and stand by him when we sailed out; to stand by him when we marched into Mexico after Villa, and to stand by him when we marched out again; to stand by him when he was "too proud to fight" and to stand by him when he wanted us to fight. We can well disagree about some of these things, and we can disagree about the wisdom of these continued admonitions to stand by the President. I am getting rather tired of that phrase myself, and I think it is about time that instead of telling us to stand by the President we were advised to stand by the United States in this war. We are not going to fight for the President, we are going to fight for the country and the country is the one we are going to stand by. It is also about time we stopped this tirade of abuse in this country, because in my opinion there has been an honest disagreement. I have received a few strenuous letters, resolutions, and so forth, condemning me for my attitude, and I have analyzed to some extent the character and make-up of the men who are so violent in their denunciations. I find many men who are absolutely sincere and who when their country was in danger in the years of 1861–1865 or in 1898 volunteered their services and went to the front. I find another class of men who are extremely violent in their denunciations of those who opposed the war resolution. Some of these men range from 70 to 80 years of age. They vigorously demanded the war April 5, but instead of going to war in 1864 when they were from 17 to 27 years of age, as did Gen. SHERWOOD, a Member of this body, who voted against the resolution, their whereabouts is still a matter of dispute.

I find another class of men who are now from 45 to 60 years old. In 1898 when their country needed them they were from 26 to 41 years of age, and unlike Col. Theodore Roosevelt, and unlike Maj. Charles Howard, Gen. Charles H. Englesby, Col. Boyd Wales, Maj. Lee Stover, Capt. James E. Mather, Col. Will Hazel, Lieut. Fred Huntington, and others of my State, failed to enlist at the call of their country when there was no question of conscription, but very carefully remained at home. Most of these men have most comfortable fortunes at this time. You find them in banks, insurance companies, and law offices vigorously criticizing Members of Congress who did not vote for war and apparently forgetting the fact that when they were from 26 to 41 years of age and the country was at war, they wanted none of it.

They try to emulate and imitate Col. Roosevelt in their desire for war to-day, but unlike him, they are engaged in passing resolutions and criticizing, not trying to get into the Army or Navy. Roosevelt fought, and is ready to fight again, as are the men from my State whom I have mentioned, but these men pass resolutions and write letters. Unlike Roosevelt, they never did, and do not now, want to fight. They want to resolve, and I hereupon christen them "resolution patriots," and define such patriots as men who are long on resolving and short on enlisting. [Applause.]

There is another class of men who are to-day 37 to 45 years of age. When this country was at war with Spain and we needed help, they were from 18 to 26 years old, just the age we are asked to fix for compulsory military service and conscription. When men of that age begin to criticize me, I would like to have them stop and think a moment and remember that they are of military age to-day and their country needs them.

They were of military age in 1898 and their country needed them then, and I can not feel that a man of that type who did not enlist in 1898 nor does not enlist to-day ought to be very vociferous in his denunciation of anyone with whom he disagrees. We had some of these men here Friday morning, April 5, who were burning up with humiliation because the respected majority leader of this House did not vote for war. I have a lot of respect for that majority leader because he voted his convictions and he does not burn with humiliation at his defenseless country and at the same time refuse to render military service.

I have been very much interested in the method of selection under this law, and it has never been made entirely clear to me just who is to say who is to be forced into the trenches and who is not. But again I say we are in war, and I am willing to say that the Government ought to be allowed to place that duty upon some responsible department. I am interested in the matter of selection, and I wish the responsibility devolved upon me of choosing about 75 men out of the second congressional district of South Dakota. [Applause.] If I had that duty, I want to assure you that it would be a nonpartisan, nonpolitical choice, but that I would select a lot of "resolution patriots."

Mr. BORLAND. Had the gentleman that many opponents in the primaries?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Almost. I will tell the gentleman in reference to that in a minute.

After selecting them I would like to have the privilege of picking out the place for them to fight, and I assure you they would get all the fighting they have been so vociferously clamoring for, and I think I know the exact place on the western front where I would place them, and they would get all the action they demand. When they were there they would do a whole lot more fighting and a lot less resolving. As a matter of fact, a lot of these fellows that are so active in resolving about me are a lot more anxious to enlist in Congress to succeed me than they are in the Army.

In conclusion, let me say that the American people do not seem to realize the gravity of the situation. If Russia should conclude a separate peace, the United States would be forced to bear the brunt of this war not only in money but in men, and no one can approximate its extent or duration. We ought to raise an Army of millions of men just as quickly as we can, and raise it in the only democratic American way. The way of universal liability to service makes every man do his part, and do it first. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important measures that have been before Congress during by membership, and while I do not feel qualified to discuss it in detail, as some of the Members have done, yet I want to state briefly to the committee my position in regard to it.

During the earlier stages of this world-wide conflagration I was perfectly willing to forget some of the minor violations of our rights and privileges, but when the German Government began to threaten our very existence as a Nation there was no longer any hesitation, as far as I was concerned. The die was cast. We stand to-day squarely lined up against the strongest military nation the world has ever known. This is no Spanish-American War. This is giant against giant, and it is up to us as Representatives of the people to make proper preparation that this country may enter this combat man fashion, to do what we do quickly, and to strike with all the strength and power at our command. It is no time for delay; it is no time for experiment; it is no time to consult the wish, desire, or convenience of the individual, but it is the time for us all to act as a unit and to do so in no uncertain terms and in such a way as there will be no doubt about the result.

A few days ago we gave notice to the civilized world, when we passed a resolution authorizing seven billions of bonds without a dissenting vote, that the financial resources of this country were back of this war. And now let us complete that proclamation and say to the German people that not only the money power but the man power is back of this war, and we are going to win. When we made the formal declaration of war against the German Government we directed the President of the United States to employ all the naval and military forces of this country to this end, and now are we going to stand idly by and say that we have conscripted the wealth of the country, we have conscripted the manufacturing industries, the mineral resources, the agricultural and everything you need to work with to carry out our order except the human or man power, and I guess you will have enough of that? Is this a business-like way of entering upon a proposition of such magnitude as the one before us at the present time? It is a good deal like building a bridge across a stream and leaving out the last span because some disgruntled citizen in the community has decided that it will cost too much or that anyone who wants to use it can jump ashore. Now, let us build this bridge clear across the stream and attach it securely and firmly to rock foundation on each end. Let us furnish the President of the United States with all the money, supplies, and the proper number and quality of men to use them, and when we have done this—and not before—have we done our part to put the Commander in Chief in position to carry out the order that we have given him.

The general idea of militarism is as distasteful to me as to any Member of this House. I have no special liking for the words "draft" or "conscription," but Mr. Chairman, I hate "defeat," and as far as I am concerned I am not willing to support one single thing in connection with this Army bill that there is any doubt about. Our military authorities, as far as I am able to learn, are unanimous against the voluntary system. Our own experience in the past, under more favorable conditions for this kind of system than the present, has proven it inefficient. England, in the present war, has proven it a failure, and why should we now, face to face with the most critical condition that has ever confronted us during our national history, even hesitate about adopting the sure way.

There has been a good deal of talk here about the voluntary system. I would like to know what this voluntary system is. Is it the volunteer system they are using to-day in every city in trying to get recruits? Is it the voluntary system that I saw in New York last Saturday afternoon, when I saw a young woman in an automobile on the street corner haranguing two or three hundred people? Finally she discovered rather a weak-looking young man on the outside of her audience, and leveling the finger of scorn at him, addressed him something like this: "Here, you tow-headed young slacker, what right have you around here, and your mother home washing to buy you bread? Why don't you enlist in the Navy and become a real man? Come up here into the automobile and let me show you the way to heaven by the naval route." She kept at him for two or three minutes until finally she actually shamed him into coming up in the automobile and offering to enlist in the Navy. As soon as he stood up in the car she took off his hat, patted him on top of the head and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, behold a real American citizen, the kind of a man that real heroes are made of, a man who has a patriotic heart in his breast." A few minutes later she succeeded in getting another boy up in the car that I do not think was over 14 years old. Now, I want some one to tell me if this is the voluntary system that you want to operate here. If it is, I am squarely against it, for, in my judgment, it is the most distasteful kind of conscription that ever could be used, and I do not believe that this Government, with its 100,000,000 free people, has fallen so low that it is obliged to depend for its future protection on a few irresponsible boys that are taken up on the street corners of our big cities by women recruiting officers. What I want is a fair and equitable plan of universal service. I do not know of any feeling of submission on the part of the men of this country because they are obliged to obey its laws. Neither can I see any reason why there should be any feeling of submission on the part of these men if they are educated to understand that they must do their part in maintaining and preserving the Government that makes those laws. We all receive equal protection and equal rights and privileges from this Government, and for this reason I maintain that we are all under equal obligation of service, and especially is that true at the present time, when the service of each man is needed in order to continue our country as a free and democratic people.

Mr. Chairman, I have a feeling that there is a growing tendency among the present generation to look upon the Central Government as merely a distributing agency, or as a "Lady Bountiful" distributing Christmas gifts, and that we are becoming forgetful of the real obligation of the individual to the Central Government. If this is so, it is entirely wrong, and there never will be any better time to change our people about and start them in the right direction than the present. In this crisis I do not consider it a time to discuss volunteering, the wishes, desires, or convenience of the individual, but it is simply a time to impress upon each man the absolute obligation that he owes to the Central Government. These are emergency or critical times and they demand emergency methods to meet them, and let us do the right thing from the very start rather than to be sorry afterwards.

Another thing that I fear in connection with the voluntary service is that the best and most patriotic will go at the first call, while the less sensitive or less patriotic and the slackers will be left at home, and while their volunteer neighbors are doing the fighting these people who did not go at the first call will help mold public sentiment in such a way that it will not only be harmful to the men in the field, but will cause trouble in getting more volunteers, and eventually this sentiment might defeat the very cause that we are fighting for. We are a mixed people, and while in some ways this may furnish the very basis of our national strength, still in carrying on the present war I doubt its being so, unless it is properly amalgamated and brought together so that we may use it in the most efficient and definite manner in the time, place, and in numbers as the necessity may demand, and this can only be done by recognition of the principle of universal obligation to service.

It seems to me, in debating this proposition, that the people on the other side have spent nearly all their time in praising the volunteer soldier. If I understand the proposition before us it is not the quality or superiority of the volunteer soldier that we are discussing, but the policy of how we can best use him in the service of the Government. Far be it from me to say anything but praise for them, for my own beloved father was one of those noble boys you have talked so much about, who, in the days of the Civil War, heard and responded to his country's call before he was 18 years old, and received the wound that eventually caused his death defending your very Capitol here at Washington. Don't let me hear any man say that I am not a friend of the volunteer soldier. It is because we are their friends and fully appreciate them that we want to preserve and conserve them at the present time. We want the same spirit and patriotism that the Speaker of this House said dominated both the blue and gray at Gettysburg to dominate every regiment that goes out from this Republic, and it is absolutely impossible to do this if you use all the men with this spirit and patriotism at the first call. We want that spirit of loyalty that we know exists in the breast of every volunteer to be equally distributed among the whole Army; we want the leaven that is in these men to help leaven the whole loaf, and the only way that you can do this is by selection on the basis of universal obligation. We simply want to establish first the principle of universal obligation, enroll every man of military age, and then let the Chief Executive call the different classes as the necessity may demand. In this way every army that goes forth to war will simply be an army of the Republic, while under the old system you would first send an army of volunteers and then an army of conscripts. Then, under this system, if my age or physical condition is such that I can not qualify for the first class but I do go cheerfully when my class is called, I am just as much a man and a patriot as the fellow who went in the first class, because God had given him the advantage over me in age and physical ability. This is the fair, efficient, and democratic way. Let us adopt it at the start, and then instead of dividing our people into two classes—the volunteer and the slacker—we will make them all plain Americans and expect every man to do his duty. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, unquestionably at this time the allies in Europe know exactly the number of men on whom they can depend during the time this war shall last, say in one year or in two years or three years. They know the number of men they can put in the field this coming summer and the number they can put in the field a year from the coming summer, and the number they can put in the field two years from this summer. They know also the number of men the central powers can put in the trenches in each of these three successive years.

The United States has now become a factor in this war. It is fighting with the allies, and the question is whether we are going to determine how many men the allies can count on as coming from the United States. Certainly, they can not count on any specific number if we rely upon volunteering. Why? Because volunteering depends upon fluctuating things.

Let a glorious battle be fought; let the Stars and Stripes be planted upon the top of the German trenches; let there be few casualties on the American side and a great loss of Germans, killed and made prisoners, and at once volunteering will grow and increase in great numbers. And then let there come a day of defeat and disaster; let the casualty list grow; let the maimed and the halt and the disfigured come home; let them go abroad in their communities, and then, at the time when we need men more than at any other time, when the ranks have been thinned, when retreat has been inevitable, on an occasion like that volunteering will practically disappear.

The benefit of the other system—that of the selective draft—is that you plan in advance, and you plan because you can plan just the number of men that the allies will count on from the United States in each campaign. You draw those men, and you prepare them in advance, and then as the campaign comes they are ready for it.

It has been said here to-day by one of my colleagues from my own State [Mr. CHANDLER], for whom I have the greatest affection and the highest respect, that we should not be for this conscription because it is advocated by the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States; that he is going outside his executive functions and attempting to usurp those of the legislative branch. Why, I never yet have heard that it was not the duty of the Executive to recommend to the legislative branch the course for it to follow, and nothing more has been done here, and we are to assume that the President has been influenced by just those considerations which influence us—by the logic of the situation and by the best expert advice obtainable.

Then gentlemen have talked about the word "conscript," and some have even gone so far as to say that to them it was synonymous with "convict." Why, we can judge of the conscript best by searching the experience of those who have already fought in this war for two long and weary years.

Boyd Cable, the great writer, who writes what he has actually seen, who writes from personal experiences, who writes from the fighting at the front, tells us in a chapter of one of his recent books of a man in civil life in England who saw the British Army being raised. He was loyal and patriotic. He said, "Yes; men should support the country. They should contribute generously. They should not grumble at great taxes. They should do their part." But it never occurred to him that one of the parts, and the part which he should play, was a part at the front. Soon he began hearing people talk in his presence, making remarks evidently aimed at him. A little later they talked to him, and as they talked it was borne in on him that he, too, must give "the last full measure of devotion"—that of life—to his country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And he went to the front practically a conscripted man. He went to the front, and in the first fight in the trenches he cowered under the parapet. He did not obey the command of his sergeant to look out and fire. He skulked; and a little later an officer who was firing a gun lost all his men in action and came down and commanded him to come up and help to man the gun. He refused. His officer took him by the collar and said, "Look at that German line. It is a hundred yards from you. If it reaches here, all is gone. Your one chance is to keep that gun going." He went on feeding the gun, and many other gunners were killed, but he himself went to the trenches and brought up men, and at last the tide was turned and the Germans retreated. Then he went down to the trenches and said to the sergeant, stuttering in his excitement, "Don't you see that the Germans are retreating, and if we do not get out there after them they will get away?" And he leaped up on the parapet, and was restrained, not by the command of his officer, but by physical means only. Boyd Cable says that is a fair sample of the conscript in the English Army. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, rich nation as we are, we have not haggled nor been shopkeepers in appropriating $7,000,000,000 of money. We have not been small. Let us be as patriotic and as courageous and as chivalrous about men as about money, and thus, and thus only, can we do our part in this world-wide, this greatest of all wars. [Applause.]

The American will prove the best soldier in the world, no matter how he is chosen for service. He has the most to fight for, the best country and the most liberal form of government. He will fight with the same patriotism and intelligence which animated his fathers of the Revolution and the Civil War, and he will gain imperishable renown as they did.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the principle of universal military service as the only practicable and democratic method of providing for the common defense, and I shall therefore support the President's plan for a selective draft. Our own experience in the past, as well as that of Great Britain in the present war, has clearly demonstrated that the voluntary system can not be depended upon in a great crisis such as confronts us to-day.

Washington's unfortunate experience with the Colonial militia in the Revolution is well known. In a letter to the President of Congress, written at the camp at Cambridge, in my district, on July 10, 1775, he said, "All the general officers agree that no dependence can be put on the militia." (See Writings of George Washington, collected and edited by Worthington Chauncy Ford (Putnam's, 1889), Vol. III, p. 16.)

Later, in a letter to Joseph Reed, dated at Cambridge December 25, 1775, he said, "I have in some measure anticipated the desires of the Connecticut delegates by a kind of representation to each of the New England governments of the unpracticability (in my eye) of raising our complement of men by voluntary enlistments, and submitting it to their consideration whether (if the powers of government are sufficiently coercive) each town should not be called upon for a proportionate number of troops." (See Ibid., Vol. III, p. 290.) It is perfectly evident from these expressions that the Father of his Country, if he were alive to-day, would be in favor of the plan recommended by President Wilson for the creation of an effective Military Establishment by the application of the principle of selective conscription.

The following figures from Upton's "Military Policy of the U ited States" are significant, showing as they do the unnecessary cost of a volunteer army. The total number of American troops enlisted during the War of the Revolution was 395,858; the total number of British troops was 42,075. The largest number of troops that Washington was able to lead to battle at any one time was less than 17,000, while at the Battles of Trenton and Princeton, during the time of our greatest peril, his effective strength was less than 4,000. The total cost of the American Revolution was $370,000,000, or $123 per capita, as compared with $96 per capita in the Civil War. In addition, over $80,000,000 was eventually paid in pensions to Revolutionary soldiers. It is a conservative statement that with some form of selective conscription the thirteen Colonies might have won their independence in less than half the time and at considerably less than half the expense.

Our experience in the War of 1812 is equally illuminating and instructive. The total number of American troops, practically all raised by voluntary enlistment, was 527,654 enlisted men and 33,481 officers, of which latter number only 120 had received a professional education in the Military Academy. In speaking of the campaigns on the Canadian border, Upton says:

> Instead of falling on the 5,000 British regulars who held Canada at the beginning of this war and crushing them at a single battle, we allowed them to baffle every attempt at an invasion and to prolong the war until our loss in killed and wounded numbered 5,614.

In contrast with our reckless extravagance in employing more than half a million men, the largest force of British regulars opposed to us was 16,500.

The cost of this war, exclusive of pensions, was $190,000,000.

Had Congress—

> from 1808 to 1811 applied one-fourth of this sum to the maintenance of an army of 15,000 men, so organized as to have been capable of expansion by the aid of voluntary enlistments and obligatory service to double or triple its numbers, there is little reason to doubt that Canada would have been ours, and the war brought to a close in a single campaign.

Again, the experience of this country during the Civil War clearly demonstrated that if we had had a system of universal military training and service in the Northern States the Union might have been preserved with a vastly less expenditure of blood and treasure.

The experience of the Confederate Government is equally instructive as bearing upon the question under discussion, and I would call the attention of the committee to the following extract from an article by a southern man entitled "Blunders of the Confederate Government," published in Debow's Review for July, 1868, Volume XXXVI, page 651:

> The crying evil of the Confederate military system, if the government can be said to have adopted one, until, through its own want of foresight, it was driven to the sudden adoption of its conscription, was this: The volunteer force which sprung into service at the first call was made up chiefly of the best materials, not only for soldiers but officers, that the country afforded. An undue proportion of the best intelligence, spirit, and patriotism of the country was enrolled there. The bulk of those who were best qualified by position, education, and character, to hold commissions in any future army that was to bring out the military strength of the country were to be found in the rank and file of the volunteer regiments, and the greater part of it perished there. Through a fatal incapacity for military administration, the bulk of the natural officers of the southern army were cut off in private or subordinate positions. These same men, distributed among the whole force afterwards organized for service and rising to positions by nature theirs, would not have died in vain.

It is just this sort of thing that we are striving to prevent by the immediate adoption of the selective draft.

The experience of Great Britain in the present war also shows that the volunteer system is expensive and wasteful in that it results in the destruction early in the war of the very best material upon which the country ought to depend for its supply of officers for a large army, as well as its supply of directors of industrial enterprises essential to the Nation's defense. [Applause.]

A good deal has been said in this debate in regard to the attitude of Thomas Jefferson, the revered author of the Declaration of Independence and the statesman who preeminently stood for the supremacy of the civil over the military authority in our Government. In order to make it plain that this great statesman was a strong advocate of universal military service and in favor of a principle of a selective draft as essential to the maintenance of American institutions, I wish to call the attention of the committee to a letter written by him to John Wayles Eppes, dated from Monticello, September 9, 1814, which can be found in volume 9 of the writings of Thomas Jefferson collected and edited by Paul Leicester Ford (Putnam, 1898), pages 484 and 485. In that letter occurs the following significant passage:

No government can be maintained without the principle of fear as well as of duty. Good men will obey the last, but bad ones the former only. Our county is a desert. None are to be met in the roads but gray heads. About 800 men are gone from us, and chiefly volunteers. I think the truth must now be obvious that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service, and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing armies, and that in doing this all must be marshalled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

The closing sentence of this remarkable letter is so appropriate to the present situation in the United States as to be almost prophetic, and it sets forth the necessity and essential features of the selective draft in the clearest possible language.

In conclusion I wish to state that I am firmly convinced that military service, like jury duty, should be obligatory on all men possessing the necessary qualifications, whether they be rich or poor, naturalized or native born. The French Republic, which received its original inspiration from the shot fired from Concord Bridge in 1775, is to-day setting the people of the American Republic a splendid example of a truly democratic citizens' army founded on universal military service—a system which past and present experience proves to be the only efficient method of protecting free institutions against the ruthless assault of military autocracy. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I understand there has been general leave to extend remarks in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not care under those conditions and at this late hour to take the time of the House to recapitulate the arguments which lead me to have no difficulty whatever in standing firmly upon the policy of universal service. I shall take advantage of the privilege of extension to present somewhat fully my views upon this question. I do want to direct your attention for a few moments to the statement—and to me it is the only statement of consequence made by those who are opposing universal service—that this policy of the draft or of conscription is un-American; that our wars have been wars of volunteers; that it is hostile to the principle and the theory and the spirit of liberty that we should at this time engage upon a conscription policy.

Mr. Chairman, I have examined some of the State laws passed shortly after the Declaration of Independence. The men of those days, the founders of our Nation, suffered under no delusion that the principle of universal service was un-American.

I have in my hand a volume entitled "The Acts and Resolves of the Province of Massachusetts Bay, Volume V," which contains the enactments of Massachusetts for the years 1769 to 1780. On page 595, chapter 21, is an act for providing a reenforcement to the American Army. That act was approved November 14, 1776, less than four months after the Declaration of Independence, almost before the bells of rejoicing had ceased to peal in the different portions of our American Colonies. I want to read the preamble to that law, and also the law itself:

Whereas the state of our public affairs claims our most serious attention, and while our inveterate enemies are using their utmost efforts to subjugate us not only to an arbitrary but ignominious government, in which our taskmasters may be those tools of power whom no laws could deter from the most flagitious crimes, and who have been ready at all times to sacrifice their country to their own emolument, it obviously becomes the duty of this assembly to make every possible provision against so great a calamity; and

Whereas the time for which a part of the militia of this State is engaged to serve as a reinforcement to the Continental Army is near expiring, and it is apprehended that another reenforcement may be necessary, when a movement of the whole militia would be both needless and impracticable, this court, in faithfulness to this State, has, therefore, thought proper to point out and establish the following method for determining what persons shall hold themselves in readiness to march first on this occasion:

And it is enacted by the Council and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same:

SEC. 1. That no rank or station in life, place, employment, or office, except as is hereafter excepted, shall excuse or exempt any person from serving in arms for the defense of his country, either by himself or some able-bodied, effective man in his stead, or, in case of his neglect or refusal, from paying the fine hereinafter required: Provided, nevertheless, That those persons who had, before the 19th day of April, 1775, been by law deemed to be of the denomination of Christians called Quakers, settled ministers of the Gospel, the president, professors, tutors, librarian, and undergraduates of Harvard College, Indians, negroes, and mulattoes, shall not be held to take up arms or procure any person to do it in their room; and also that four men to each of the powder mills in Stoughton and Andover be in like manner exempted.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid—

SEC. 2. That one-quarter part of all the able-bodied male persons within this State and not in actual military service and pay for the defense of this or the American States, from 16 years of age and upward, excepting as aforesaid, and excepting the inhabitants of all such places as lie to the eastward of Camden, so called, in the county of Lincoln, shall, either by voluntary enlistment, lot, or draft, as is hereinafter provided, be appointed and held in readiness, armed and equipped with a good gun and bayonet, or, in the room of a bayonet, with a tomahawk, cutting sword, or hatchet, also with a cartridge box, a blanket, and knapsack, to march at a minute's warning, to serve for a term not exceeding three months from the time of their march from home, within and for the defense of any of the United States, when they shall be called out to reinforce the Continental Army by the General Court or, in the recess thereof, by the council, and under the command of such general officer or officers as the General Court or, in its recess, the council shall appoint.

SEC. 3. And that the commissioned officers of the militia in each town in this State shall, immediately upon their receiving this act, cause all the male persons usually residing therein, from 16 years of age and upward, except those hereinbefore excepted (and where there are no such officers in any town the selectmen thereof shall cause them), to be mustered; and said militia officers, where there are such, in conjunction with the selectmen and committees of correspondence, etc., of such towns shall, by voluntary enlistment, lot, or draft, as to them or the major part of them shall appear equitable and just, cause one-quarter part of all said male persons (not exempting themselves, or any other persons but such as are hereinbefore exempted) in this State, and not in actual military service and pay for the defense of this or the American States, to be appointed and held in readiness and equipped, as aforesaid, to serve as is above provided, having regard to services already done and performed.

SEC. 4. And the military officers, with the selectmen and committees as aforesaid, shall immediately make out a fair list of the names of the persons so appointed, either by enlistment, lot, or draft, and deliver the same, as soon as may be, to the brigadier of the county to which they belong or, in his absence, to the next commanding officer in the brigade then in the county, who shall, as soon as such list is delivered to him, with the advice of the field officers of such brigade, form that part of the militia which shall be so appointed, as aforesaid, within his county into companies, as near as may be of the number of 68 men (including noncommissioned officers) to a company, and shall appoint of the militia officers of such brigade, proper officers to lead them, according to the rank such officers now hold; and shall form such companies into battalions, appointing proper field officers of the standing militia to command them, according to the rank such officers now hold in the militia, making as near as may be 10 companies to a battalion; and make return to the council of the number of men and the names of the officers and their several ranks who may be drafted, enlisted, or appointed in consequence of this act, as soon as the same can possibly by them be ascertained.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 5. That when the said persons so appointed are ordered to march, the selectmen of each town shall procure, by impressment or otherwise, necessary teams and wagons to carry their baggage; and shall also pay each officer and soldier 2d. per mile for every mile's travel, from their several places of abode to the place or places of their destination as appointed by the general court, or, in the recess thereof, by the council; and also provide for them sufficient kettles, bottles, or canteens; and shall lay their accounts thereof before the general court, with proper receipts, for allowance and payment.

And in order to enable the selectmen to perform and observe the preceding clause, in case they can not otherwise procure the money needed for the purposes aforesaid—

It is enacted—

SEC. 6. That they shall, as soon as the said quarter part of the male persons within their respective towns are appointed as aforesaid, return an account of the numbers so appointed to the council, who shall make out their warrant, in favor of such selectmen, upon the treasury of this State, for a sum sufficient to enable such selectmen to pay the person so appointed their mileage from the places of their abode to the place of their destination, and also for a sum sufficient to enable such selection to procure teams and wagons to carry their baggage, allowing one team to each company of men, the said selectmen to be accountable to the general court for the sums they shall respectively receive.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 7. That the persons so appointed after they are ordered to march, shall be under the same regulations as are provided for the Continental Army and receive wages for every calendar month according to the following establishment, viz: A colonel, £15; lieutenant colonel, £12; a major, £10; a captain, £8; a first lieutenant, £5 8s.; a second lieutenant, £5 8s.; a chaplain, £7 10s.; surgeon, £7 10s.; surgeon's mate, £4; adjutant, £5 10s.; quartermaster, £3 10s.; sergeant, £3 8s.; corporal, £3 4s.; drummer or fifer, £3 4s.; privates, £3; said wages to commence from the time of their marching and to continue to the time of their return, allowing 20 miles march to a day.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid—

SEC. 8. That in each town or place where there shall have been a neglect in the appointment of one of those orders—viz, of military officers, selectmen, or committees of correspondence—or of any two of those orders, such and so many of them as shall be in any town or place shall have all the power with respect to mustering and appointing the men as aforesaid as the military officers, committees, and selectmen jointly have and shall be held in such case, respectively, to execute this act under the same penalty as is herein provided against them in case of the joint neglect of them all.

SEC. 9. And the selectmen of each town are also empowered and directed to impress arms for such persons as shall be appointed as aforesaid and are unable to procure them for themselves and shall truly appraise the arms so impressed and give the person or persons from whom they are taken a receipt therefor, and said receipt shall express and certify the sum such arms are appraised at, to the intent that the owner or owners may, if they please, receive pay for them out of the treasury of this State by warrant from the council; but if the owners of such arms shall choose to have a return thereof after the person for whose use such arms were taken shall return from the campaign they shall be entitled to receive for the hire of each gun the sum of 4 shillings; and in case of such arms being lost the owners shall be paid therefor according to the appraisement of the same, deducting any sum that may have been paid for the hire thereof; and if any soldier to whose use such arms are impressed shall willfully dispose of or negligently lose them, he shall have the sum such arms are appraised at deducted from his wages; and the treasurer shall not pay any noncommissioned officer or soldier his wages for his service until he shall produce a certificate from the selectmen of the town (or committe of correspondence, etc., of any place not incorporated) expressing either that he found his own arms or that the arms delivered him by such selectmen have been returned by him or were unavoidably lost.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 10. That if any military officer not having reasonable excuse shall refuse or neglect strictly to perform the duties enjoined on him by this act, he shall pay a fine of £12 and be reduced to the ranks in the militia; and that if any selectman or committeeman shall refuse and neglect to perform the duties enjoined on him by this act he shall forfeit and pay the sum of £12, to be recovered by any person who shall prosecute for the same by action of debt in any court proper to try the same, one half of said fine to be for the use of said prosecutor, the other half to be lodged in the hands of the treasurer of the town or place where such offender lives, to be drawn out by the selectmen for the use of hiring or procuring men to serve for the defense of this or the United States of America.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 11. That if any person appointed as aforesaid, and being in person notified of such appointment, or by writing left at his place of abode, signed by any of them who have appointed him, shall refuse or neglect, in 24 hours thereafter, to make a reasonable excuse to the acceptance of said person by whom he is so appointed, or to pay into their hands the sum of £10, he shall be held and taken to be a soldier in the service for which he is so appointed; and if any such soldier neglect or refuse to march as aforesaid, when called out according to the mode prescribed in the militia act, unless he produces a discharge from or provide some able-bodied man in his stead, to the acceptance of the person herein empowered to appoint him, he shall forfeit and pay into the hands of such person a sum of £12, or, in default of such payment, the said persons are hereby empowered and directed to commit such delinquent forthwith, until he pay said fine, to the common gaol of the county, by mittimus of the tenor and form following, directed to such officer as is empowered to execute a warrant from the justice of the peace:

SUFFOLK, ss:

To ———, and to the keeper of the common gaol of the county of ——— ———, greeting:

Whereas C. D., of the town of ———, was by us, the subscribers, appointed a soldier, according to the directions of the late act of this Government, for providing a reenforcement to the American Army, has been duly notified of such appointment, and did not, within 24 hours after such notification pay to us the sum of £10, nor make any reasonable excuse; and the said C. D. was, on the —— day of ——— called out, according to law, to march, but neglected so to do, or to provide any person in his stead, you, the said ———, are, therefore, hereby required forthwitih to apprehend the said C. D. and him commit to the common gaol in the said county, and you, the said keeper of the said gaol, are alike required to receive the said C. D. into your custody, there to remain until he pay the fine of £12, as ordered in said act, together with charges of commitment and imprisonment, or be discharged by order of law. Hereof fail not. Given under our hands and seals this —— day of ———.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 12. That all fines incurred by breaches of the foregoing paragraph shall be paid over by the persons who may first receive the same to the treasurer of the town or place, to be employed by the selectmen in hiring persons for the service herein directed, as there shall be occasion.

Provided always—

SEC. 13. That so far as the quota of said town or place is not immediately completed by persons hired by such fines, the persons herein empowered to raise such quota shall go on, without delay, to appoint as aforesaid till the full complement of such town or place is made up; and in case any surplusage shall remain of forfeitures after the number of men intended to be levied in consequence of this act shall in fact be levied, the same shall be paid over to the treasurer or receiver of each town, respectively, there to remain for the disposal of such town for raising men for future military service.

And it is also enacted—

SEC. 14. That the major part of the field officers of each battalion so appointed shall have the privilege of appointing one chaplain, one surgeon, one surgeon's mate, a quartermaster, and an adjutant for such battalion.

And it is further enacted—

SEC. 15. That wherever this act requires any duty to be done by the military officers, selectmen, and committees of any town or place, it is to be understood that the major part of them, or of such orders of them, as are found subsisting in the said town or place be, and they hereby are, empowered to perform the same duties no less than if the whole number of all said orders were personally present and agreeing.

Provided—

SEC. 16. That if the persons so appointed as aforesaid shall not be called out to reenforce the Continental Army upon or before the 1st day of March next they shall not be held to march after that time until there is a new appointment or some further order from the general court; but if they should be called out upon or before the said 1st day of March for the purpose aforesaid, they shall be held to stay in the service for the space of three months from the time of their marching, if it should be found necessary.

Provided also—

SEC. 17. That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt said persons who are so appointed to reenforce the Continental Army and who are now a part of the militia of this State from being considered to belong to said militia, or to excuse or exempt them from being obliged to march for any other purpose, in defense of this or the other States of America, according to the modes prescribed by the laws of this State made and provided for the regulation of the militia therein.

And it is further provided and enacted—

SEC. 18. That if any part of said persons so appointed, and not the whole of them, should be needed for the purpose and service aforesaid, upon any emergency, in the recess of the general court, the council shall be, and hereby are, fully empowered to call out such and so many of the battalions, formed as aforesaid, as shall appear to the said council to be necessary; and that each battalion of said quarter part shall be held to serve three months from the time of their marching, respectively; and that the marching of some of the battalions shall not be construed a release of the residue that shall be formed in consequence of this act from the duties herein required.

And it is enacted by the authority aforesaid—

SEC. 19. That this act shall be held to be in full force, any law of this State to the contrary notwithstanding.

(Passed November 14.)

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Was that a selective draft?

Mr. ROGERS. That was a selective draft, if I understand the definition of the word "selective." It provided that one man out of every four should be taken, and that that man might be determined by lot.

I have also here volume 9 of Hemings's Statutes at Large of the Commonwealth of Virginia for the years 1775 to 1778. Shortly before the Declaration of Independence—in December, 1775—the draft was first resorted to by the temporary assembly of that day. A few months after the Declaration of Independence the general assembly, held at the capitol in the city of Williamsburg, on Monday, the 1st day of May, 1777, in the first year of the Commonwealth of Virginia, explicitly adopted the draft principle. That law will be found as chapters 1, 2, and 3 of those laws, on pages 267 to 285, inclusive.

Mr. Chairman, with the record before us of the two Colonies foremost in the spirit of independence and of liberty, in immediately going on record in the most explicit terms in favor of a draft, we need not fear very much to-day that we are going to be regarded as un-American because we in the time of our country's need have ourselves resorted to the draft.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Can the gentleman state how many men were drafted under those statutes?

Mr. ROGERS. I have tried to find in the records, and particularly in Upton's Military Policy of the United States, a statement of the actual number of troops levied by those drafts. My impression is that the fact that the draft law was upon the statute books was sufficient to induce men to go into the Army as volunteers without recourse to the draft being had.

Mr. HOUSTON. I can well see how it might have that effect; but what I want to know is how many were actually drafted, if the gentleman has the data.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not find in Upton any very satisfactory indication as to the number of men actually drafted at that time. I do recollect that in Upton Gen. Washington is quoted as writing to the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that, in his judgment, the only possible way by which an effective army could be raised for the further prosecution of the war was by means of a selective draft, and that also was in the year 1777.

I have only one other suggestion to make at this time. I suspect that a very large proportion of the men who will vote against universal service in the course of two or three days will do so because of their belief that we shall send a conscripted force to the trenches of Europe, and they do not like to tolerate the thought of sending an army which has been drafted, and which has had no volition of its own, into the trenches of Europe. I think their fear is groundless. In my judgment, this is the way that the future will reveal itself. It is not a matter of legislation, of course. It is a matter of administration after the legislation is passed.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman understand how this selective draft is to be administered?

Mr. ROGERS. I have not the time in the two or three minutes remaining to discuss my notion of what the selective draft will be when actually administered. There is no question but that we give the President an enormous power and range of discretion within which he may operate. Here is the way the problem is going to work out, in so far as any expeditionary force is concerned. It is the practice in time of war, especially when an extra hazardous service is to be performed, for the general or the captain or the sergeant to call for volunteers to perform that service. It is one of the proudest things, as we read the history of our wars, that there has always been the keenest competition for the privilege of going forward and volunteering and being selected for that extra hazardous service. Service in France will be regarded as extra hazardous service.

In my judgment, after the force is raised, after it has been trained for 6, 9, or 12 months, or whatever the period may be, after it is ready to do its duty in whatever field it may be called upon to perform, the men in charge will say to the men who have been trained, "Who will volunteer to go to France and fight side by side with the French in maintaining the liberty and freedom of the world?" And, Mr. Chairman, it is my conviction that 90, perhaps 95, per cent of all those men will gladly volunteer to take their places in the trenches of Europe. [Applause.]

But suppose that does not come about, although I confidently believe that it will; suppose the volunteering is not a success, then we are exactly where we started, exactly in the position of the captain who calls for volunteers and fails to get them. Then he can say, "It is your duty to go; I order you to go, and you shall go." I believe there is no question in the world but that we shall get the volunteers; but even if we do not we have the remedy in our own hands.

Many of you have read a book by Capt. Ian Hay, called The First Hundred Thousand, and you have been thrilled, as I have been, by reading how the men of England as they learned first to creep and then to walk and then to run as soldiers gradually became more and more hungry for the fray, how they yearned for the time to come when they could do actual fighting for their country. Mr. Chairman, we are going to lose our flabbiness; we are going to gain a physical, mental, and moral stamina, and we are going to find when we have the men fully trained and confident of their own prowess and efficiency and of the ability of their commanders that they will want to go, and that they will be eager and proud to volunteer for service in France. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE].

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened for two days to the various reasons of advocates either in support or against the majority report. In the beginning we were told that the reason for the selective draft was because of the democracy of the measure. After having listened to the different amendments which have been proposed on the floor of the House for the last two days I have come to the conclusion that instead of the selective draft being a democratic measure it is, perhaps, the worst kind of class legislation.

We started out with eliminating some 106,000,000 in this country. We then eliminated 5,500,000 people, and then we find that the packers of the country do not desire to have the men working for them drafted, perhaps because they want these men in active employment, and perhaps because in losing these men they might pay good American wages in getting others. We then find that the manufacturers of the country are desirous of having their employees eliminated, and so we went down the line until the gentleman from Wisconsin made the statement that he was going to introduce an amendment which would eliminate the farmers of the country. And so we have left the slackers, the pool-room sharks that we have heard so much about, and the idle rich.

The other day the gentleman from South Carolina eliminated the pool-room sharks, and so to-day we have a measure before us which only contemplates taking the idle rich, and I am standing before you to-night to argue for the idle rich. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not believe in class legislation; I do not believe that we should send all of the idle rich across the water. There is another reason, presumably, by the people who advocate this measure; that is, if they were truthful in their statement. They might admit that perhaps we could not get enough volunteers to make the fight. If we should take into consideration the enlistment in the District of Columbia during the last few weeks, that might be so. But in the city I come from, out on the edge of the West, during the last week we enlisted more men in the Marine Corps than had been enlisted in the District of Columbia during the period between April 1 and April 23 by 31 men. I understand the volunteer system is not being discussed at the other end of the Capitol seriously, and perhaps there is a reason for that. Perhaps it is because of their lack of interest in the legislation for the benefit of the volunteers of the war of 1898. You gentlemen are aware that three times we have passed in this body a bill providing for the widows and orphans of the Spanish War veterans, and three times in the Senate has that bill died an ignoble death. Sometimes it pays to be patriotic between wars. Sometimes the Congress of the United States might be patriotic by taking care of the widows and orphans of those who participated in the last war.

I want to give you a few experiences of my own service in the Spanish War, and why I am so opposed to certain provisions in the administration bill. The first provision to which I am absolutely opposed is the age limit from 19 to 25. The first tent that I was in after going into camp I was the dean of the tent, and I was 17 years of age at that time. There were four of us in the tent, two 17 years old, one 16, and one 15. There is no man who can get up on the floor of this House and tell me that any boy under the age of 21 makes as good a soldier as a man over 21 years of age.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The boys you speak of, yourself included, were volunteers?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. There was no restriction upon your going in even at that age?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Oh, yes; there was.

Mr. BORLAND. But you did go in?

Mr. VAN DYKE. I did go in.

Mr. BORLAND. And there were four of you there under 18 years of age in the same tent?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not that rather typical of what the volunteer system really gets when it comes to the young men of the country?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Does the gentleman mean to inquire whether I would be in favor——

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the volunteer system take a large proportion of the boys?

Mr. VAN DYKE. It does not take a large proportion of the boys without the consent of their parents or guardians, and I have not heard a single Member get up on the floor here and differentiate between the conscription plan of grabbing the boys away from their parents and allowing the parents to permit those boys to enlist in the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Would it not be a whole lot better to have boys in there from 19 up rather than from 19 down, under any plan?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Yes; if their guardians and parents allowed them to go. That is the big question, and I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, because it is the first time to my mind since this debate began that that erroneous impression has been dispelled that during the War with Spain soldiers were allowed to enlist who had not reached their majority, without the consent of their parents or guardians. There is a wide difference between the Government saying to the father or the mother or the guardian of a child "Your boy must go," and allowing that guardian or parent to say "I gladly give my boy to my country."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VAN DYKE. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman know that under the plan proposed by the War Department they permit 978,000 boys 18 years of age to enlist without their parents concent under the present bill?

Mr. VAN DYKE. And that is the big thing that I object to in that bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Is that any different from the present law?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the law at present.

Mr. BORLAND. So that that is no different?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Your selective-draft plan permits 978,000 boys to be enlisted.

Mr. BORLAND. The law existing to-day permits that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that under the national-defense act recently passed boys of 18 may enlist in the Army without the consent of their parents or guardians?

Mr. VAN DYKE. It may be that that is the fact; but nevertheless I still object.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is the law, is it not?

Mr. VAN DYKE. I object to allowing any man under 21 years of age to enlist without the consent of his parents or guardians. I want to tell you the effect upon a boy in the Army of that age. Out of the four in that tent within two months after the enlistment we were all sick in the hospital with typhoid fever. As a matter of fact, most of the men of that regiment had typhoid fever who were of that tender age. There is a reason for it. The reason is this: That he has not become matured; he has not the power to restrain himself; he will eat anything and do almost anything, and he is not able to care for himself properly, as a more mature man would be.

I do not intend to take up much time to-night, but I do want to say—and I have received numerous telegrams and letters from my district, all in favor of the selective draft, most of them, I might say, in favor of it without knowing what the provisions of the bill are—I do want to say this: That I am proud to-night to be able to state that I served or responded to the call in 1898. I am proud for this reason, and that is the sentiment connected with that idea. Wars were never fought except because of sentiment, and I would hate to think that the war that we have become engaged in now is anything but a war of sentiment. I would hate to think that it is a commercial war, and, consequently, when you take away the sentiment connected with the man who served his country or, at least, offers his services, you take away all that which is worth having. Where is there any sentiment connected with the man who has been drafted and forced into the Army? How can he, when he has returned, it may be, from many bloody battle fields, be able to say that he offered all that he had in his country's defense?

What is the difference between the majority and the minority reports. There is only one difference, as I view it, and that is that the majority report calls for a selective-volunteer plan and the minority report for a selective-draft plan. In either case the men would be selected as to their value on the firing line or at home; in either case they would be officered by competent men, and as a matter of fact the rules and regulations applicable in one case would be the same in the other. Consequently we are forced to the conclusion that the only difference existing is the difference between drafting and volunteering, the ultimate results as to efficiency being the same, with the exception of the fighting spirit which goes with the volunteers.

There is one other difference, however, and that is that in the volunteer system we would have 500,000 men in camps training before the enrollment for the draft proposition would have been completed, so if it is efficiency we want, if it is speed we want, if it is the getting together at the earliest possible moment an army that we desire, then there is only one answer, and that is to adopt the majority report as it stands.

I want to make a few remarks relative to the difference between democracy and autocracy; but before doing so I want to say I am glad I am able to have an opportunity to vote for the volunteer system. I am glad because, peculiar as it may seem, I still believe in democracy. I would rather have the pleasure of voting when the time comes according to my conscience and convictions than I would to occupy the highest position in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, zealous and anxious as, I believe, all Members of this House are, now that we are committed to war, to prosecute that war with vigor, that early victory may bring an early peace, I, for one, am not willing to sacrifice to that end or take legislative steps to place in jeopardy those institutions of American liberty that are of greater and more enduring value to humanity than any victory of arms which we may achieve on European battle fields.

We can not afford to sacrifice the greater for the lesser. Certainly the Congress of the United States, which is by far the greatest legislative forum and repository of human rights and immunities in the world and in history, should be the last legislative body on earth to undermine by its own acts the immunities which have made America the asylum of freemen from every land and, least of all, to substitute for these immunities the very system of military conscript and universal military service, from which the great body of our immigrant citizenship sought freedom when they gave up the Old World for the New.

Of what avail is it to the freedom-loving and peace-loving citizen of a foreign country to leave his fatherland to escape military conscription and universal military servitude imposed by a military bureaucracy and make this his adopted country, only to find that the country of his adoption is setting up another military bureaucracy to conscript him and impose upon his sons the system of universal service patterned after that of the fatherland from which he has flown?

How can we with any logical consistency preach against Prussian autocracy as the "foe to liberty" if we adopt the same system of military conscription and training which makes Prussian autocracy the foe to liberty?

The fundamental principle of American democracy is consent of the governed. The elector is the American sovereign. Government is the expression of the will of the elector. The people are supposed, under our Constitution, to be the creators and government their creation. Sovereign choice lies with the citizen; that is what we mean by the words "freedom" and "democracy." He creates the Government, which we call "self-government." He names the officials who carry out his will, and he fights his country's battles as a sovereign volunteer. That has been the world-famous "American system" since 1776, the system and the fundamental principles studied and revered by liberty-loving people in every enlightened community on the globe.

The proposition to empower the Government to impose universal service and levy military conscription is a complete subversion of democratic principles and is opposed to every American tradition. It takes away the sovereign power of choice from the citizen and confiscates his personal freedom on the altar of forced military service. It makes of the Government a military bureaucracy, with power over the life and liberty of the citizen. The term "sovereign citizen" becomes irony. Sovereignty is transferred from the citizenship to the Government. A military bureaucracy becomes sovereign, and the citizen becomes conscript and subject.

I am willing to grant that this military bureaucratic power will be used by the present administration with rare discretion and wisdom. It will be for the time being a "benevolent" autocratic rule. The application of the Prussian system to our soil will be generous in its consideration of the conditions of our citizenship. Our military bureaucracy will attempt to make itself popular. But that does not lessen the danger to our fundamental democratic principles. On the other hand, it augments the danger. The more wise, benevolent, and popular military conscript and universal military service is made in the beginning the more insidious and enduring will be its final establishment. And a day may come, and, indeed, is logically certain to come, as militarism develops and secures hold upon our citizenship, when a less benevolent and more despotic military bureaucracy will employ conscript and use the great military class created by universal military training for ends of which the fathers of our Constitution never dreamed.

Perhaps I am old-fashioned in my ideas. Possibly I may be influenced in my views by the fact that my forefathers have been volunteers in every war of our Republic, and by the fact that in 1898 I was an American volunteer myself. I confess that the idea of conscription and of forced military service is repugnant to every atom of my being. I feel that it destroys the very spirit of patriotism. It substitutes for the patriotic soul of American citizenship a machine-made militarism. To the professional militarist this substitution may make a favorable appeal; but to him who draws his inspiration and his faith from the Declaration of Independence and from the Bill of Rights of our Constitution, the transplanting of the Prussian system on American soil brings fear and foreboding.

If the principles and traditions taught in our schools and declaimed from the public forum on the Fourth of July are true and right, then the system of military conscription and universal military service advocated on this floor are wrong. Anxious as I am to support any well-conceived measures to advance our cause on the battle field in order to hasten the return of peace, I can not bring myself to support a measure that is hostile to every American tradition from 1776 down through 140 years of patriotic memory. I can not vote for a measure which takes from American schools and colleges the boys and young men who are engaged in the study and recitation of the principles and deeds of our forefathers and impress them into forced military service while they are declaiming the glories of self-government. I can not support a measure which empowers Federal military agents to seize citizens who may gather at the next Fourth of July celebration to glorify "consent of the governed" and drag them away as military conscripts. If the gospel which we preach is true, if it voices the soul of America, we as representatives of the American people and trustees of the immunities of the Constitution can not rightfully betray our trust by substituting for it the basic system of Prussian military autocracy, which is universal military servitude and military conscript. Is this the type of legislation which will create patriotic volunteers when we issue a call to arms? Is this the type of law which will command affection for our institutions and make of the rising generation a race of patriotic democrats? For answer we are compelled to look across the water where military conscript and universal military servitude have fulfilled their mission, and created what we please to term "Prussian autocracy"—the "foe to liberty." [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH]. [Applause.]

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, Abraham Lincoln was a Member of the Thirtieth Congress of the United States, and after serving two years as a Member of the House of Representatives retired to private life. Why Congress was thus deprived of his able services has always been to me a source of wonder and regret. I did not understand the real cause of Lincoln's retirement until I read a few days ago that his early political downfall was the result of his opposition to the War with Mexico, he having voted on January 3, 1848, in favor of a resolution declaring that the Mexican War was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced by the President of the United States. (See speech of Lincoln delivered in the House, Jan. 12, 1848, vol. 17, 30th Cong., 1st sess., Library, House of Representatives, p. 91.)

Stephen A. Douglas, in the first joint debate with Mr. Lincoln, held in Ottawa, Ill., August 31, 1858, as shown on page 210 of volume 3, Complete Works of Abraham Lincoln, Nicolay and Hay, with the finger of scorn pointed at Lincoln, made use of the following words:

While in Congress he (Lincoln) distinguished himself by his opposition to the Mexican War, taking the side of the common enemy against his own country; and when he returned home, he found that the indignation of the people followed him everywhere, and he was again submerged or obliged to retire into private life, forgotten by his former friends.

Mr. Lincoln in his reply to this, as found on page 230 of the same work, said:

I would not vote that the war had been righteously begun by the President, but whenever they asked for any money or land warrants or anything to pay the soldiers there during all that time I gave the same vote that Judge Douglas did.

From this it is evident that the wise and conscientious Lincoln, for the casting of an honest vote in favor of peace and against war, was ridiculed by the newspapers, denounced by his former friends, and hounded into temporary obscurity.

A short time ago when 12 conscientious United States Senators voted against armed neutrality, which since has been a confessed failure, the newspapers of the country, clamoring for excitement, aided by many people eager to be fed from political spoons, cried, "Away with them! Away with them!" and began at once to institute plans for their political crucifixion.

A little while later 50 men of the House voted against a resolution declaring that war existed with Germany. By so doing they brought upon their heads a reign of terror, and now a hungry pack of political bloodhounds are baying on the track of each. They have been branded as traitors by the newspapers, denounced by men in pulpits, and in some instances have been hanged in effigy by former friends.

Those who have thus brought upon their heads such severe criticism should take courage from the fact that Abraham Lincoln was also a temporary victim of the war gods of his time.

Some day a great army may come from across the sea and lower our flag; some day foreign airships may fill our skies, and bombs may burst on fair and sacred spots; some day submarines may come in fleets and, like sea wolves, haunt our shores. I know not; but this I do know—that he who denounces a legislator for the casting of an honest vote is gnawing at the tap root of the governmental tree, and should he have his wicked way lawmakers would become craven cowards, afraid to express their honest thoughts until they heard from a dictator or the mob upon the streets.

I care not whether it be Stephen A. Douglas reviling Abraham Lincoln for voting his convictions against the war of 1846 or the newspapers deriding the Senators and Representatives who voted against the present war. The principle is the same.

In this democracy where all have a duty to think and act, the rights of the minority are as sacred as the claims of the majority. The majority is always strong enough to defend itself, but the minority is not.

All great reforms of the world have at first been supported by a minority of mankind. The minority standing by its colors and fighting for what it thought was right has won all the real battles of the world. On the rugged pathway of progress a few are always in the lead. A few who blaze the trails are ridiculed at first but are finally followed by their fellow man.

The framers of our Constitution, recognizing the fact that the minority might be right, armed one-fifth of the membership present of either House with the power to demand a roll call and gave them the implements of filibuster to use as they saw fit.

An English legislator recently said:

In England we feel that the theory of democracy requires the fullest and frankest discussion of every measure. We feel that the minority has a right to a respectful hearing. This is the only way you can carry on a democracy and keep it a democracy.

Another strange thing I find is that in America you seem to expect that when the minority is beaten it will at once capitulate, declare it has been in the wrong, and join the majority. This is not democracy, either. In England during the Boer War and this war, but especially in the Boer War, there was an organized minority in Parliament—there always has been in time of war. In the Boer War this minority was led by no less a person than David Lloyd-George.

If you make it an American policy that when the majority has once spoken, the right and duty of the minority to express itself and fight for what it believes in ends, you have lost your democracy. There is no safety or wisdom in trying to suppress thought or to force men to silence.

It alarms me to see how quickly public sentiment now changes against men who happen to be with the minority. For instance, Senator LA FOLLETTE, the father of our later-day progressive thought, is ridiculed by many because while this hideous war craze is sweeping the country he remains calm and sane.

Regardless as to what the newspapers and his critics say, BOB LA FOLLETTE was never more deserving and nearer right than now.

Ex-Senator J. D. Works, of California, who retired from the Senate of the United States of his own free will after six years of conspicuous and conscientious service, working all the time he was here in an able manner for what he thought to be right, was denounced by some of the newspapers of California as a traitor to his country because he voted against armed neutrality.

The wicked spirit exemplified by such criticism is more dangerous to us than all the standing armies of Europe and in time, if not subdued, will undermine and overthrow this Republic.

Let us go back and review some of our wars advised and encouraged by the same kind of financial, political, and personal interests that have brought on our present war and that now clamor for the infamous plan of conscription.

U. S. Grant, twice President of the United States, and the greatest general this country has ever known, said in his Personal Memoirs, volume 1, page 119, chapter 9:

The Mexican War was a political war, and the administration conducting it desired to make party capital out of it.

Again, on page 55:

Even if the annexation itself could be justified, the manner in which the subsequent war was forced upon Mexico can not. * * * The Army did not stop at the Nueces and offer to negotiate for a settlement of the boundary question, but went beyond, apparently in order to force Mexico to initiate war.

On pages 67 and 68:

The presence of the United States troops on the edge of the disputed territory farthest from the Mexican settlement was not sufficient to provoke hostilities. We were sent to provoke a fight, but it was essential that Mexico should commence it. It was very doubtful whether Congress would declare war: but if Mexico should attack our troops, the Executive could announce, "Whereas war exists by the acts of," etc., and prosecute the contest with vigor. Once initiated, there were but few public men who would have the courage to oppose it.

This war of 1846 with Mexico, voted against by Abraham Lincoln, and which vote drove him into political exile for 15 years; this war declared by Grant to have been a political war, was fought by 100,000 of our armed men—26,690 Regulars, 56,926 Volunteers, and so forth. Twelve thousand three hundred soldiers lost their lives as the result of this war, and an equal number was disabled and ruined in health by wounds. The cost, exclusive of pensions granted in late years, was from $130,000,000 to $160,000,000. (See Mexican War, by Wilcox, p. 561.)

Averaging the weight of each soldier at 160 pounds who thus lost his life in this war denounced by Lincoln and Grant, we find that 934 tons of young and comely flesh was on account of it reduced to putrefaction, grinning skeletons, and bleached and withered bones. If these dead were 6 feet in length, placed end to end, a pedestrian could walk over 12 miles, stepping every foot of the way upon the bloated bodies of the dead, bodies of young men who had not a word to say about bringing on the war and who knew not but what its cause was just.

I have read of a great and final day of judgment when all the dead, both rich and poor, high and low, great and small, shall stand before the judgment bar of God, when earth's mighty host from every age and land shall meet their Master face to face. When that day comes the war gods, newspaper editors, and politicians who brought on that war, together with the revilers of the peace-loving Lincoln will hang their guilty heads, and some pictures boldly swinging now on granite walls will fall beneath their weighted shame.

From the crime of 1846 let us pass down to our next foreign war of 1898, brought on by the same active agencies of 1846 and to-day, for humanity does not change.

John Sherman, Secretary of State during the Spanish-American War, said, in a public address at his home in Mansfield, Ohio, at a reception given in his honor just before he retired as Secretary of State:

Had not the War with Spain been declared when it was we could have secured by treaty with Spain all that we demanded.

The United States Government in 1903 published a "Report of the Foreign Relations of the United States," for a period that included the diplomatic negotiations preceding the War with Spain. This report shows that on February 26, 1898, the American minister to Spain, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, wrote to President McKinley that he had obtained the "practical adjustment of every problem" that had been intrusted to him. On April 3, 1898, Minister Woodford cabled to President McKinley as follows (p. 732):

If conditions at Washington still enable you to give me the necessary time, I am sure that before next October I will get peace in Cuba with justice to Cuba and protection to our great American interests. I know that the Queen and her ministry sincerely desire peace, and that if you can give me time and reasonable liberty of action I will get for you the peace you desire so much and for which you have labored so hard.

Just a few days before we declared war Minister Woodford again cabled President McKinley, on April 10, repeating the foregoing sentiments, and added:

I hope that nothing will be done to humiliate Spain, as I am satisfied that the present government is going, and is loyally ready to go, as fast and as far as it can. With your power of action, sufficiently free, you will win the fight on your own lines.

Yet on April 19 Congress ordered armed intervention in Cuba, and three days later adopted a resolution in which it was declared that "war exists."

What a shame to the American people that a war was unnecessarily declared, which resulted in the death of 6,395 officers and enlisted men, wherein hundreds of millions of dollars were spent, when the matter could have been settled by ink and pen on a scrap of paper.

With these two wars making crimson the pages of our country's history, would it not appear that the American people should begin to mistrust their war makers and war advisers and decide to settle war matters for themselves?

With these two examples of wars hastily and wrongfully brought, do you think the person who now votes against war or conscription should for that reason alone be denounced as a traitor to his country?

The General Staff and others who are advising us now were the same agencies that brought on the expedition to Vera Cruz to make Heurta, the bandit, salute the flag, notwithstanding his pretended seat and power we refused to recognize. We came back, however, without the salute, leaving 19 of our boys and 150 Mexicans dead upon the battlefield. That fruitless expedition caused 13 tons of human flesh to be reduced to silent clay. Buried, it is true, but by relatives and history; not forgotten.

They also drove our Army, about 20,000 strong, 300 miles into Mexico, pursuing, like an aeroplane a mosquito, the bandit Villa. While we did not capture him, 40 of our own men succumbed, battle and disease claiming an equal share. While we killed 40 Mexicans near Paral, provoked battle with Villa's enemies at Carrizal, in which 39 Mexicans, including Gen. Gomez, were killed, 109 lives were lost and over 8 tons of human flesh were torn by shot and shell and reduced to dust—a fruitless expedition.

This Congress has followed the newspapers and military advisers to Vera Cruz. It has followed them down the cactus plains 300 miles into Mexico; but, for one, I am not in favor of us compelling the young men of this country to follow them to the trenches across the sea.

Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of criticizing the President of the United States. I have said more good words for him than the majority of the membership of this House. In my last campaign I made 70 speeches in my district in his behalf. "He kept us out of war" was my only slogan. In the whole campaign I made but one promise: "I will aid the President in every way possible in keeping this country out of war." Eighteen thousand voters had registered against him in my district, yet he carried it by upward of 9,000 votes, the banner district of the State, and more than twice the number of votes that he received to the good in the State of California, which was the pivotal State in the Union. I acted my humble part in securing his victory, but it was not speeches that did the work. It was a strong conviction on the part of the people that through him our country would be spared the sorrow and pangs of war.

Mr. Chairman, time is the great demonstrator of the folly and shortsightedness of mankind. On the 7th of March of last year this House voted against warning American citizens to refrain from traveling on armed belligerent ships, as provided in the McLemore resolution, H. Res. 147.

A score of men at least when this resolution was being debated, in speeches in the House, declared the defeating of the resolution would mean war with Germany. Their prophecies, however, were not heeded, the resolution was lost, and war has now been declared. I have heard within the last day or two a dozen or more Representatives who voted against the resolution say they made a mistake. Gentlemen, the same agencies that persuaded this Congress into voting against giving the warning are demanding conscription now. The 142 men who voted in favor of giving the warning were each lambasted for expressing his honest opinion, were held up to scorn and ridiculed by about all the great newspapers of the country. Yet at that time 95 per cent at least of our people were in favor of giving the warning.

There would have been rare sunshine to-day in our skies instead of war clouds had this Congress left unheeded the demands of the newspapers and Washington, and listened to the wise requests of the people at home.

I am proud to say that I voted in favor of giving the warning, and at the next election the people indorsed my conduct by giving me a majority of 11,111 votes over my next strongest opponent in a district registered 18,000 against me. Congressman MCLEMORE, from the fighting State of Texas, when his resolution was the only issue of the next election, in the primaries with 13 candidates against him, ran 34,000 ahead of his next highest opponent, and in the November election received 13,500 more votes than did the Democratic nominee for the Presidency.

The people of the United States are now in favor of the volunteer system, at least to the same extent as they were in favor of giving the warning.

I submit to you again that the agencies that have been advising us during the last 70 years in regard to going to war have proven themselves not to be in harmony with the common people, and it is time for us to begin to use our own judgments.

For one, I would be afraid to advocate conscription at the beginning of this or any other war for fear the people of the world would think the citizens of the United States have degenerated so they are not willing to fight for what they think is right, or else they do not consider their cause is just. They know all of our other wars have been fought and won by volunteers, and I am sure they would wonder why the system is not good enough for us now.

If the volunteer system is wrong, then Washington was wrong. Lincoln and Grant were wrong and Daniel Webster was wrong, for they all advocated it.

Daniel Webster said in a speech delivered in Congress on December 9, 1814:

* * * * * * *

The supporters of the measure before us (a bill for conscription) act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers, by construction, out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion, which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free, and limited Government, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions that government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort of misery, than has been exercised by any civilized government, with one exception, in modern times.

* * * * * * *

A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction, a free government without adequate provisions for personal security is an absurdity, a free government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

* * * * * * *

Who shall describe to you the horror which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the anguish and distress which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor and to rest in security and happiness? Anticipate the scene, sir, when the class shall assemble to stand its draft and to throw the dice for blood. What a group of wives and mothers and sisters, of helpless age and helpless infancy, shall gather round the theater of this horrible lottery, as if the strokes of death were to fall from heaven before their eyes on a father, a brother, a son, or a husband. And in the majority of cases, sir, it will be the stroke of death.

* * * * * * *

Laws, sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad, like the fabled serpent's teeth they will spring up into armed men. A military force can not be raised in this manner, but by the means of a military force. If the administration has found that it can not form an army without conscription, it will find, if it venture on these experiments, that it can not enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail, and, having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our Government.

Mr. Chairman. I wish that Daniel Webster was here now. Only a few feet from this Chamber yonder in the Hall of Fame, alongside of Lincoln, Washington, Grant, and America's other immortals, we have placed with reverent hands a marble statue of this matchless man. How I wish it could speak to-night. I wish he could come back to earth, from the sacred abode of philosophers where he now abides, and with one of his masterly speeches bring this American Congress to its feet and to its senses again. If he were here, the advocates of this measure would slink away through these open doors like the money changers of old did in Solomon's Temple before the whip in the hand of Jesus of Nazareth.

Bring on a war that the people were not in favor of and then decree that it shall be fought by a million boys between the ages of 19 and 25 years. I wish that Daniel Webster were here to speak for the young men of this country. Not one of them are here or can be here to speak for himself; not one of them had a voice in bringing on the war. They are too young and have not sufficient discretion to be here, yet on account of a lack of discretion it is claimed they will make better soldiers and be more rash on the battle field.

Webster said:

Who shall describe to you the sorrow which your orders of conscription shall create in the once happy villages of this country? Who shall describe the anguish and distress which they will spread over those hills and valleys, where men have heretofore been accustomed to labor and rest in security and happiness?

One must be indeed limited in his imaginative powers who can not foresee the disappointment, pain, lonesomeness, anguish, and sorrow that conscription will bring to the hearts and homes of this country.

Yesterday Senator LA FOLLETTE, in the Senate, described what conscription really means so much better than I can that I will quote his words:

Mr. President, however uncertain the meaning of some portions of this bill may be, its main purpose is clear. About that there is no dispute. The main purpose of this bill is to clothe one man with power, acting through emissaries and agents appointed by him, to enter at will every home in our country, at any hour of the day or night, using all the force necessary to effect the entry, and violently lay hold of 1,000,000 of our finest and healthiest and strongest boys, ranging in age from 19 to 25 years, and against their will, and against the will and wishes of their parents or family, deport them across the seas to a foreign land three thousand and more miles away, and to require them, under penalty of death if they refuse, to wound and kill other young boys just like themselves and toward whom they feel no hostility and have cause to feel none.

Mr. Chairman, I can not get the viewpoint of any man who is capable of harboring the thought that it is right at the beginning of this war to conscript the young men of this country, 95 per cent of whom do not believe this war should have been brought; compel them to cast to the winds their cherished hopes of life, and leave parents, home, and friends, in order to become butchers in Europe of their fellowmen.

Conscription totally ignores the rights of the minority, who believe this war should not have been brought. I say minority only for argument sake. As a matter of fact, it is an overwhelming majority who holds such views. But suppose it is only a minority. What are you going to do with the young men whom you select to fight who do not believe in the war? Are you going to make them fight? Yes; you propose to make them fight in this war, whether they think it just or not. Do you not know there are hundreds of thousands of our young men who if they were in this war would rather turn their guns on themselves than to take the life of some German, with a family and little children at home, who had not a word to say in regard to bringing on the war and who knows nothing whatever about our submarine controversy or any of the causes of the war.

I notice in this debate there has been a great effort to confuse universal military training with selective conscription. The propositions are two opposites. The one may be wise and just, the other is wicked.

Conscription might work in Russia, where men are driven like dogs, but not in this Republic, where men think, feel, and act freely for themselves.

If you want a sulky, indifferent, and unwilling army, force them to go to war.

If your cause is so unjust that you have to force free men to fight, you had better lay down your arms and declare the war is closed.

If you want a buoyant, determined, and intrepid army, have a good cause and call for volunteers. You would have difficulty in protecting the recruiting stations against the crowds.

Adopt the plan of conscription and you will make your country hated and 50,000 young men will flee from their native land each year.

As an example of the quality of a conscript army, let me read another extract from Senator LA FOLLETTE'S speech of yesterday:

So great was the feeling of the people against the draft laws of 1863 that President Lincoln felt constrained to say upon one occasion that it was best not to really try and enforce the law. And as to the results of the securing of this system, an efficient military force, I quote this from President Lincoln:

"We get a large body of reinforcements together and start them to the front, but after deducting the sick, the deserters, the stragglers, and the discharged, the numbers seriously diminish by the time they reach their destination. It's like trying to shovel fleas across a barnyard—you don't get 'em all there."

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I see no reason why we should abandon our former policy and resort to conscription at the beginning of this war. England has not even yet a conscript upon the battle field, and neither Canada, Ireland, New Zealand, or Australia have adopted the plan, yet Canada alone has sent 400,000 of the best fighting men of the world to the trenches.

Even if I were in favor of conscription generally, I would not be in favor of it now, for I think we have already done and planned to do enough. We do not expect to get the slightest financial benefits from the war. We are simply fighting to establish the right to run the German submarine blockade, and we would be able to do that at the end of the war just the same whether we enter it or not. Our allies are fighting for commercial supremacy, territorial advantage as well as for expansion.

The German island possessions in the Pacific have already fallen a prey to England and Japan. German Samoa surrendered to an expeditionary force from the British colony of New Zealand August 29, 1914. Australian troops occupied Herbertshohe, the seat of government for the German colonies of the Bismarck Archipelago and Solomon Islands, September 11, and captured Kaiser Wilhelmsland, the northeastern third of the large island of New Guinea, September 24–25. Jaluit, the most easterly of the German islands in the Caroline Archipelago, surrendered without offering resistance to Japanese marines on or before October 6. Yap, at the western end of the group, was taken a day later. By October 20 Japan had possessed herself of all the Marshall Islands, the Marianne Islands—Ladrones—and the eastern and western Caroline Archipelagoes, and the German flag had vanished from the South Seas.

The Germans could not reenforce her colonial garrisons; her colonies in Africa were left at the mercy of their French and British neighbors. Togo, the narrow German territory on the north of the Gulf of Guinea, was attacked by British warships on August 8 and surrendered to Anglo-French forces from Gold Coast and Dahomey August 25. Kamerun, the large German colony north of the Kongo River, was likewise conquered by combined British and French forces late in September. German Southwest Africa was invaded and Luderitz Bay captured in September by forces from the Union of South Africa.

These possessions were worth untold millions to Japan, England, and France.

There is hardly a way to estimate the financial advantage which Japan will receive if she can only hold the possessions she has already taken, say nothing about what she is yet to receive when her cause, through our assistance, is finally won.

By entering this war we lose not only all we put into it but strengthen Japan for the probable day when she will measure strength with us. We thus lose both ways. We also strengthen England for the day when we will have another war with her. We have had two wars with England in a little over a hundred years, and it is only reasonable to believe that we may have at least another one in the future. The area of England's colonies already amounts to 11,377,434 square miles. France, in addition to other possessions, will get Alsace and Lorraine. Italy is fighting Austria for land heretofore taken from it, while Russia is anxious to get down to the warm waters of the Mediterranean.

In assisting these kingdoms and empires to extend their boundaries by aggression it is difficult for an average mind to comprehend in what manner we are developing the democracy of the world.

I once saw a half dozen wolves fighting over the carcass of a sheep. There was just as much humanity and democracy in the snaps, snarls, and vicious lunges of these wolves as there is in the war now being fought by the great powers across the sea.

I repeat again, we will get nothing and do not hope to get anything as the result of the war. No sunny Alsace and Lorraine await us when the storm is past, and none of the broken fragments of Turkey or Germany will drift to our shores.

In view of the fact that the war does not belong to us, that we are in it only as an accident, the question is, How much should we put into it? I claim we have done and planned to do already enough, without sending an army of soldiers to the trenches.

We have already appropriated $7,000,000,000 to this enterprise. Have you ever stopped to realize how much that is?

It is more than three times the investment of the telephone companies of the world.

It would pay the public debt of all the cities, States, and counties in the United States more than twice over.

It is more than four times the total value of the school property of the United States and eight times the value of the wheat crop of 1916.

It would buy over 240,000 of the most modern all-steel Pullman cars. Seven billion dollars amounts to more than $6 for every minute since the birth of Jesus Christ.

If it cost $75 a mile to travel to the sun, you could make the journey and still have money in your pockets.

If you had $7,000,000,000 and wished to distribute it, you could give each person living in the world $3.50 and yet have money to spare.

You could give $10 apiece to every inhabitant of the allied belligerent countries, including Japan.

You would have money enough to give every person in the United States approximately $70.

Seven billion dollars is one-half a billion less than the total assessed value of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin and is more than six times the total assessed value of the city of Chicago.

In addition to this tremendous amount of money we have dedicated the American Navy with all its wealth of ships and fighting force to this other fellow's war. Every man and ship may be lost; we can not tell. We are supplying our allies with all their necessary food, and we have been and still will supply them with all munitions of war which they desire. Our people even before the war began had loaned them and given them credit to the amount of more than $4,000,000,000.

Is there not a time and place somewhere to stop? Does prudence demand that having furnished our wealth we must also make an offering of our blood? No; the American people cry out against it.

With all this tremendous contribution of energy and wealth there is certainly no necessity to force anyone to go 3,000 miles across the sea and fight. If anyone feels that it is his duty, let him go. There is no reason why Col. Roosevelt and the men who desire to accompany him should not be permitted to go. I read that 200,000 men are eager to accompany him and carry Old Glory to the trenches of Europe. Why compel unwilling boys to go and fight and refuse to permit willing men to follow such a gallant leader? Do not tell me that Roosevelt will not make good. Everybody knows neither he nor his men will disgrace the flag.

Mr. Chairman, after all there is but one way to get rid of war, and that is to let the people who have to do the fighting and dying in case of war decide when there shall be war.

On January 31 of last year I introduced House joint resolution 128, which provides for a change in the Constitution of the United States limiting the power of Congress to declare war only in cases of invasion, threatened invasion, insurrection, or revolution within the United States or of its insular possesions and in other cases where the matter of declaring war has been submitted to the people and a majority of those voting have declared themselves in favor of the proposed war. In other words, Congress shall have the right to declare war only in cases of emergencies. In all other cases it shall be left to the people.

I consider this scheme a solution of the whole war proposition. The people of one nation seldom if ever want to fight the people of another nation. It is the rulers of nations that bring on war. President Wilson in his Chicago speech several months ago said, "Rulers, not public opinion, brought on the present war in Europe."

In my judgment ninety-nine out of every hundred of the wars that have come in the past to curse and blight the world have been brought on not by the mandates of the people but by the command of the rulers.

Our present plan is neither safe nor fair. I hear much about the honor of our country, and I believe the honor of this country should be maintained, but I want to see the term "honor" defined by the men who have to maintain it. I would not like to have some fat fellow define my honor, tell me when it had been assailed, and shove me into a fight.

No man should have to be a factor in this country's defense in time of war who was not a factor on election day in determining whether there should be war.

War is the most important of all subjects. Why should not the people decide it?

Why should not the interested parties decide the most interesting to them of all subjects?

Do we not believe that the people should rule? Do we mean this is a Government wherein the people shall decide matters of minor importance but when it comes to deciding whether we shall have war, the largest and most important of all questions, that the people are not qualified to decide? As human blood and human life are of more importance than all other considerations of humanity, so the question of war is of more importance than all other subjects.

I can not see why the people of the United States should hire a little over 500 men here in Washington to tell them when it is time for them to bleed and die on the battle fields.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say I am still opposed to our entering into this war. I believe that when we surrendered our position as a neutral Nation we deliberately abandoned our place of superiority among the nations of the earth. Up to that fatal hour we had been in the lead, the light of the world and the hope of humanity. It will take a century at least to regain what we lose. But now, as if not satisfied with the havoc which our war declaration will bring, we propose to pass this conscription measure, which is the worst bill that could be proposed.

We are forsaking the example of our fathers and taking counsel from across the sea. Instead of being the light of the world for others from dark and abandoned lands we now seek for inspiration. We now turn from the counsel of Washington and Jefferson to listen to a foreign commission. In the year 1917 we are taking advice from the people whose philosophy we rejected in 1776. If their policies are superior to ours the Revolutionary War was fought in vain.

I was in favor of the McLemore resolution. I voted against declaring war, and I now oppose conscription.

Abraham Lincoln, in the midst of the Mexican War, in this very House voted to stop the war on the grounds that it should never have been brought, and, using him as an example, I stand ready to vote for a similar resolution now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. [Applause.]

Mr. DALE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are living in a new world. The thought of nations can not mature quickly enough to realize the change that has taken place. Genius, expert and cruel beyond human conception, a few months since has made warfare an unfamiliar science to those once skilled in it. The old weapons are gone, and even the temperament of the soldier must have different development for his service.

Courage is the same and will last unchanged till time has run its course; but it is a fearful act to send it to mere sacrifice without intensive training for highest efficiency against the effective inventions of the keenest specialists among men.

And yet it is argued here that we can meet the imminent crisis that is upon us as our fathers met the conflicts of their time, by force of numbers backed by responsive courage. Ah, the courage of our ancestors was most admirable. It taught us the finest lessons in history. It could be summoned to victorious defense of its rights by the midnight ride of a Paul Revere.

But that is tradition—priceless forever—but not to be followed now, unless to disaster.

A gentleman has said in his argument for the volunteer system, truthfully but inadvertently, that it is shrined in tradition. Yes; we can go back with holiest emotions to the shrine of that which has passed away. It is a fact, a pitiless, merciless fact, that the price of war to-day is not only the blood of courageous men but of the brightest, keenest, strongest in intellect and physique—the selected Army of the Republic.

To the realization of this in all its hard, cold necessity we must rise from the inclination to linger by the shrine of our traditions. And that we may not do this quickly enough is an element of danger, first to the Republic.

We stand to-day a nation as with a closed door behind us—the adamantine door has swung to forevermore—and we can not choose but go forward to our destiny.

We are a part of the imperiled civilization assailed by acutely and desperately developed imperialism in its death struggle. What this means to us we can not tell, but we can intelligently face our obligation by the one assumption alone that it means a like awful experience to that which has come to the soldiers of France and England.

Under the stress of this requirement shall we invoke tradition or even experiment with it in the method we adopt?

Shall we wait to see the result of a volunteer system that must be conceded to be uncertain?

Moreover, and I speak now for the mothers and the boys—my boys as well as yours—I can not bring myself to the conclusion that it is my duty to them to send our soldiers out with other than the highest-trained, best-selected comrades, for they must be saved, if at all, by such forces.

My home is close to the Canadian border, from the other side of which, as the world knows, have gone many of the bravest boys in this war. From personal knowledge I can state the fact that Canada realizes that some of them went to death from causes that conscription would have avoided.

For the welfare of the Republic, for the protection of the soldiers, for the sake of my own boys, I am impelled to the conviction that it is my duty to vote for selective conscription. [Applause.]

And as we train our soldiers we should impress upon them the broader and higher conception of the changed world conditions that have swept away the very motives of former wars and brought forth other principles for which men will struggle. Conflict between one principality and another for sovereignty is of the past, and henceforth war will be by allied nations for broader democracy whenever assailed by autocracy. The plans of an imperial empire to concentrate its terrible magnificent genius for the perpetuation of its separate power have gone all awry, and the Divinity that shapes the course of events will seize them for the general uplift of all the peoples of the earth.

It is more than a new era; it is a transformation that stands clear in the light of passing events.

The world can no longer follow the course of action that it was well to take through the years that lie back of us, and yet men quote the language of patriots and philosophers of a hundred years and more ago for our guidance in this time of very transubstantiation. The utterances of the early statesmen of this Republic quoted on this floor to sustain or destroy conflicting arguments are all sublime when read in the light of the history they helped to make; but if those men could stand among us to-day in the full realization of this hour's events, with what amazement would they listen to the application of their words! Oh, these days are filled with occasions without a parallel in the glory of the fact and hope they demonstrate. Four days ago the envoys of that nation against which we gained the first great struggle for political liberty were received in this Capital with loud acclaim of welcome. Yesterday officials representing that country which was our ally in the conflict for our independence were greeted with enthusiasm, and due homage was rendered the great military leader who checked the well-nigh successful attempt to ruin the republican institutions of Europe and America. [Applause.]

Do you feel that Washington, if he could stand to-day before that splendid memorial to Columbus and lift his eyes to the three tall staffs behind and with the Stars and Stripes in the center and the flags of France and England on either side, would have us construe his words as condemnation of the present quality of our alliance? [Applause.]

No; that inspiring sight is the emblem of the achievement of democracy, in which the United States will now bear its part, avoid the opprobrium and win the gatitude finally of all mankind.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have listened now for four days to a spirited debate that will soon conclude in a decision between the so-called volunteer and selective-draft systems in the raising of a great American army. The debate has been heavy with the thought of conditions and the contemplation of probabilities that are driving us to the necessity of sending much of the youth and strength and hope of our country into the great world struggle. It takes an effort to rise from the natural mood of depression into the state of confidence that is required of us at this time. But having done this, I believe that you and I stand to-day under the control of but one influence. Men and parties are of no consequence. A method offered by a man or a group of men has no compulsory force, even though it come from the President of the United States, a majority or minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, or the War Department. As the expert knowledge of all these is superior, we respect it. As a reason given by any man, high or low in political station, is sane and forceful, we welcome it. As any information coming from any source, we ought to think upon it. But at last we are required by all the faith of Christianity and patriotism of citizenship and love of family to vote under the one influence that each man must feel is laying its iron hand upon him. For myself, I feel the influence of this one purpose—the quickest concentration of the most skilled forces from all the people to maintain by military and industrial effort the principles for which the Nation has declared war. [Applause.]

This greatest nation on the earth has taken its position; the emblem of our country is already advancing before us. I would maintain that national place and follow that flag at any cost, and I would give no citizen of this Republic the right to do otherwise. [Applause.] All over this country are men of inherent patriotism. There is for them only one course possible. If there are men who would take another course, nothing more sublime could come to them than to be taught the inspiration of living which they lack.

Conscription? Yes. The disasters and successes of this world sustain it. Selective conscription? Yes; where on farm or in shop or because of disability or obligation a man can serve his country better in another place than in the Army, and for the present, because a minor he should be exempted. But for some other reasons never. When the Nation calls an army it is to the defense of all its citizens and homes, and from that duty this American Congress ought not to excuse any man because of his social position, his cowardice, his wealth, or his religion. This is a new experience to citizens of the Republic, and it demands an element of patriotism in one sense of the highest nature, a new conception of an old duty—the willingness to go into the jaws of death without the option to refuse.

Whether the requirement shall be for long time and with heavy sacrifice, no man knoweth. That is immaterial now. This Congress should act as it would in preparation for a struggle no less awful than is being met by nations across the sea and in the firm faith that by such preparation the American Army will become invincible.

In line with this discussion I would suggest two cheerful thoughts—the one of a great organization that will support the Army and the other of an able man who is influencing this debate. Both came to this country, by a strange coincidence, from the same small political division of the great German Empire. To the home of the Grand Duchess Louise, an heroic woman whose old age is still sublime in its sorrow, went another no less heroic American woman during the Franco-Prussian War and brought back to this country the impulse and experience from which she organized the American National Red Cross. From the Grand Duchy of Baden it came to America. From the Grand Duchy of Baden there also came to America at about the same time a boy who has since become a forceful citizen on the Pacific coast and for years in the Congress of this Nation. By and by, when the years of this war are over and the good that shall have been accomplished is reviewed by other generations with patriotic pride, they who study history will learn that on opposing sides of this debate were two superior leaders, one of whom was the earnest, scholarly, forensic orator who from the Grand Duchy of Baden crossed the seas and became the loyal American statesman—JULIUS KAHN. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALE of Vermont. If I have the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would it not be well to call attention also to the fact that Representative KAHN, of California, and Representative GARDNER, of Massachusetts, were the two men in the forefront of the effort several years ago to have a little bit of preparedness in the United States?

Mr. DALE of Vermont. I think it would be very well to do that, and I thank the gentleman for calling my attention and the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE]. [Applause.]

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, just two points have come up here to-day that I would like to say a word about. The first is that not only during to-day but for the last two or three days men have spoken here of the hardships of the draft system, that it worked an injustice on some of the people. Now, is there any man here in this Hall to-night, or any Member of Congress who thinks of any great measure that has been passed in this House or in any other legislative body that has not worked an injustice on someone? Think for a moment of the public-school system of the United States. When that was established in the several States after we became a Nation, there were men in every community in which it was established who protested and said, "I do not want to pay for the education of my neighbor's children. I have no children but I have large properties, and you ask me to pay this large bill." Then there was another very legitimate excuse and that was that one large Christian denomination said, "We do not want our children educated in the public schools and the members of our church do not want to pay to support these public schools for we sustain our own schools," and there were many other legitimate objections to such a law, and yet there is not a man present to-night but feels that universal public-school education in our country is a necessity. We would not for a moment go back to any other system. Again, as our small hamlets grew into villages and the villages into small cities and the small cities into greater municipalities it became necessary to build a sewer system and a water system for the community, and notwithstanding that many men had driven wells or had brought water a long distance to their homes and had built sewer systems for their particular places, we had to pass such laws, because many would not provide a sewer system and it was necessary for the community and the health of the city. There is no great law and no great reform established but what some man is injuriously hurt by that law.

Now, there has been some complaint here to-day, and a great deal of it yesterday, that the people and the newspapers at home did not understand the situation. They have told us that the newspapers were mixing up the question of universal military education with conscription, and that the people did not make a distinction between the two. Well, now, let us see if the people are all fools and if the newspapers do not understand the situation. Let us suppose that the United States had had universal military education for the past 10 or 20 years, and that to-day we were raising an army to fight on the German border. Where would they get the men to do that fighting? There is no question where the men would come from. There would come a call for the class which had last been trained, and the President would say to the class of 1916, "Come to the colors." Then, if we did not have men enough to protect our Nation, he would call for the class of 1915; and if we did not have enough then, he would call for the class of 1914.

Is there any doubt but what that is conscription? Can you find any conscription more limited than to call out the young men of this Nation who are just 20 years of age and say, "You must come to the colors and defend us as a people and a Nation"? Is it improved by the fact that you call out the men who this year are 21 and who got their military service but two years ago, or that you call out the class of young men that are 22 years of age? Gentlemen, this is selective conscription, but it is universal military training also. [Applause.]

You have not fooled the people, nor are the people fooled. The fact is that if the bill which they are discussing in the Senate passes and becomes a law the very same men will serve in our armies on the first call that would have been called out to serve if we had been under universal military training during the past 10 years.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Are you advocating calling out the young men from 19 to 21?

Mr. ROWE. I think this bill is all right on that matter. I am in favor of men 21 to 40.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Do you claim there is any universal military training in this bill?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; it is a link in the system of universal training.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to read to the gentleman the Secretary's statement in reply to a question asked him by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], as follows:

> Mr. CALDWELL. Would you have any great objection to the substitution of a bill similar to or along the line of the Chamberlain bill for the universal training of our youth in the place of the clause for the second increment of 500,000?
> Secretary BAKER. I object to it for two reasons. In the first place, I am heartily in accord with the statement which the President has made on the subject. This is not the time to solve the problem or to settle the policy as a permanent policy of universal training or service, either one. The times are too distorted for that, and therefore I would object to the introduction of the Chamberlain bill as a substitute on that ground. In the second place, I object to it because, as I see it, the Chamberlain bill, and the General Staff bill as well, are peace-time propositions, looking to operation through a continued period of years, the result of which will be to produce an army. If we knew that 10 years from now we were going to face this emergency, either of those bills would produce an army at the end of the period of training.

Mr. ROWE. I do not say this is the beginning of permanent universal military training. I say that the people at home and the newspapers say that this is the beginning of what will lead into universal military training, and that the same young men will serve our country under this law as would have served the country had universal military training been in existence for the past 10 years.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What better military training do men expect to get than the actual test of war?

Mr. ROWE. There could be no better military training. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, no one wants war any more than he wants leprosy or smallpox. And yet out of the 571,000,000 Christians of the world 514,000,000 of them are at war. Only 58,000,000 Christians are at peace. The whole 571,000,000 Christians want peace. They must get it by fighting. Strange to relate, the real problem that brought on this war is Asiatic Turkey, the land of the Bible and the birthplace of Abraham.

No one wants war; but when war comes—and the momentous events of the world have been such that we could not have kept out of it—the thing to do is to fight, and fight hard, quick, and intelligently. What the United States wants now is a quick victory. When the world war is ended the world will know that the United States ended it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the press and the pulpit are the great leaders of public opinion. I shall say a brief word about both. This propaganda stuff—circulars, pamphlets, and the like—does not mold very much opinion. It comes in on both sides. We have heard the preparedness propaganda denounced. We have heard big men who can see far into the future denounced. But there is propaganda on the other side still coming in. I have here a publication just put out by a peace party which is still at work. It quotes a sermon delivered since the declaration of war by the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, New York. He said:

> No order of a President or a governor will persuade me or force me to this business of killing. On this issue—for me at least—there is no compromise. Once war is here the churches will be called upon to enlist, as will every other social institution. Therefore would I make it plain that so long as I am your minister the Church of the Messiah will answer no military summons. Other clergymen may pray to God for victory for our arms; I will not.

Gentlemen, the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, I suppose, had a right to say that, for we believe in free speech. But I think his judgment was bad. I believe, however, in free speech. He will not even have to fight. He will be exempted under this military bill by section 3. He was born in Philadelphia, the cradle of liberty; he graduated at Harvard, near Bunker Hill, and was ordained and installed in the Unitarian Church at Dorchester, and Dorchester, mind you, is in Massachusetts, where was fought the Battle of Lexington. He is the successor of Minot J. Savage as pastor of the Church of the Messiah. I do not criticize, but I am entitled to say I do not like his statements. His position as a pastor, a preacher of peace, of course, is hard. And so are the positions of all pastors with 90 per cent of the Christian peoples of the world at war. But all ministers and preachers must know now that our only hope of securing it is by war—and with victory on our side.

I do not like Rev. Mr. Holmes's sermon, Mr. Chairman, but I prefer a sermon delivered out in my district at Tacoma by the Rev. C. W. Weyer, who said a week ago that:

> If Christ was the captain of an American liner and Kaiser William said to him, "Don't you dare sail your boat across this line, if you do, I will kill you," he would sail the ship across that line in defiance of Kaiser Bill, if it were the right and true thing to do. His disciples warned Him not to go to Jerusalem. They said He would lose His life if he went. He did not stay away, and keep the peace. He went to Jerusalem and was crucified, although He knew before He went that He would be. It was His duty and He did not shirk it, although by so doing He started the greatest conflict the world has ever known—the battle between right and wrong.

I prefer also the patriotic and inspiring address of Bishop Frederic Keator, recently delivered in Tacoma, who will pray for the success of our arms, and who will help us to get an army by any process the President asks.

Now, as to the newspapers. You may be a little distrustful of the big ones, but you can depend on the little ones printed in the country towns where the editors often have to back up their printed views with their voices in street arguments and even with blows. I have a few less than 100 of these weekly papers in the district I represent. I read them. They want the kind of an army the President wants, and they are not squeamish about the name of the method you give to the scheme for raising that army. The trick is to get the army and get it now. Everybody knows that. I have here stacks of these papers to show you, and I will bank a great deal on what they say.

In these papers there has been published in the last few weeks an appeal sent out by the Government for 450,000 volunteers in the Regular Army and in the National Guard. These press notices are Uncle Sam's direct appeal for men—volunteers—to fill up the holes in the Regular Army and in the National Guard. These papers also print glowing notices of the way men have volunteered in the small towns out there. I have picked up these little papers, have read them with pride, and have seen their proud notices of the way in which men have volunteered.

Here is Washougal, a town of 456 people by the last census—probably 1,000 now—it puts 14 men into the Army and Navy. That is a lot of men from a fine little town. Here is a town of 2,000 people puts 42 men into the Army and Navy. Then, here is a town of 252 people—Cathlamet—complaining because it has put only a few men into the Army and Navy. Mind you, all these towns have contributed men to the National Guard and to the Naval Militia. The quota from the State of Washington is full. Here is a town of 1,000, which put half a dozen men into the Army and Navy. Here is a little town of 387 people that has put 47 men into the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps. That town is Stevenson, and I will guarantee, Mr. Chairman, that 47 soldiers and sailors from a town of 387 men, women, and children is about the record. [Applause.]

But with all these fine reports and the splendid showing from all the towns, I find that our great State of Washington has put into the Regular Navy only 360 men from April 1 to April 25, and into the Regular Army only 376 men from April 5 to April 25, and into the Marine Corps from April 5 to April 25 but 120 men. And there have been a lot of recruiting officers out there, and there is lots of patriotism.

But now the surprise. The volunteer enlistment figures of the State of Washington may seem small, but they loom large beside those of the great Empire State of New York, with its more than 10,366,000 population. Washington, with 1,500,000 population, has put in 20 days 120 men into the Marine Corps. New York, with more than ten millions of souls, puts in 184. Will that give us an Army?

New York has put into the Army from April 1 to April 24 only 2,677 men and into the Navy only 1,687 men, and into the Marine Corps the pitiful number of 184 men. That is why we need selective conscription. Washington State will do its full share, but it would like a guaranty that New York and Pennsylvania and Indiana will do the same.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. Have you the figures there from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I have not; but I doubt if they would make any better showing than the other populous States.

Mr. KEATING. Do not you think the State of Massachusetts, which is represented so ably here by the eloquent advocates of preparedness, should make a better showing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the very point. We can not do better than that unless we have a selective system. That is my argument. I will come to it in a moment. I am calling attention to the fact that the State of Washington puts into the Marine Corps 120 men and the State of New York 184 men. You must remember that the State of Washington has filled up its militia troops, its Naval Reserve, and has sent men to the Aviation Corps and has supplied its full quota, and has made a fair showing in the Regular Army and the United States Navy.

Indiana, with population enough to give it 13 Congressmen in this Chamber to Washington State's 5, puts into the Army in 24 days 2,463 men. At that it does far better than New York. Indiana puts into the Navy in two weeks, after war was declared, 554 men to New York's 1,687 and Washington's 360. New York's population, 10,366,778; Indiana's, 6,193,626; and Washington's, 1,505,810.

But let us not wrangle as between States. This war is making us a nation. Put all the volunteer figures together since war began, when Uncle Sam asked for 450,000 men to fill up the holes, what does it amount to?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that the men are all required to enlist for seven years makes some difference?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; they are enlisted for the time of the war.

Mr. GORDON. No; under the present law they are enlisted for seven years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, let us see about that. Let us see just what the advertisement says.

Mr. GORDON. The law is that no man can enlist to-day unless he enlists for seven years, both in the National Guard and in the Regular Army. The gentleman knows the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I will not dispute that with the gentleman from Ohio, but here is the advertisement, or rather statement, issued on the authority of Sergt. W. D. Schuster, United States Army, and printed in the Montesano (Wash.) Vidette. I will put it in the RECORD:

HALF MILLION VOLUNTEERS WANTED FOR THE UNITED STATES ARMY—ORDERS RECEIVED AT ABERDEEN RECRUITING STATION SAY MEN WILL BE RELEASED AT END OF WAR.

Wanted—men to enlist in the Regular Army—

And so forth. Then it says:

Men who enlist since war was declared will be released at the termination of the emergency and not held for the Regular Army term. This removes the principal objection to Regular Army enlistments, and the Army should fill up rapidly. Aberdeen recruiting headquarters are at 218½ East Heron Street.

It is the policy of the War Department to discharge from service at the termination of the emergency all men who have enlisted in the Regular Army since the declaration of war, or who enlist now.

Mr. Chairman, I have just been informed that that sort of appeal is made by the War Department as a result of a sort of agreement by which regulations are made to do until the law can be changed, as is now being done with this bill.

My time is about gone. I would like to say this, however: When this bill is passed, and a selected list is called for from the State of Washington, there will be no protest, no resentment, and no riots, because they are patriotic people out there. [Applause.] We do not breed any other kind. When the recruiting officer comes around and asks for 1 man out of every 20, we will be ready to supply him. The right men will go, and they will be good men. The selective system will provide all the men the Government needs, no matter how long the war lasts. It will not rob one community at the expense of another. It treats all alike—all men, all States, all industries, and all activities. The farm, the mine, the forests, will not lose more than their share of workers. It is said that it requires the industry of 15 men to keep 1 soldier in fighting trim in the field. Those who work at home to sustain those who have gone to the front and to sustain their dependents and to sustain their Government are entitled to full credit and will receive it under the selective plan.

Although the Government is moving rapidly in a war way, a thousand things which must be done are awaiting the passage of an Army bill which will give us an army and guarantee to keep us with an army throughout this war. The selective system for an army will not break down. We have no time to experiment. To me it seems preposterous to propose to try one form of an army and if that breaks down try another. We do not want any "ifs."

No one questions either the loyalty or the valor of the American volunteer. Everyone knows that, even if recruiting has been slow, it will quicken when something happens in this war to stir us vitally. That will fill the holes. The raising of an army now by the selective process does not mean the revival of the odious draft of 1863. The whole trouble with volunteering now, on a gigantic scale, is that it comes too late.

Mr. Chairman, if I had had anything to do with framing of this plan I think I would have called it a democratic selective system. As it is, the only trouble with it is that the word "draft" has been in bad company. But it does not make much difference about the name. This measure designed for the employment of modern census and efficiency methods to the raising of an army that shall mean business—an army that shall add to the glory of the United States; uphold its honor and strike decisive blows, backed by all the people, all the resources, and all the money of the United States; an army that shall end a war in which 90 per cent of all the Christian peoples of the world are engaged and bring peace, I hope, for all time to come.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, schoolboys of the Nation are taught that every one of our citizens owes to our Government two fundamental duties—obedience and support. They are taught that the duty to support includes military service. The Constitution of the United States empowers Congress "to raise" armies, not simply to accept volunteers. Men may question the wisdom of selective conscription, but they can not dispute the right. To-day we are preparing to engage in a great war. Upon one proposition all patriotic men are agreed—the battles of our country, whatever they are to be, must be fought. Our disagreement is as to who shall fight those battles.

Shall our soldiers be selected by our Government according to a uniform plan, or shall their selection depend upon the irresponsible volition of the individuals of this Nation?

My opposition to the volunteer system of raising an army is founded upon two reasons: First, I believe it is an uncertain system; secondly, I believe it is an inefficient system.

The voluntary system is uncertain, because in all this country there is not one human being who can tell us with assurance that it will give us men enough to fight this war. Men assert confidence in their own belief that by this means sufficient soldiers will be supplied at the beginning as well as during the progress of the war. But, in the face of the history of the last three years, is it prudent to commit the security of this Nation to a course of doubt, when one of certainty is at hand?

Every Member of this Congress knows that when we adopt a system of selective conscription 20,000,000 men will be on duty and respond at the call of our Commander in Chief.

It is asserted that because in former wars the volunteer has supplied men for our armies we can rely on him still. All our real wars of the past have been hand-to-hand struggles on our own soil. In each of those conflicts the personal obligation and sense of responsibility was driven into the very hearts of the men and boys of our country.

To-day we are in war with a nation separated from us by 3,000 miles of sea, upon whose surface not a single German flag can be found. Beyond that our enemy is surrounded by a tightening band of steel, forged by our allies, who are fighting our battles. Our duty, as I see, is that when we be prepared we should go in search of our enemy, lest the time come when, under more unfortunate circumstances, he finds it to his advantage to come in search of us.

If that time does come and the Germans should invade our soil, bombard one of our cities, or if in combat on the ocean they would sink one of our great battleships, as they have sunk English battleships, and next morning the papers of America would tell the people of the Nation that every man of the crew stood by his post and calmly faced a certain death, and as the ship sank into the ocean, like the sailors of England, they sang a patriotic song, a song of love of country and home, that the last thing to go down was the flag of our country, then perhaps 5,000,000 men would volunteer. But then it would be too late. The great lesson of the war has been that we must be prepared to be effective, to economize life and to economize effort.

Some seem to think a call for volunteers is immediately going to separate our people into the brave and the cowardly, the worker and the shirker, the patriotic and the selfish, the generous and the avaricious, the worthy and the unworthy.

I do not believe that is true. The bill proposes raising 1,000,000 soldiers out of 20,000,000 who are capable of bearing arms. The average American citizen recognizes his duty to fight for his country and is willing to do it when sure that obligation rests upon him. There are 20 men to fight where 1 is to be taken. And many a man will, without cowardice and without unusual selfishness, figure that there is certainly 1 other man of the 19 others upon whom the duty to go to war rests more strongly than on him. The average citizen is willing to go to war if necessary. He is willing to go, not because he wants to go nor because he likes war, but through a sense of duty to his country. Therefore, until the duty seems personal to him, he may wait until the demand is more pressing. The result, I fear, would be that we might not have a sufficient volunteer army, or that we might secure it only after unnecessary delay or burdensome efforts. But suppose we fail. Then what will happen? Under the terms of the bill proposed by the majority of the committee—conscription. The conscription proposed by the committee is an odious conscription; that proposed by the President is an honorable conscription. Under the provisions of the bill provided by the committee we first try out the voluntary system, and if that fails every man who is a conscript after that is put in the position of having refused to do his duty to his country. Under that system you make the uniform of our soldiers a badge of dishonor instead of one of honor.

A number of speakers have asserted that heretofore conscription has not been resorted to in this country except as a last necessity, and that we should pursue that course now. In my judgment that is the reason that conscription has heretofore been odious to the American people. If we call for volunteers and fail to secure a response in sufficient numbers, and then we conscript our people, we put them in the position of serving their country only after having refused to do their duty. But if we conscript them to begin with, then we do not place upon any man a stigma of having failed to do his duty to his country, and all men can submit to its terms without humiliation and with a conscious pride that no one else is called to a higher service.

Two speakers have, in effect, asserted that the volunteer system stigmatizes the man who hesitates to go, and thus drives him to enlist; drives him to enlist by the taunts and jeers of his fellow men. That is true. And, more than that, it stigmatizes every man who does not go, regardless of how meritorious his reasons may be for remaining at home. There are many patriotic and conscientious men whose services are more useful and more necessary at home. Such men will consult their own consciences. The claims of country and wife, mother, and child will seem to conflict. To remain at home under the stigma of the volunteer system would make life a living shame.

How much better it would seem to be to have a plan of selective service under which each man's duty to serve or his claim of exemption is determined according to a uniform plan, and under which no man goes to war in shame and no man stays at home in dishonor!

The man who is willing to go to war should not object because his Government commands him to go. Only he who refuses to go can object. His refusal must be based on his refusal to do his duty. It must be based on the idea that the battles of his country shall not be fought or else that somebody else shall fight them. Whether or not the battles of this country shall be fought and who shall fight them are questions that not the individual but the country itself should determine.

The conscript system gives us 20,000,000 soldiers; the volunteer system gives us no man knows what. The best message that we can send to our allies to-day is that, "We have 20,000,000 American citizens in this country all of whom are on duty and at the call of the Commander in Chief. When he speaks the word, we go." That is the message to send to the allies in France to-day, and that is the message to send across the water to Germany, telling her in no uncertain tones that America is engaged in this war to stay until that day comes when our flag be carried in triumph from its last battle field. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am for the volunteer section in this bill for many reasons. One of the reasons is because the Committee on Military Affairs, who have had charge of this bill, who have heard the testimony, and who have given it great consideration, have reported such a bill. And ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have been told that I ought to stand by the committee reports. There are other reasons why I am for the volunteer system. One is it has always proven a success in every war we have ever fought since the birth of this great Nation.

There is another reason why I am for the volunteer clause in this bill, and that is because there have been so many men between the ages of 21 and 40 years who have been trying for years to bring about this war, and I want to give to those men a chance to show their patriotism and to volunteer. [Applause.] I do not want them to have the excuse to say, when the young boys are marching away for the field of battle, "The law prohibits me from going; I have no chance to volunteer, and the War Department has not conscripted me." I am for the volunteer clause in this bill because the newspapers in this country for many years have been working up this propaganda for war, and many of these men who have been indulging in this propaganda are under the age of 40 years. I am going to see if they are as patriotic as they have claimed to be, or whether they have been working deceit upon the American people. [Applause.]

It has been charged on the floor of this House that many of the great daily papers of this country have been, to use a plain, blunt, and expressive expression, bribed to bring this country on the verge of war, and these men who occupy seats in the press gallery of this House to-night have been writing this war stuff for all these years. If this charge be true—and I do not make it, because I have not the proof of its truthfulness, but men have made it—if it be true, you are working for a master who has done much to bring this country into war, and this, too, for a price.

The stamp of odium was placed on Benedict Arnold for a lesser crime than that if this be true. These are some of the few reason why I am for the volunteer clause in this bill. If the great metropolitan newspapers in this country are not guilty of this charge brought against them on the floor of this House, why do not they rise as one and ask for an investigation at the hands of Congress or some committee appointed for that purpose? Not one has come to the front and asked for such an inquest. Gentlemen, I am not making this charge, because I lack proof, but I am saying that the accusation has been made and no newspaper has come forth to prove that it is not guilty of the highest degree of treason against the American boys of this country.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUNN. Does the gentleman believe that if it had not been for the newspapers we would not have been at war?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know; I have no evidence. If something or some evidence had been eliminated, I could not tell whether we would be at war or not, and neither can the gentleman from New York say what the result would have been had the newspapers published the truth, and nothing but the truth.

Mr. LUNN. I understood the gentleman to say that the newspapers were the cause of it.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not say they were the cause of it, but I say they have been diligently shouting for war or shouting for this country to do something that would bring us to the verge of war for the past three years, and the gentleman from New York knows that I speak the truth. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Members on the floor voted for the war resolution—I do not know whether the gentleman from Ohio did or not—because of their conviction that it was necessary for the national welfare.

Mr. KEARNS. I voted for the declaration of war because there had been brought to bear upon us a state of facts or a condition which I believed, although others believed to the contrary, would be doing my country a wrong if I did not vote that way. That condition was not made by you; that condition was not made by me; but that condition was made to a great extent, as has been charged on this floor, by the newspapers of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Very naughty.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the newspapers of this country paid for sinking the Lusitania? [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. I never heard anyone make the charge that the newspapers of this country had paid for the sinking of the Lusitania. No one ever made such a charge as that, but I want to say to you, sir, that before the American citizens took passage on the Lusitania they were warned that it was to be sunk, and the British officer, captain of that ship, after the warning had been given to the American people and to him, deceived the American people and got them to take passage on the ship, and I believe he did it for the one purpose of bringing the American people into the vortex of this awful war.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KEARNS. That war for the last two and a half years has been sapping the civilized nations of all Europe, and I believe the captain of that vessel deliberately deceived these passengers and coaxed them on board that he might inflame this country to bring them to the rescue of the British Government.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; if the question has reference to the point at issue.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that the German Government had a wireless operator as a spy and that he sent orders to the Lusitania which sent that vessel through between two German submarines?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know; I was not on the Lusitania. I was not about the wireless, and I do not know whether that is true or not. [Applause.]

But I do know that the captain of the Lusitania, after he knew that his ship was doomed, deceived these Americans who were about to take passage on his ship, and told them there was no danger, and I do know, as you know and as every other sensible man in this House knows—and you are all sensible—that he did it so that he could get American boys to fight the battles of England that her own sons were refusing to fight.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know how much time I am going to get.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Can I get more time?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am terribly crowded for time.

Mr. KEARNS. Well, I am going to take a chance on it, and I yield.

Mr. SWIFT. I would like to ask the gentleman if his statement with reference to the Lusitania is based on the same character of evidence as his statement in reference to the newspapers?

Mr. KEARNS. No; it is not; and the gentleman certainly is not questioning that statement at this time, when the whole world knows it, except perhaps the gentleman himself?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. Oh, I would like to have five.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Very well, I yield five minutes more.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the trend of the gentleman's argument it is to the effect that the newspapers were the cause of this war?

Mr. KEARNS. Just wait a minute. I have answered that same question before.

Mr. HASTINGS. And that the gentleman himself voted for the resolution declaring a state of war existed, and I want to ask this question: Did the newspapers cause the gentleman himself to vote for that resolution?

Mr. KEARNS. I will answer that. I did say that the newspapers had a great deal to do with bringing about the condition that caused this war. I voted for the resolution, not because of that. If you were to set my house on fire I would try to put it out, although I would not want you to set it on fire.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the gentleman thinks that the newspapers set the house on fire?

Mr. KEARNS. I think they did a great deal to work up the war propaganda and so do you think so. I can not yield any more.

When this Congress gave heed to the warning voice of the President, and following his advice declared that a state of war existed between this country and the Imperial German Government, we committed ourselves and the Nation to a thorough and patriotic prosecution of that war. This declaration of hostilities carried with it the promise that we would give to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States, whatever resources the Nation might possess. Now that war has been declared, we must not shirk one duty or swerve one inch from the path of courage. Upon this I think we are a unit. Since war means men to do the fighting, we now are seeking for the best way of securing these men without unnecessary delay, and have them start upon a period of training that will fit them for the duties of the soldier in battle. Relative to the question of the best and quickest method to be pursued in securing this armed force there is no unity of opinion.

The War Department has reversed all traditions of America in this regard, and has said that the volunteer system has in all our wars proven a failure and therefore this plan that is as old as our Nation must be forced into the discard and the heretofore hated and despised draft plan be henceforth the one system to be followed in the future. Of course, lest it grate too harshly on the ear of patriotism, they apply to the machinery a newly invented muffler and call it "selective universal conscription." The diction of this phrase has a sound that is somewhat pleasing, and on its face has the appearance of justness that its practice I feel will never prove.

We have for our consideration at this time two propositions, neither of which has the recommendation of the War Department nor the President. The majority of the Military Committee of this House presents a bill embodying the volunteer system to be put in force at once on proclamation of the President calling for volunteers, with the right of the President to at once build up the machinery necessary before conscription can be made. To construct this machinery, it is admitted by the friends of the draft idea, will require from some four to six months. This bill, therefore, provides two methods—the volunteer and the draft. If the one proves to be a failure, the other can be applied at the very earliest moment that the system is perfected. The minority of this Military Committee reports a bill similar in words and form with the single exception of the volunteer clause. The minority's bill takes away from the American citizen his right to voluntarily bear arms in the defense of his country. It entirely abandons this American and truly democratic idea and adopts the single thought of conscription, thus surrendering to the aristocracy of our Army officers one of the basic principles on which our great and free Government was built. In taking this departure from our well-known and beloved traditions, an attempt is made by those wedded to the draft plan to confuse the idea of universal military training with compulsory military service. Those who use the two plans interchangeably and as synonyms, do it with deliberate intention of deceiving the casual and unthinking reader. These proponents of the draft well know that universal military training is backed by almost a universal opinion not only in this House but in their home districts; therefore they confuse the two in an attempt to catch the American in the net of deceit.

I am afraid those Army officers who first conceived this idea slander the American citizens when they offer an excuse that the volunteer idea has been tried in the present war in England and proven a failure and at last England has had to resort to conscription. They urge, therefore, that we profit by her mistake and conscript at once. They do not tell you that England raised an army of 5,000,000 men by volunteers. But even were their statements true, I would ask did it ever occur to these highbrow warriors in the Army Department—many of whom have never smelt the smoke of battle—that these are Americans whom they are thus comparing with Englishmen; that perhaps the poor, down-trodden classes of Great Britain have refused to fight for a Government that boasts of its class distinction, of its royal blood. I would remind these gentlemen that this is America, and there is no comparison between the American people, where every man is a peer, and the British, where a few are of the royalty and the many are separated into distinct and lowly classes. What is it that makes the American, as distinguished from the peoples of most of the world, walk with head erect and step so proud? It is because he breathes the air of the only Government upon the face of the earth that has from its birth declared "That all men are created equal." Then let us not urge that because England failed America's sons can and will do no better in this death struggle that for more than two years has been draining Europe of her lifeblood. The American loves and respects his country and his flag; the former perhaps has no such impelling influence that would command such devotion. [Applause.]

Again, in placing the stigma of disgrace upon our Volunteers in former wars, this coterie of Army officers who advocate conscription stop not in their libel and slander of the soldiers who gave us the Union and has ever since preserved it. Seemingly without compunction these men would pluck the laurels from the graves of that great volunteer soldiery of the Revolution that marched over that bloody trail from Bunker Hill to victory at Yorktown, driving forever from our shores the tyranny of England. Now, this same England carries to us testimony in proof of its failure, and this testimony is at once adopted by our Army Board. This message is an insult to every man who ever fought of his own free will in any of the wars of our country. I can not remain silent and hear men say on this floor that it was not a success in our great Civil War. I will say to them who make this claim that you are not backed by the teachings of our history. I do not think you men of the North would dare go to your homes and on Memorial Day next preach such a preachment as this to those few grizzled warriors bent and stooped with their burden of years and their many friends and stalwart sons there gathered to commemorate the memory of their deeds of valor and pay silent tribute at the graves of the dead. [Applause.] I do not believe that the bravest and the rashest of the southern membership of this House would have either the courage or the lack of discretion to go back to your homes and tell the remnant of those old boys who wore the gray and their valiant sons that their fighting and deportment on the field of battle were not up to the standard of the soldiery of any country or any clime. I do not want to abandon this idea—this American idea—in its entirety for another system that comes to us from abroad. [Applause.]

The majority bill gives the President two plans instead of one, and one of these can be put into effect within one hour after the bill becomes a law. It can be used to put us on a war footing without delay, while the other system is being perfected. Should the draft system alone be adopted, you do not only challenge the courage of our American manhood, but what for the moment is all-important—you delay for many months the commencement of an army under this bill.

Gentlemen say the volunteer plan is unjust, unwise, and inefficient; that it puts the burden of the battle on the shoulders of the courageous and allows the slacker to escape. They claim the universal compulsory system treats all alike. Let us see. The bill, as drafted by the War Department, seeks only to conscript boys between the ages of 19 and 25, entirely exempting from duty those men who shout so loudly for war who are above that age. This bill would entirely exempt from military duty those men who have so diligently shouted for war from newspaper offices and public platforms. It is possible while they so earnestly, and perhaps for a price, clamored for war they had been assured by the war propagandists that men of their age would not be called upon to fight, but that the children and the young men of the country would be the ones called upon to sacrifice their lives in British and French trenches, where human blood runs deep. They say this is universal compulsory service; but I am afraid the young men of America who are between the ages of 19 and 25 years will deny the universality of such a law. If you want what is really compulsory military service, leave the ages between 21 and 40, as written in both of these bills, and favor none.

Gentlemen on the floor of this House who live in farming districts tell you that the farmer's boy will not be called upon to go, because he must remain home to help feed the hungry millions of the world. Gentlemen who live in manufacturing districts tell you that the great hosts of men who work in the workshops and factories will not have to go, because these great patriotic citizens will have to remain behind to make clothing, guns, and ammunition for the soldiers. Still other men who live in mining districts say that the miner will not have to go, because he is needed deep down in the earth, bringing to the surface the iron and the coal and the copper and the zinc and other metals so needful in the prosecution of this war. With these propositions staring us in the face, many gentlemen have cried out in dismay, "Where in the name of heaven are you going to get these soldiers?" and I can only conclude that since all the men have been excluded we will have to make up our Army from the Boy Scout ranks. [Applause.]

This leads me to the thought expressed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on yesterday. When he made the statement that in all of our previous wars the great majority of our volunteer soldiers were 18 years of age and under, he quoted alleged statistics to show where a great percentage of them were only 15 years of age. I do not know where he got his figures, but they are not consistent with any register made by our War Department. Were these figures true—and, thank God, they are not—it would be a sad commentary upon American manhood. The American men, not boys, make war, and after war is made it would be cowardice personified to allow children to go and men to remain at home in safety. [Applause.]

I am for this bill because no one but the War Staff advocated even its principles before it reached this House. I am for the dual system of raising an army, to wit, the volunteer and conscript, because such eminent and seasoned lawmakers on the Democratic side of this House as Speaker CLARK, Chairman DENT, Democratic Floor Leader KITCHIN, and a long list of others, and such men as Republican Leader MANN and Mr. ex-Speaker CANNON. I am for it because it is the quickest and most efficient method of raising an army. We are all behind the President and are going to help him win this war.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, we are at war with a great military power, and I believe now is the time that every resource of this Nation should be used to bring that war to a speedy and successful conclusion. It shall, therefore, be my purpose to stand back of the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and do everything in my power consistent with my judgment and my conscience to assist him in the carrying out of the solemn duty and the grave responsibility that rests upon him.

There have been differences of opinion among people as to the policy we should have pursued at the beginning. Some believe that we should have entered the war when the neutrality of Belgium was outraged; some believe that we should have gone to war when the Lusitania was sunk; and there are others who believe that we should not have entered the war at all. But now that we are in the war, it is the patriotic duty of every American citizen to stand by the country and do everything possible to assist in bringing about a speedy restoration of peace.

This is a situation that calls not only for patriotic devotion to the country, but for the wisest counsel and best thought of which the Nation is capable in the perfecting of the policies we decide upon in the carrying on of the war. It is only by united action, by consultation among the responsible heads of the Government, that we can hope to accomplish the best results, and those who contend or say that men charged with responsibility should not express their opinions as to what is best to be done, but should follow blindly the course that may be outlined by some department are advocating a policy that will take from our country one of its greatest safeguards in this its hour of peril.

I have no sympathy with the Members of Congress who criticize the President or the departments in the cloakrooms and then remain silent on the floor of the House, and I believe that it is the duty of every Member of Congress to at least make known his views in regard to the various policies in their making; but I also believe that when a policy has been determined upon, that then everybody should stand back of that policy in order that we may show a united front.

I have received many telegrams urging me to stand back of the President. Of course, I intend to stand back of the President, and I intend to stand back of my country; but that does not mean that I shall refuse or fail to voice my honest convictions and exercise my constitutional duty under the oath of office I have taken; otherwise I had better go home.

PATRIOTISM NATION'S STRENGTH.

If I were to be asked the question, Wherein lies the strength of the Nation? I should answer in but a single word—patriotism! Patriotism is the most important element of national character. It was patriotism burning in the hearts of the fathers of our country that resulted in the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the greatest public document ever penned by human hands; and it was patriotic devotion to the principles enunciated and laid down in that declaration that brought that contest, first for justice and then for freedom, to a successful conclusion. The patriotism of the American people has been tested and tried, and it has been proven to be the strength of the Nation in every subsequent war in which our country has engaged. Patriotism will win the present war and preserve inviolate the rights of American citizens, whether upon the land or sea, and the principles of liberty on which our Government was founded and has been maintained.

Any policy that will in the slightest degree lessen the patriotism of the American people strikes a blow at the Nation, and I have found, in my limited experience, that very often method has a great deal to do with the securing of the acceptance or the rejection of a proposition submitted to men. In other words, men will sometimes accept a proposition if presented in a certain way that they would absolutely reject if presented in another way, therefore I believe it is important in this war that we should be careful of the method we follow in raising our Army.

We can not reject and override all the precedents that have heretofore been followed by our free Government and adopt methods that have been followed by monarchies, and not endanger the damping of the ardor of the patriotism of the American people.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman believe that "selective conscription" is a term that the people will distinguish; that is, that they will distinguish between selective conscription and merely plain conscription?

Mr. McCULLOCH. To my mind selective conscription is more offensive than plain conscription. It gives too much power to those administering it. It endangers our liberty, in my humble judgment, and, therefore, I am against conscription before the volunteer system is tried out and the seductive word "selective" added to it. [Applause.]

We must have an army; we must have an efficient army, and we also want an enthusiastic army, and one that will fight not only because they are compelled to but because they want to, and because they are impelled by the same spirit that has made this Government the one great free Government that stands out among the nations of the world.

Conscription has always been more or less in disrepute in this country. Men who would gladly volunteer will resent being conscripted. In some sections of this country men would rather go to jail than be conscripted, although they would willingly volunteer to serve their country.

I believe in conscription to force the slacker to do his part, but I believe that conscription should only be resorted to if the volunteer system does not meet the requirements.

It has been said by a military official: "Unwilling men burden armies, eat its subsistence, retard its action, and give it panic."

The bill reported by the majority of the Military Affairs Committee provides that the President may call for 500,000 volunteers, and then for 500,000 more volunteers should he deem it necessary, and if in the judgment of the President we are unable to raise the army and the men needed by these calls, the President may then proceed with selective conscription.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman believe that a sufficient number of men can be raised by a call for volunteers?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do; and I will say so in a few minutes.

It is also provided in this bill that the War Department may proceed at once in its preparation for conscription by the establishment of registration stations, the taking of a census of those of military age, so that while the volunteer plan is being tried out no time will be lost, because the machinery for carrying out the conscription plan provided for in the bill will go right on, and when the President has made his decision, should it be that he can not raise sufficient soldiers by the volunteer system, he can at once proceed to raise them by conscription. The advantage of this bill is that it preserves the same system that our country has always pursued, and it gives an opportunity to men who desire to enter the Army, being actuated by patriotism and the desire to serve their country, to do so without being conscripted. The bill also provides that only those who can serve their country best as soldiers shall be taken and those who are needed in the fields and factory shall not be permitted to volunteer.

The slacker, under the provision of the House bill, will be unable to get away, because the President will have the power to conscript him if he is needed. The House bill preserves the principles of democracy and provides for both a volunteer system and conscription. The bill offered by the minority members of the Military Affairs Committee provides only for conscription and eliminates the volunteer system. Why should we close the door of opportunity to men who want to serve their country? The law should not prevent a man who may not be liable by conscription from going into the service if he wants to volunteer.

I believe that the House bill will raise an army quicker, providing as it does for both the volunteer system and conscription, than the minority bill which provides for conscription alone. If I thought for a moment that this bill would mean any unnecessary delay in the raising of the Army I would vote against it; but I am sure it will be quicker and more efficient, and I believe that it will result in the raising of an army under conditions that will not lessen the patriotism of the people. I believe that it will eliminate the probability of adverse feeling against the war being fanned into flame which might result in internal conflict and internal revolt and will result in the raising of a better fighting force than could be raised by conscription alone.

It has been said that experts favor conscription; that they do not believe in the volunteer system. But in listening to the debate on the floor of the House I became impressed with the fact that the qualifications of the experts have not been shown.

The test of the efficiency of a fighting force is only shown under fire. Roosevelt wants to lead a volunteer army!

I would prefer to take the advice of men like Gen. Sherman, writing after his experience in the Civil War, than to take the advice of the General Staff, writing before the war and before they have had any real experience with a fighting force actually under fire.

Gen. W. T. Sherman in his personal memoirs, writing of the military lessons of the Civil War, says:

"But the real difficulty was and will be again to obtain an adequate number of good soldiers. We tried almost every system known to modern nations, all with more or less success—volunteer enlistments, the draft, and bought substitutes—and I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best—better than the conscript and far better than the bought substitute."

It would seem to me that the conditions which it is claimed resulted in the failure of the volunteer force in England will not apply to the soldiers raised in this country. If it should become necessary to send American soldiers to the trenches abroad, which I trust we may never have to do, it would be little short of criminal to send them without proper training, and there is no reason in the world why a volunteer army should not be as thoroughly trained as a conscripted army. Any force we send abroad can be used as a reserve force, and there will be no necessity for placing untrained soldiers in active service until they have received the training that will make it possible for them to fight in the front rank without needless slaughter.

The argument that we by raising a volunteer army will be making the same mistake England has made is not a sound argument, because we are not going to be in the same condition England was in. Whether our Army be a conscripted army or a volunteer army, or both, I have faith enough in our officers and those who will be directing this war to feel that our soldiers will be well trained before they are subjected to the hazard of active fighting.

The advantage of the House bill is that it provides for both the volunteer system and conscription. Because I believe the bill reported by the majority of the Military Affairs Committee, and known as the House bill, is fair, efficient, American, democratic, and workable, I shall support it. [Applause.]

There is a distinction between universal military training and conscription. Providing for conscription does not mean that we are providing for universal military training.

It is revolting to me to think of sending conscripted soldiers to a foreign battle field and to foreign trenches. I do not know how the other Members of this House feel about it, but I want to say to you that I do not want to be a party to sending an unwilling soldier or an unwilling boy to a European trench to be chained to a cannon. [Applause.] It was with that in view and that spirit in mind that I offered an amendment to the war resolution to the effect that soldiers should not be sent abroad except upon the express authorization of Congress. I did not know and I do not know but that it may be necessary to send them over there, but I believe they should only be sent over there as the result of an overpowering public sentiment, which will be best evidenced through the medium of the representatives of the people.

In conclusion, I want to say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] this afternoon. I have looked upon him as a military man, willing to go any length in the way of militarism; but I thought his speech was exceedingly fair. He said there was no doubt in his mind but that a volunteer army is the more efficient army and the more effective force, but he added that the reason that he is for conscription was that he did not think that we could raise a volunteer army. By that statement the man who has advocated this war made an admission that I would hesitate to make. He admitted that this war is going to be unpopular with the people; that it is unpopular with the people; that the spirit of patriotism has not been aroused; and are you gentlemen, in passing this conscription bill and eliminating the volunteer feature, going to take away the probability of that patriotism being aroused, or are you going to follow the plan that arouses the patriotism of the American people and that will make it possible to raise a volunteer army instead of going out and letting the idea prevail that you are going to pull the boys away from their homes and away from their mothers against their wills? I do not think it is good policy. I am for my country and I am for this war, now that we are in it; but I want to say to you that I do not believe it is good judgment to conscript men in the beginning. I believe that we should rely upon the volunteer system first. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, barring sentiment and what some of us are pleased to call Democratic principles, there is not much, if any, difference between the two systems proposed by the bill of the majority and that of the minority of the committee. I do not see how the country or the administration could be much more hampered by one than the other. If at all, it could certainly be of only short duration, and it seems to me that the measure proposed by the minority is more likely to cause delay. The only real difference, as I understand the measure, is that the one proposed by the majority of the committee provides that the President shall first call for volunteers and after allowing a reasonable time, he being the judge of that, shall have the right to conscript them by what the bill denominates a "selective draft system." The age limit of those to be conscripted in each case is the same—from 21 to 40.

The administration bill is, to my mind, a more serious matter, in that it proposes to raise an army by conscription and selecting only those who are from 19 to 25 years of age.

When the question of conscription was first agitated I thought I was opposed to it, but as the days have passed and the discussion has proceeded I have watched the maneuverings of strange parties, purporting to reside in our larger cities, and have about reached the conclusion that conscription for some classes would be both safe and sane. Every day I receive a score or more or letters and telegrams, not from citizens of my own district or State, but from variously designated "trade organizations" and so-called "safety leagues" in other States, urging and advising me how to vote on this important question. It is this crowd that I have reached the conclusion should be conscripted, but I fear they can not be reached by the proposed bills of either the majority, the minority, or administration.

Information received from this source leads one to conclude that much of such clamor for conscription is not the voice of Jacob but of Esau, who seeks to lay his hairy hand upon us. I fear that some of the noise heard from these great "boards of trade," "safety leagues," and ultrapatriotic dailies, denouncing every man as a traitor trying to block the administration, who sees fit to vote his convictions and support the bill recommended by a majority of the Military Committee, is but the echo of great corporations, fatted bondholders, and vultures of finance.

I have confidence in the integrity and intelligence of those who elected me. I am willing to take their advice, and God being my helper, I shall vote upon this question in accordance with my convictions and just as I believe a majority of those citizens whom I have the honor to represent would, with the same lights before them, vote if present. I suppose all other Members of Congress will do likewise; hence if they should not vote as I do, I shall not feel that they are more just or less untrue than I am.

On Monday last, when we first entered upon a discussion of the Army bill, my colleague from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] asked the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee to explain how the selection of the first or any additional increment provided for under the conscription plan would be made. The gentleman from Alabama replied:

Perhaps I did not go into the details upon this point. It is proposed to take a census, in the first place, of all male citizens between the ages that the bill may provide for—19 and 25, according to the War Department's bill, and 21 and 40, according to the committee bill. The first thing that must be done, of course, is to take this census. Then it is proposed to put the names in a box and draw them, just as you would a jury. Of course, the right is reserved to determine who is physically unfit and reject them, just as a juror whose name was drawn, if he was found to be incompetent or disqualified for any reason, would be rejected.

Since that time I have attended the meetings of the committee constantly and have listened intently, expecting, perhaps, that some one would challenge the statement made by the chairman of the Military Committee, but thus far I have failed to hear any. Under this kind of provision I do not see how those engaged in manufacturing or farming can hope to escape service more than other classes. Yet there has been created in the public mind, I do not say by the administration, a belief that it is the intention of the Government to exempt from service all of those citizens of military age who now are or may hereafter be engaged in farming or manufacturing of foodstuffs, clothing, etc., each of these supposedly exempt classes expecting the other to be drafted first and all of the firm conviction that the "sons of rest," who for years have haunted the poolrooms and whittled village benches, will be the first conscripted and that this great "army of the unemployed" is all that is necessary to whip this fight. It appears that the plan proposed by the worthy Secretary of War is that the names of all classes will be taken in the census, placed in a box, and those who are drawn therefrom will be expected to serve.

I am in favor of conserving the resources of this country and, upon the principles of public policy and military exigency, of placing into service the unemployed, but no bill makes such express provision. If such is the intention of the administration or of Congress, it appears to me that there is no better place to say so than in the bill itself, and I shall offer to amend the bill for this purpose, as follows:

Provided, That all able-bodied male citizens of the United States between 21 and 40 years of age, and residing therein, who can not show by satisfactory proof continuous employment during the 30 days next preceding the passage of this act, or who can not satisfactorily show employment at some lawful occupation three-fourths of the time, counting eight hours per day, during the six months next preceding the passage of this act, shall be and are hereby selected and enrolled for military service in the Regular Army of the United States for and during the period of the present war; and that each person so enrolled shall, within 30 days, or such time thereafter as the President may prescribe from the passage of this act, report to such authority as may be prescribed by the President of the United States for such service at such time, at such place, as may be directed.

I am not so wedded to my proposed amendment that I will not willingly forsake it for any other provision which will guarantee to the people that the first to be conscripted are those able-bodied "sons of rest" between 21 and 40 years of age, both rich and poor alike.

I have no unkind word to say against our unemployed citizens. They may not be considered especially energetic or practical, but many of them are gentlemen; most of them are brave and doubtless would make good soldiers. If they have no job, so far as the good of society is concerned they need one whether rich or poor, and as the proposed amendment avoids in a measure the odium attached to the words "draft" or "conscript," why should we not adopt it?

Gentlemen, this proposition is not one of sentiment or of politics. If we expect to do a man's part and to wage a successful war we must meet it upon the broad principle of economy and military exigencies. We must preserve the active producing forces of the country and utilize the others. Under the present military methods the Army is one place where "slacking" is not permitted, so as a business proposition let us utilize the unemployed, and thus preserve, as much as possible, those active industrial forces upon which we can depend for honest service without military persuasion.

When we have first provided for the unemployed, we should next enlist from the ranks of the professional men, from speculators and tradesmen. The work of this great throng who produce nothing, but, as a rule, occupy the position of middlemen between the producers and the consumers, can be carried on by the males who are too old to fight and the women and children who are not expected to. Next we should enlist from classes engaged in manufacturing, but conserve a sufficient number of these, who together with the male portion too old to fight, and the women and children aforesaid not expected to, will be able to manufacture such articles of necessity as the Nation may demand. Last and least of all should be the agricultural classes. Farm labor, especially in the South, has been greatly depleted during the past two or three years. This labor has gone to our great manufacturing centers, where they have been attracted by payment of higher wages than the conditions in agricultural sections justify.

But aside from this, for years past there has been a steady exodus of farm laborers from agricultural districts to our large cities. With the present demands and probable necessity for future shipments of farm products to the allied nations of Europe, we shall be forced to retain our farm hands at their present posts. Remember that every time you take a man from the farm you convert a producer into a consumer. You not only do this, but you increase the burden of those remaining, for they are then not only forced to support him, but all those who he had supported before leaving the farm. We can not increase the burdens of the women and children of the agricultural districts, especially of the South, for they have all they can endure. For years their loads have been heavy, but, unable to shift the responsibility, they have endured them without a murmur.

Already it has been called to my attention from several sources that various newspapers and trade journals throughout this country are agitating a proposition to fix a maximum price for the sale of all agricultural products. The best way for the Government to protect its agricultural interests is to protect those engaged in the production of agricultural commodities. Let the producers receive the highest market price, and, if limitations are to be made, let it be upon the speculators engaged in the sale of such commodities. It is probably advisable to limit the profit of speculators, but the Government should see to it that such limitations in no way affect the humble producer.

Gentlemen, I can not speak for any other States, but so far as Georgia is concerned I can say that the proposed administration bill will not permit the creation of an effective Army without heavy drafting on those engaged in agriculture. The respective States are supposed to bear their quota of war burdens. If we have 100,000,000 population and desire to raise an Army of 1,000,000 strength, then for each 1,000,000 of our population we must furnish 10,000 soldiers, and each State must furnish soldiers on this basis in proportion to its population. Desiring to raise an Army of 2,000,000 men, which I understand to be the plan, Georgia, with a population of more than 2,500,000, would furnish for an Army of the size indicated a total of more than 50,000—about 4,500 to each congressional district. Less than 21 per cent of the population of Georgia is in the cities. Seven per cent, or 7,000,000, of our population in the United States is between 19 and 25 years of age. Upon this basis, in all the cities of Georgia there are only 37,705 within the age which the administration desires; and as it is estimated that 40 per cent of this number will be excused on account of physical ailment, religious belief, or other cause, only 23,623 will be available. Where will the other 33,540 come from, except from the farms of that State? I can not give my consent to such a draft as this from our agricultural forces, when upon the basis provided for by the Military Committee in both the majority and minority bills there can be raised from our population between 21 and 40 years of age, in the cities alone, more than 70,000.

But another reason why I can not support the proposed administration measure is because it seeks to draft by conscription into the military service of this country and into the trenches of Europe boys only 19 years of age. They are not responsible for conditions; they have no voice in the Government, and should not be forced to discharge that burden which the administration measure will not place upon men 26 years of age—their equals in strength and superiors in judgment. Many of my constituents have urged me to do anything the President desires. I am very sorry that I can not comply with their requests, but I can not conscientiously commit myself to such a policy. My conception of democracy leads me to the conclusion that the burden of military service should rest on those from 21 to 40, and that we should not crucify the minors of this country upon the "cross of conscription."

This Nation has already had some experience with conscription, and without consideration of the riots caused by an enforcement of the same, I invite your attention to extracts from a letter of Mr. J. M. Kennedy, dated London, England, December 28, 1915, addressed to the editor of the London Economist, and printed therein January 1, 1916, pages 15 and 16, as follows:

Desertions, as was to be expected in these circumstances, were very numerous. In the spring of 1864 some 3,000 officers and 80,000 noncommissioned officers and men were missing from the Army of the Potomac alone "for reasons unknown." Well might Lincoln remark, "We get a large body of reinforcements together and start them to the front, but after deducting the sick, the deserters, the stragglers, and the discharged, the numbers seriously diminish by the time they reach their destination. It's like trying to shovel fleas across a barnyard—you don't get 'em all there."

It was not merely the moral opposition of the people which made conscription a failure; for a failure it was. The total number of men secured by the North between the passing of the draft act and the end of the war was just over 2,000,000, but a very large proportion of these were recruited voluntarily by bounties. * * * There were economic as well as moral causes. Middle-class men with dependents simply could not afford to enter the army; the working classes either would not, in many instances, or deserted.

Extract from "Conscription in the Confederate States of America, 1862 to 1865," by R. P. Brooks; printed in Military Historian and Economist, October, 1916, pages 419 to 442:

Conscription appears to have put into the army not more than 25 per cent of the total. But it is unfair to credit conscription with having augmented the armies even to that extent, because the conscripted classes were confessedly almost worthless as fighting material, and no doubt 100,000 deserters admitted by Gen. Preston to be at large, were principally conscripts. Compulsory service was, furthermore, a weakening force in that it brought conflicts with the States, which led to half-hearted support in some instances and did much to make service in the army unpopular. Another untoward result may be laid to the door of this system as organized; the very lax laws of exemption provided an easy and more or less honorable avenue of evasion, thereby keeping out of the armies thousands who might otherwise have been forced by public opinion to volunteer.

Extract of letter by Maj. T. A. Dodge (brevet colonel, volunteers), transmitting report of "Deserters' branch" to Brig. Gen. Jams By. Fry, provost marshal general, December 31, 1865; printed in report of the Secretary, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, Appendix, part 1 (1865–66), pages 234 to 237:

The deserters of 1864 include all drafted men who have been assigned to regiments and deserted en route to the field and some who, being held to the draft, have deserted before reaching general rendezvous. This accounts for the increase of desertions during that year.

Extract from "Regimental losses in the Civil War," 1861 to 1865, by William F. Fox, page 532:

Desertions were frequent among the drafted men, for their service was compulsory, but there were not many of this class in the ranks. The Union Army was essentially a volunteer army. True, a conscription act was enforced, but its provisions for exemption were so lenient that the number of drafted men held in the service was only 52,068, a small number as compared with the total enlistment. In addition to the drafted men held to the service, there were 75,429 conscripts who sent substitutes. These substitutes have generally been classed as mercenaries, but they were men who went to the war without compulsion, and if they received money for the act it should be remembered that all the volunteers who enlisted during the latter part of the war received large bounties.

They tell us the volunteer system has failed. I do not think so. They say we should profit by the experience of England and other European nations, and in this I quite agree. England with a population 40,000,000 has raised by the volunteer system over 5,000,000 soldiers. They are now fighting her battles. By the conscript system she has raised less than 1,000,000, and not one of them are fighting but are yet in the training camps of England. Who can say the system will be successful?

Of course England has made mistakes, but it was not so much the fault of the volunteer system as it was of the officers in charge. It was for the lack of proper conservation of her resources and classification and designation of those in the service. The bill now before the House avoids all of these difficulties, we think, and makes full provision for officering the companies. Was the change made in England because the people wanted it, or felt the necessity for it? Or was it to satisfy the demands of a militaristic spirit? Without saying I will offer an article appearing in the London (England) Nation:

Conscription for great emergency, the country would have borne, for it has borne everything (including the incompetency of its governors), with patience; just as its young manhood has dared everything with ardor. But conscription after 6,000,000 of its citizens have offered themselves for armed service—i. e., about 2 per cent more of the population than conscripted Germany has taken or can take—conscription under a scheme twisted so as to turn it into a plan not for getting volunteer recruits into the Army, but for keeping them out so as to make room for the application of force; conscription by a newspaper dodge, in statistics; conscription by a silly libel of the class; conscription by a cloak for militaristic misdirection—this is too much.

We might profit again by remembering that Canada which forms a part of the British Empire has not resorted to conscription, yet with a population of only 9,000,000 has raised an army of 500,000, who are now admittedly doing as good if not better fighting than any others engaged in this mighty conflict. I spent several days in Canada during the present year and observed much patriotic enthusiasm among them.

Canada has some such a volunteer system as that proposed by the majority of the Military Committee. I call attention to an article appearing in the Survey under date of April 21, 1917:

It has been proved there [in Canada] that compulsion is not necessary if you apply modern census and efficiency methods in the process of selection. The old-time method of obtaining recruits, such as we are using now, has been discarded, with the result that the atmosphere is entirely changed. Scientific, selective, voluntary has not only conserved the liberty of conscience of the individual, but it has mustered an army of 500,000 volunteers, equivalent to a free-will army of 5,000,000, or the population of the United States; and 30,000 Americans compose a part of this army of volunteers.

We might profit further by remembering that Australia, another British possession, recently on a referendum voted down the proposition of conscription by something like 200,000 majority. Yet these same people like those of Canada are now doing a man's part in the war. If the plan of the "Mother Country" is a good one why do they not adopt it?

Yes; we can profit further by other European countries in remembering that recently 10,000 striking workers of Germany in a resolution demanded the abolition of conscription. Does it not seem strange that we of the United States, fighting for a world democracy, should deliberately establish a system that is the basis of Prussian autocracy, against which nearly the whole world is now in arms?

The question and principle of conscription has given me considerable concern. I reason that if I execute my promissory note, agreeing to pay a stipulated amount at the maturity of the obligation, I at least have the right of payment without enforcement by suit. Every citizen of this Government owes to it a debt of loyal patriotism and should be willing to defend it against the world. But it appears to me that he should be given the right of discharging the obligation without conscription. If we resort to conscription we discredit the patriotic loyalty of the masses, and our enemies at home and abroad will say that Congress forced the war upon the Nation, and realizing its inability to successfully prosecute same, was forced to pass an act of conscription in order to organize an army. As for me, this is an indictment for which I do not wish to lay the foundation. I believe we can raise as large an army by the volunteer system as the necessities of the occasion demand, and I know we can do it quicker than by the proposed plan which all admit will take from three to four months.

It is slander of the American people to say that the volunteer is a failure. He has won honors on every battle field where he has gone, and enriched the pages of history with his deeds of daring and skill. I challenge any one to show me a page of history made illustrious by a conscript American or English soldier.

Gentlemen, if my neighbors are to go to the trenches of Europe I want the sentinel on guard while they sleep to be a volunteer, and I will know they are secure; but with conscripts, desertion and ruin may follow. When they are ordered to scale the heights or take the trenches of the enemy I want them to know that they are in a regiment of volunteers.

In conclusion, let me say I come from a State that stands eleventh in population, fourth in volunteering to date, and second to none in loyalty and patriotic devotion. Whether the bill we pass provides for conscription or the volunteer system her sons will acquit themselves with glory on land and on sea. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, we are not now discussing the question of whether we shall have peace or war. There is no need to discuss the blessings of peace or the horrors of war.

What we and every other patriotic citizen of the Nation is interested in is the best method of raising an army to defend ourselves against our enemies and do our full duty in this respect.

There are great differences of opinion among the Members of Congress, as well as in the country, as to what method or methods will best serve this end. Shall we have an army composed of volunteers, or shall we have one made up of conscripts? is the question now under consideration.

There has been considerable discussion of the respective plans. The newspapers of the country, in the main, are advocating conscription. Many Members of Congress advocate conscription, and so does the administration.

Many articles have appeared in the papers; many speeches have been made here and elsewhere; many letters have been written and many resolutions have been adopted at mass meetings denouncing those who prefer the volunteer system to the conscript system as traitors, as German sympathizers, as enemies to our country.

Vituperation is not argument. Denunciation does not prove anything. Abuse does not add strength to any cause. Simply to say that a man is a traitor, that he is guilty of treason, does not prove that he is. Indeed, it is generally true that when a man resorts to abuse, villification, and vituperation it is because he is short on real argument and wants to divert attention from the merits of the question involved in the discussion.

Some arguments, however, have been presented in favor of conscription. Let us see what the ones most frequently urged are.

It is repeated over and over again that the volunteer system is a failure. I have seen and heard this statement hundreds of times.

A distinguished Senator used this language:

> No great war has ever been fought, or ever will be fought, largely by volunteers.

The majority report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs says:

> The volunteer method has never proved adequate and effectual for national needs.

A statement repeated over and over again without any effort to refute it is finally accepted as the truth. The facts are not given by the press, so this statement has had great weight with many persons.

Has the volunteer system proven a failure? The minority report of the Senate committee says:

> The traditions and history of our people favor the volunteer system. We have had five wars. All of them were fought under the volunteer system, and all of them were won. The Nation has never lost a war. The volunteer spirit is bred into the people. The men of the United States are willing to volunteer now and ought to be given an opportunity to do so rather than to be conscripted into service.

What war was ever won by conscripts? History answers there were none. What battles famous in American history were won by conscripts? Again the answer is there were none.

Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill were won by volunteers. There was not a conscript there.

How many conscripts were with George Washington when he crossed the Delaware? How many conscripts endured hunger and cold with him at Valley Forge? There were none.

How many conscripts were with Andrew Jackson when he won the battle of New Orleans? There were none. But the brave volunteers of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi were there.

How many conscripts were with Scott and Taylor in the Mexican War? There was not a conscript in the whole army. I recall that at Buena Vista Jefferson Davis and his volunteers demonstrated their heroism and saved the day.

Who performed the valiant service in the Civil War in both armies that brought honor and glory to the American soldier? It was the volunteer, and not the conscript. It is a matter of history that conscription was a mistake and a failure on both sides.

Were Grant and Sherman, Lee and Jackson, or any of the other great generals on either side conscripts? Certainly not.

I defy anyone to name a single conscript in that great struggle that ever received any recognition for bravery or meritorious service. I would also like for anyone to name a single man who has ever boasted of the fact that he was a conscript.

It has always been my understanding that it was considered a disgrace to have been conscripted. Yet the gentlemen who favor conscription without giving men a chance to volunteer are stamping disgrace upon the brows of men who do not deserve such a stigma.

Some gentlemen state frankly that they do not believe that our men will volunteer. It is a frankly cruel statement. Others express a doubt that men will volunteer, and suggest the embarrassment if they do not volunteer.

One statement is based upon an absolute denial of the patriotism and loyalty of the people of the Nation; the other expresses a doubt and distrust as to their patriotism and loyalty so strong that they are unwilling to give the people a chance to show their love of country and willingness to sacrifice themselves on the altar of the country's good.

It may be that the people have sunk so low that they will overlook these expressions that reflect so seriously upon them. They will do so if they have lost all sense of honor; if they have lost all self-respect.

In the past we have praised the volunteer soldier; we have honored him for his valor and devotion to his country. His achievements have been told in story and song; his deeds have been immortalized by orators and historians; his feats of daring have been the delight, as well as the inspiration, of thousands who have come after him; but, alas! the glory that has been his through the years has been shown to be undeserved. The historian, the orator, the poet that have given him praise have been perpetrating a fable upon a credulous people.

Mr. Chairman, it will undoubtedly be a great shock to those old volunteer veterans who are still living to learn that they were an absolute failure. Those old soldiers have taken great pride in the fact that they, on each side, offered themselves for a cause that they believed to be right. They have delighted to hear the story of their valor and prowess recounted. They have been pleased to believe that their fellow citizens honored them for their service.

What a rude awakening has come to them!

"No great war has ever been won largely by volunteers," says a Senator.

"The volunteer method has never proved adequate and effectual for national needs," says the Senate committee in reporting the administration bill.

"The fact is that the volunteer is not a reliable soldier, and any people that leans upon him leans upon a broken reed," says former Secretary of War, Luke E. Wright, according to a quotation by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN.

Gentlemen, these are base slanders visited upon as brave and noble men as ever lived, and I can not refrain from denouncing them as such.

Ninety-seven and seven-tenths per cent of the men in the Union Army were volunteers. There were more than 2,250,000 men in that Army, and only about 46,000 of them were conscripts. The Secretary of War, in his report dated November 22, 1865, says:

The troops disbanded were chiefly volunteers.

I do not have the statistics for the Confederate Army, but I do know that in both armies there were more than two and one-half millions of volunteers. This, too, at a time when we had a population of 33,000,000. Now we have more than three times as great population, and it is said that we can not get half that many volunteers.

The Spanish-American soldiers were volunteers. McKinley, himself a veteran of the Civil War, signed the military bill that was passed for the purpose of that war, and he did not ask for conscription.

Just prior to his death President McKinley said:

Our troops represented the courage and conscience, the purpose and patriotism of their country. * * * They did their full duty, and all sought the place of greatest peril. They never faltered.

These were volunteers, not conscripts.

In his message to Congress after the Mexican War President James K. Polk said:

Well may the American people be proud of the energy and gallantry of our Regular and Volunteer officers and soldiers. The events of these few months afford a gratifying proof that our country can under any emergency confidently rely for the maintenance of her honor and the defense of her rights on an effective force ready at all times voluntarily to relinquish the comforts of home for the perils and privations of the camp.

Gen. W. T. Sherman said in his memoirs:

We tried almost every system known to modern nations, all with more or less success—voluntary enlistment, the draft, and bought substitutes—and I think that all officers of experience will confirm my assertion that the men who voluntarily enlisted at the outbreak of the war were the best—better than the conscript and far better than the bought substitute.

Thus it will be seen that the history of the volunteer soldier in the United States is a glorious one, and that those who say to the contrary are traducers and slanderers.

WHAT OF CONSCRIPTS.

William F. Fox, in his book on the Civil War, says:

Desertions were frequent among the drafted men, for their services were compulsory, but there were not many of this class in the ranks. The Union Army was essentially a volunteer army.

President Lincoln realized the inefficiency and unreliability of conscripts when he used this language:

We get a large body of reinforcements together and start them to the front, but after deducting the sick, the deserters, the stragglers, and the discharged, the numbers seriously diminish by the time they reach their destination. It's like trying to shovel fleas across a barnyard—you don't get 'em all there.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles testified before the Military Affairs Committee as follows:

As far as conscription was concerned, that was tried out during the Civil War with unsatisfactory results. I think there were 54,000 men added to the Army—54,000 additional to the 2,000,000 men—by conscription; but I know that just at the time of the crisis of the Gettysburg campaign thousands of the best troops, drilled and disciplined men, in the Army had to be taken out of the field and sent back to suppress the riots occasioned by that unpopular measure.

A writer on the Civil War says in regard to conscripts in the Union Army:

Desertions, as was to be expected in these circumstances, were very numerous. In the spring of 1864 some 3,000 officers and 80,000 noncommissioned officers and men were missing from the Army of the Potomac alone for reasons unknown.

Gov. Seymour, of New York, in a message to the legislature dated January 5, 1864, says:

The attempt to fill our armies by drafting was abortive. While it gave no useful result, it disturbed the public mind, it carried anxiety and perplexity into the workshop, the fields, and the homes of our citizens. It not only fails to fill our armies but it produces discontent in the service; it is opposed to the genius of our political system; it alienates our people from the Government; it is injurious to the industrial pursuits of the country.

It is stated in the report of the Confederate bureau of conscription, 1864, that—

A rigid and unusual inspection not only of company rolls but personal and also pay rolls will prove that more men have been received into the service irregularly since the 1st of January than have gone through the conscription authorities. In many localities it has been found expedient, indeed necessary, to suspend wholly or partially the operation of conscriptions.

Brooks, in "Conscription in Confederate States," says:

The conscripted classes were confessedly almost worthless as fighting material, and no doubt 100,000 deserters, admitted by Gen. Preston to be at large, were principally conscripts. Compulsory service was furthermore a weakening force in that it brought conflicts with the States, which led to half-hearted support in some instances, and did much to make service in the army unpopular.

Attention has been called to these quotations in order to show that the aspersions cast upon the volunteer soldier, so far as the experience of our Nation is concerned, are entirely unwarranted; that the volunteer has made a glorious record and the conscript an inglorious one; that the volunteer system has proven a success and that conscription has proven a failure.

Let us now look to some other lands and see how the volunteer system has worked there. In England an army of more than 5,000,000 men was raised by the volunteer system.

It is a fact that to-day there is not a single conscript fighting for England. After this large force had volunteered, England did resort to conscription. This was not done, however, until about one in eight of her entire population had volunteered.

It will be seen that the men of England were given a chance to volunteer, and that they responded nobly—6,000,000 offered their services.

So it is not true that the volunteer system was a failure in England. Listen to what Lord Kitchener, the great English general, said on January 5, 1916:

So far we have been able to provide for the largest increase of the army and its maintenance on a purely voluntary system. * * * which has done so well and which has given us much splendid material in the field. I do not consider that the proposed change should be regarded in the light of any derogation of the principle of voluntary service in this country.

On May 23, 1916, he said:

The conviction is deeply and universally felt that we have engaged in a just war, and the patriotism of our people gave us, under the voluntary system, a far larger army than we could ever have contemplated.

It was made plain by other eminent Englishmen that they did not favor conscription until the men of England had had an opportunity to volunteer, and that they had great respect for and faith in the volunteer system.

How different from many of our great statesmen. They are unwilling to trust to the patriotism of Americans, and some even go to the extent of casting reflections upon our splendid military record that has been made by patriotic volunteers.

When the conscription bill was being considered in England Right Hon. Mr. Asquith, then premier, said that he was a keen supporter of the volunteer system, and that he favored conscription as a last resort.

Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, now in this city on a mission for England, said:

Let me repeat, I have never been one of those who looked with favor upon compulsion in any form—conscription in any form.

So England did not adopt conscription in the first instance, but only as a last resort, and after the volunteer system had brought forth more than 6,000,000 men who were ready to sacrifice themselves for love of country.

PATRIOTISM IN CANADA.

Our neighbor, Canada, one of the British possessions, has demonstrated the patriotism of her sons by sending 400,000 volunteer troops. We have several times as large a population as has Canada. At the same ratio we could send several millions; in fact, many times as large an army as it is proposed that we shall raise.

Canada is now inviting immigrants. Advertisements have been run in the newspapers in which are set out the advantages of living in Canada, one of which is that there is no conscription.

THERE IS AUSTRALIA.

Australia is one of the colonial possessions of England. She has furnished hundreds of thousands of her troops to help fight England's battles in this great conflict. Not one of them is a conscript. Every Australian soldier that left his native land to fight a foreign foe thousands of miles from home was a volunteer. The same thing is true of New Zealand.

Last fall an election was held on the subject of conscription and it lost by a large vote.

Think of it! In England, where they have a King, conscription was not resorted to until the men had had a chance to volunteer.

Think of it! In the English colonial possessions—Canada, Australia, and New Zealand—the volunteer system still prevails.

Think of it! Australia is a British possession. England has a King. Yet the people of Australia are permitted to vote on the question of conscription.

Think of it! That in this "land of the free and home of the brave" there should be such a reversal of military policy at the very beginning, in the face of all our military traditions and experience, and in the face of the facts that I have just discussed.

AN ARGUMENT FOR CONSCRIPTION EXPLODED.

It is argued by some, as I have stated, that the volunteer system has proven a failure in the past.

What I have said has been in an effort to show that volunteerism has not been a failure in the history of the United States and in the history of several other countries.

Now, I approach another argument against volunteering. While some assert that it will be impossible to secure enough volunteers for the Army, many of the opponents of the volunteer system say that it should be changed and conscription provided for because the volunteers are usually the bravest and best of our citizens, and that many of them can not be spared from their usual business life; that they are more needed in the industrial life and work of the Nation than for military service.

I notice that Gen. Bridges, of the British Army, who is now in this city, has given out an interview in which he advocates conscription. He makes the statement that—

The loss of so many men at the front who would have been of far greater value at home did more perhaps than anything else to bring about the adoption of selective conscription. We realized after a year's blundering that highly trained men should not be sent to the trenches to die, and that the Government should have the right to select the fighting men and those to be kept at home for industrial service.

That argument has been made over and over again by the advocates of conscription. Some men are too valuable to be allowed to fight, because their services are so badly needed in industrial work; therefore the military authorities should have the right to "select" those who should fight, they say.

It is very true that there are men who should not be allowed to join the Army. For example, Thomas A. Edison, with his wonderful inventive genius, is too valuable to put on the firing line, because he can serve us much better by applying his mind to the development of inventions that will be worth more to us in the war than a mighty army.

No one will deny this. Everyone recognizes that some right of selection should exist. This point has been stressed and made much of by the newspapers and those favoring conscription; but they are not fair enough to state the fact that the principle of the right of "selection" is recognized and provided for in the volunteer provision of the Dent bill.

It is but fair to the gentlemen who reported the Dent bill, to those of us who favor that provision of it, and but fair to the country as well, for that fact to be known. No; they prefer to overlook the fact, and to make the country believe that under the volunteer system no right of selection will exist. But that is only one example of their unfair methods.

So, Mr. Chairman, if we adopt the volunteer provision of the Dent bill we will deprive the conscriptionists of one of their strongest arguments and provide against the mistake that according to Gen. Bridges, England made and the thing that he says "did more, perhaps, than anything else to bring about the adoption of selective conscription."

The fact that the chairman of the committee, Mr. DENT, and his colleagues who stood with him, had the good judgment to recognize the principle of the right of selection, and make it a part of their volunteer plan, does them great credit. It was a recognition of an important principle, and at the same time it destroyed the strongest argument for conscription.

We have heard much of universal obligation of service. It is said that there is equality of obligation. and that there shall be equality of service. That sounds well; but, of course, it is not an honest argument for conscription.

In the first place, the administration purposes to draft those between the ages of 19 and 25 years.

In the second place, it was stated by the Secretary of War that 42 per cent of these would be exempted for one reason or another.

In the third place, it is proposed under the first call to "select" only one boy or man in seven or eight. As they are needed, others will be called. If the war shall end before the final draft is made, of course, some would escape service entirely.

Although one may be under just as much obligation as another to perform military service, it is obvious that the administration measure does not really provide for or propose equality of military service. In the very nature of things equality of such service is impossible. The very terms "universal" and "selective" indicate that such equality is not intended.

But some one says that it is as important to have some one to engage in industrial work as it is to shoot guns and kill the foe. It sounds all right to talk of universality of obligation, but there is no such thing as universality of service, universality of sacrifice.

The man who makes a gun is performing a service to his country. The man who fires that gun in the defense of his country is also performing a service. I have heard it stated that one service is as great as the other. I shall not discuss that phase of the subject, but I do contend that as between the two there is no equality of sacrifice.

The artisan remains at home with his family and friends. He is perfectly safe from an enemy's bullet. He does not lose his life or his health from disease contracted in camp. He does not suffer the many privations attendant upon the life of a soldier. He draws as good wages as he did before the war, perhaps better. At the close of the war he does not have to adjust himself to new or strange conditions; if changes have come gradually he has witnessed their coming and has adapted himself to them. In fact, the war will have brought but little, if any, of trial and hardship to him.

With the soldier it is another story. Friends and family are left behind. Life and limb and health are offered to the god of war. If his life is spared, he may return crippled or broken in health. Then he enters in the contest for a livelihood in the future with the man who remained at home as a competitor. He is handicapped by the changed conditions, the loss of time, and the change in himself.

Oh, my friends, who can say that there is universality of sacrifice, equality of service? There can be no comparison between the two in the burdens borne, the suffering undergone, the heartaches endured, and the privations and hardships experienced.

AN ADVOCATE OF CONSCRIPTION QUOTES SCRIPTURE.

A few minutes ago the gentleman from Alabama, while making an argument for conscription, quoted Scripture. He told about Moses and David taking a census.

I am reminded that on one occasion the devil came to the Master and quoted Scripture for his own purpose, when the Master said, "Get thee behind me, Satan." And he "got." [Laughter and applause.]

I believe that some of these gentlemen who are crying out so loudly and wildly for conscription are going to be told by their constituents on next election day to "get," and unless I miss my guess they will "get." [Applause.]

But to the gentleman's quotation. While he was speaking, some Scripture occurred to me, so I borrowed a well-worn Bible from my good friend ZEKE CANDLER, so that I might not be guilty of misquoting.

In I Chronicles, twenty-first chapter, we find this language:

And Satan stood up against Israel, and moved David to number Israel—

Without reading the whole chapter, let me say that the story is that David gave instructions according to what Satan had said, and it was accordingly done. Then we read:

And God was displeased with this thing; therefore he smote Israel.
And David said unto God, "I have sinned greatly, because I have done this thing; but now, I beseech Thee, do away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly."
And the Lord spake unto Gad, David's seer, saying, "Go and tell David, saying 'Thus saith the Lord, I offer thee three things: choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee.'"
So Gad came to David, and said unto him, "Thus saith the Lord, 'Choose thee.'"
"Either three years' famine; or three months to be destroyed before thy foes, while that the sword of thine enemies overtaketh thee; or else three days the sword of the Lord, even the pestilence, in the land, and the angel of the Lord destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel. Now therefore advise thyself what word I shall bring again to him that sent me."
And David said unto Gad, "I am in a great strait: Let me fall now into the hand of the Lord; for very great are His mercies: but let me not fall into the hand of man."
So the Lord sent pestilence upon Israel: and there fell of Israel 70,000 men.

Then David clothed himself in sackcloth and ashes, acknowledged his sin and foolishness, repented of what he had done—

Built there an altar unto the Lord; and offered burnt offerings and peace offerings, and called upon the Lord.

I beg you, my friends, do not be led astray by the gentleman from Alabama and his Scripture. [Laughter and applause.]

THE PROPAGANDA FOR CONSCRIPTION.

A lively propaganda has been conducted by the press of the country for conscription. It has developed in this debate that some organizations in the city of New York, and perhaps elsewhere, have been sending out telegrams urging that mass meetings be held and resolutions be passed favoring it.

Much that has appeared in the press and circular letters that have gone out from the great centers has been unwarranted by the facts.

The slogan has been, "Stand by the administration," and they do not tell the country what the administration bill is.

The press and those favoring conscription have divided Congress into two classes—those who are standing by the administration and those who are opposing the administration. It was reported in the papers that the chairman, Mr. DENT, and 12 other members of the Military Affairs Committee were opposing the administration, and that the gentleman from California, Mr. KAHN, and 7 others were standing by the administration.

A BILL WITHOUT A FRIEND.

What is the truth about the matter? It is that not a single member of the committee is supporting the administration bill; that not a single member of this House has raised his voice in defense of that bill; and I do not believe that there is a solitary Member of the House that would vote for the administration bill.

Of course, it would be a shock and surprise to the country, after what has appeared in the press, to learn that the bill prepared by the military experts and the Secretary of War, and indorsed by the administration, has not received the indorsement on the floor of the House, or elsewhere, so far as I can learn, of a single one of the 434 Members.

A REJECTED FEATURE.

One provision of the administration bill is that only boys and young men between the ages of 19 and 25 shall be subject to conscription.

My information is that the committee was unanimously opposed to that provision. I doubt if more than a half dozen Members would vote for it.

The General Staff, the military experts, whom we have been told that we must follow blindly, had drafted the bill. It was explained by a member of the General Staff that those between the ages of 19 and 25 years would be divided into classes, as the "19-year class," the "20-year class," and so forth.

He also stated that the 19-year-old boys would be called first, and others called by classes as they were needed, the youngest always being called first.

This appealed to the military experts, men who have studied war, but the thought was so revolting to the committee that, as I am informed, not one member would support it.

It was proposed to send an army of beardless boys to fight and perhaps die in the trenches of Europe, yet we are told that the bill stands for the principle of "universal service"; that it is democratic in spirit.

We are told that it is a duty to serve our country, to perform military service. So it is, but no one can convince me that only the youth of the land owe such a duty. Those who have lived to mature years, those who have enjoyed the blessings that come from this great Government of ours, certainly owe as high duty to perform military service. In fact, they owe more.

But the military experts say to the young man: You have not yet had an opportunity to take any part in the operation of governmental affairs, you have never cast a ballot, but you must take the place and fight the battles of the older men. We need "cannon fodder" for the deadly guns in Europe, and we will feed them tender "fodder."

Thank God from above that this matter is not to be left to military experts, but is to be decided by men who will not stand for such a hideous, shocking, monstrous proposition!

ANOTHER OBJECTIONABLE PROVISION.

Another proposition contained in the administration bill that has few friends here is the proposal to have a tribunal composed of military men only to pass upon questions of eligibility and exemption under the selective draft system.

This provision was inserted in the Dent bill:

That the President is authorized and empowered to constitute and establish throughout the United States tribunals for the purpose of enforcing and carrying into effect the terms and provisions of this act, together with such regulations as he shall prescribe and determine necessary for its administration. A majority of the members of each tribunal shall be citizens of the United States not connected with the Military Establishment.

Upon the complaint of any person who feels himself aggrieved by his enrollment or draft as is herein provided any court of record, State or Federal, having general jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the writ of habeas corpus, according to State laws or by act of Congress, shall have jurisdiction, by proceedings in the nature of the writ of habeas corpus, to hear summarily and determine the rights of such person.

It is doubtful if any other nation in the world gives such authority to military officers as they would have under the administration bill. England does not. She provides tribunals to decide such matters. But our military experts overlook that fact and seem to be reaching out for more power in this respect, as well as in others, than is granted to military officers in the militaristic nations of Europe.

It may be that I do not entertain as high regard for military authority as it is entitled to. But I know that matters of dealing with the questions of eligibility, exemption, and bringing the conscript into camp will not be handled by the higher officers.

I saw in this city less than 30 days ago a shameful, disgraceful, contemptible spectacle. It was the conduct of men in our Army right here on the Capitol Grounds. Men on horseback were riding on the sidewalks, wheeling their horses around and forcing men, women, and children to scramble madly away in order not to be trampled under foot. I saw them press their swords against Members of Congress as well as private citizens—men, women, and children.

Yet we are told that men of that class shall be sent out to deal with our citizens, to draft our young men, and exercise such authority over them as they may desire to exercise.

I do not believe that men of that spirit should be sent out among the people of our country to force them to go to war. For one, I shall never vote for a proposition of that kind. [Applause.]

WHO, SAVE THE EXPERTS, FAVORS THIS?

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing about the administration bill that has been severely criticized. If anyone here has had the temerity to champion that feature of the bill, I have not heard it.

The administration bill, prepared by military experts or by some one in high authority, makes no provision for the preservation of territorial units. In fact, it has been frankly stated that it was not intended that they should be preserved.

The Dent bill safeguards that proposition, and it is even provided in the Kahn amendment that will be offered that the soldiers shall be recruited in local units as far as practicable.

Everyone, save our military experts, recognized the justice and wisdom of keeping the boys from the States as nearly together as posssible; that it was wise, proper, and humane to have the companies composed of men who know each other, or had some common bond of sympathy.

To do this will give them greater contentment of mind and make them more willing to sacrifice themselves, and cause them to be more valiant soldiers. It is probably true that the apathy in recruiting is largely due to the fact that men are being placed in strange units under strange officers.

We are advised to adopt the views of military experts, because they have made a study of war subjects. Their study has been of little effect if they have failed to learn the advantages that come from preserving the local units, and the fact that other military nations that have pursued this policy.

Capt. Benson, an English officer, who testified before the committee, said:

Capt. BENSON. The territorial community idea is kept as far as possible.

Mr. MCKENZIE. They are not taken into one great body and then distributed?

Capt. BENSON. They pass into larger depots for training purposes and then when passed out into service they are assigned according to the territorial regiments; that is, the regiment of the county which they came from, so as to keep them as near as possible with their own people and friends.

Mr. MCKENZIE. You maintain the neighborhood idea?

Capt. BENSON. Yes, sir.

Even in Germany, a military autocracy, this policy is followed. The soldiers of a community are kept together. Prussian militarism, which has been so bitterly denounced, and which I despise, has not become so cruel and inhumane as to deprive the poor fellows who are presenting themselves as targets for the enemy from the consolation of knowing that they are surrounded by friends.

It is worth something to them to know this and to know, also, that if they shall fall there will be some one to tell the home folks how courageously they fought and to carry back to loved ones messages that were whispered when the death rattle was sounded in their throats.

This has been the policy of all nations, so far as I have been able to learn, yet our military experts have failed to learn the lesson or to catch the significance of it.

In Creasy's Decisive Battles of the World we read:

According to old national custom, the warriors of each tribe were arranged together, neighbor thus fighting by the side of neighbor, friend by friend, and the spirit of emulation and the consciousness of responsibility excited to the very utmost.

Let me commend to the military experts a close reading of the teachings of history on this subject; that they learn the policy of the great military nations; that they learn something of human nature, and that it takes more than mere discipline to make good soldiers; and that the fighting spirit of men is not improved by forgetting that there is in the bosom of every man a yearning for the association of friends when the darkest hour of life is approaching.

Again, we have reason to rejoice that this law is to be enacted by civilians and not by military experts.

FALSE CLAIMS FOR THE BILL.

Many words that have a pleasing and agreeable sound are used in connection with the administration bill, such as "selective," "universal" and "democratic."

Somewhere I have read that error never walks naked across the earth. It always puts on robes which make it look like the truth. The spirit of evil never approaches us with hoofs and horns, but always as an angel of light.

Sometimes a doctrine obtains a strong hold on the people by the magic of delusive words. It proclaims sophistries as incontrovertible axioms and puts out the eyes of men by throwing into them the acids of beliefs that are false.

Reference has already been made to the words "selective" and "universal." I desire to say that the contention that conscription is "democratic" is entirely without warrant of fact.

When discussing that phase of the matter Senator REED said:

A moment's consideration will demonstrate the utter fallacy and absurdity of this claim.

First. There are in the United States approximately 104,000,000 people.

No one proposes to apply the military burdens to any but the male population. Hence, the first exemption must be approximately 52,000,000 females.

Second. Of the 52,000,000 males, approximately 32,000,000 are under the age of 19 or over 45 or physically incapacitated.

Hence, there is another absolute exemption of 32,000,000, which, added to the 52,000,000, gives absolute exemption to 84,000,000 of the population.

This leaves liable to military duty approximately 20,000,000.

Third. Of the 20,000,000 of military age, it is proposed to apply the draft to only those between the ages of 19 and 25. Of these there are approximately but 6,000,000.

Hence, it appears that there are completely exempted from even the gambling hazard of the draft 98,000,000 of people.

Fourth. The draft is to be applied to 6,000,000, but here the burden does not fall equally. All must equally take the gambler's hazard, but only 1 in 12 will be drafted.

Fifth. But the inequality does not end here. If you win out in the gamble, if you escape being drawn, if some other man is drawn, that man may be entirely excused either under general rules made by some military board in the name of the President or by the judgment of some military tribunal, and you may find yourself substituted for the man let out.

The board is clothed with absolute power to exempt any man whose release it thinks is "for the national interest." Accordingly, this board having drawn a plumber or machinist or druggist may say his release is "necessary to the national interest" and grab a laborer in his stead; or it may conclude the laborer is "necessary to the national interest" and let him go and grab the farmer, and so on.

Under this scheme you are not given the equal chance of the gambler's hazard, because if you win in this game at the military roulette wheel your winnings are liable to be turned over to the man who stood beside you and lost. Now, that may be necessary, but I am tired, sick, disgusted with the argument that a draft of this kind falls equally on all and is therefore democratic Here is the claim that the draft imposes an equal burden upon the population. Expressed in figures the draft falls on 8¼ per cent of the male population between 19 and 25. It falls on one-fortieth of the male population between 18 and 45—the military population. It falls on one two-hundred-and-eighth of the total population. This the advocates of the new-fangled doctrine of military democracy call equality.

WHO IS AIDING THE KAISER?

An effort is made to frighten those of us who are opposed to conscription by the assertion that in voting for the volunteer system we are lending aid and comfort to the Germans.

There is just as little truth in that statement as there is in many others made by conscriptionists. The real fact is that if the Germans derive any satisfaction from the action of the advocates of either volunteerism or conscription that it comes from the conscriptionists.

The Germans know that to conscript men will mean a delay of several months in getting an army. It will require months to put the machinery in operation to conscript men, and it will then take just as long to train the conscript as the volunteer.

Again, I believe that the Germans will say that the United States has such doubt of the patriotism of her citizens that she is afraid to attempt to raise an army by her traditional military policy. They know, of course, that all our wars have been won by volunteers. They know, of course, that the history of wars shows that one volunteer is worth three conscripts. They know, of course that England had six millions of her citizens to volunteer their services. They know, of course, that the colonial possessions of England have raised their armies from volunteers.

Then, do you doubt that they will say, "Why is the United States conscripting her citizens? Is it because patriotism is dead in that land, or is it because those people, the rank and file, sympathize with us?" No matter what answer they give to their questions, they will rejoice in the fact that they have to fight conscripts instead of men who freely and voluntarily offer themselves for their country.

Do not give the Germans cause to believe that we are a race of cowards. I resent the aspersion, no matter from what source it comes, that we are not a loyal, patriotic, courageous people. [Applause.]

FOLLOWING THE WAR EXPERTS.

We are told that no one is competent to pass judgment upon matters relating to the subject of national defense except the military and naval experts, and that in the matter of providing an army we should adopt without question the recommendations of the Army Board.

On the face of it this appears plausible and reasonable. Unless one analyzes the situation he is liable to be convinced, but when the truth is discovered it is found that there is really no reasonable basis for adopting a policy simply because the war experts advocate it.

"It is true that in all technical matters in the art of war we must defer to the judgment of our military experts. They are the only men who can tell us how mines are to be laid, and how they can be swept up, how far projectiles can be hurled, and how much damage explosives will do, how thick the armor plate on the battleship shall be, and of what material the strongest fortifications are built. Within his own province the military expert is supreme. He alone possesses the technical knowledge which is able to solve the problems which modern warfare presents. But outside of this narrow circle of technical knowledge the military expert is not to be accepted as an oracle. The very fact that he is a specialist devoting his life to one narrow range of data should make us wary of trusting him in the larger field of statesmanship. The study of projectiles and explosives does not of necessity unfold the mind for dealing with the problems which international life presents. Target practice on the land or sea does not train the eye to see the great facts of life as they are. Pondering the history of military campaigns and mapping imaginary battlefields is not ideal training for men who are to guide the feet of nations into the paths of peace.

"It is a mischievous assumption that Army and Navy officers have peculiar qualifications for dealing with the problems of statesmanship. and that they, more than all others, are to be consulted in determining the policy and program of a nation in the realm of international relations. It is a trick of all oligarchies to gather up power into their own hands. Military cliques have a swift way of determining what are military necessities. They trample without mercy on men who stand in their way. They are the last men in the Nation to be consulted on the large questions of national policy and expenditures. We are a democracy, and no man of us can for a moment consent to stand dumb on the most critical and far-reaching of all national problems, allowing leadership to pass into the hands of a special caste."

But the General Staff, the military experts, object to this. They want to destroy the National Guard. They want to have no army except the Regular Army. If this is done, it will mean promotions, with increase of salary, for thousands of them. It will mean an augmentation of power for them.

Do they favor the conscription plan for those reasons?

I simply say that there may be food for thought there.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. QUIN. Talking about conscripting the young men and sending them into war and onto the battlefield to be killed, do you not think we ought to conscript all the big incomes in this country to pay for this war?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. There is no doubt about that. I believe that thoroughly, and I would make exemptions pretty low if I had the right to prepare the bill, and would not allow any princely fortunes to be made out of this war. I want to say something about that later on if I have the time.

STANDING BY THE ADMINISTRATION.

It has been my earnest desire to support the administration measures. I have done so in every instance where I could do so without doing violence to my conscience and without becoming contemptible to myself.

On occasions I have yielded my judgment to the judgment of the leaders of my party, but I have never done so on any subject of such momentous importance as this, when I am so thoroughly convinced of the justice and strength of my position.

If the Dent bill shall pass, an opportunity will be given for men to volunteer; and if they do not do so, then the President will have full authority to put the conscription law into effect. He will have authority to do so as soon as he believes it to be necessary. In fact, he could set in motion at once the machinery necessary to register and enroll those of military age. He could be raising an army by both plans at the same time.

Mr. Chairman, so unconvincing to my mind have been the reasons assigned for departing from our military policy and for adopting one more severe than the military policies of many of the countries ruled over by kings and emperors that I must stand by my convictions.

None of us are wanting in patriotism, although we may differ in judgment as to the best course to pursue. Each man should act according to his best judgment in this matter of raising an army. The Constitution imposes the duty of providing for raising the army on the Congress. The Constitution makes the President Commander in Chief of the army that we authorize to be raised. After the army is in existence, his power is supreme. He shall have my earnest support in protecting every right and authority that the law or the Constitution gives him.

Of course I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are some in this land who will be vicious in their denunciation of those of us who vote against conscription. We will be called traitors, peace-at-any-price men, "slackers," but no real man will be driven to vote against his convictions simply to avoid criticism.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that every man will cast his vote in accordance with his honest convictions as to the best interests of his country, having in mind the fact that we are making history; that we are setting a precedent that in the future will rise up and either bless or curse us.

Some one has said that nature is lavish and even prodigal with many of her gifts, but that backbone is the rarest quality that was ever issued out to mankind by nature. Let each man who honestly believes in conscription vote for it, and let each man who honestly believes that it is best to vote for the volunteer system do so. Gentlemen, give evidence that you do possess backbone. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I have followed very closely the address made by the last speaker [Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia], and beginning where he left off I wish to make some suggestions in reply to what he has said. The pathetic argument in which he pictured the young man of 19 dying with so much of his future before him and so little of his life behind him, he says, will come up under the Senate bill which will be transferred over here, and upon which we will have to vote. When that bill is presented to us, it will be time enough to consider that phase of the question, but in the meantime let me suggest to my eloquent friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] that I can see no difference, so far as the loss to that young man is concerned, between the Senate bill and its 19 to 25 years' provision and the House bill with relation to the volunteer provision in it, which is from 18 years upward. If it is hard for the young man of 19 to die under conscription, will it not be just as hard for that young man to die though he be a volunteer under the provisions of this bill? The mere question of the loss of life is just the same in the one case as in the other. [Applause.] But we have nothing to do with that question now. We are considering the bill that has been reported by the Military Committee of this House, and that bill presents a different state of fact. Your limit begins with 21 years, so that the argument concerning this extreme youth is aside from the question that ought to concern you now in preparing to vote not upon the Senate bill but upon the House bill, which is the only bill that is before us.

And I am told that if this House bill were now in the hands of the committee in all human probability it would not be reported in its present form, for the opinion of the membership of that committee has changed radically in some respects since the report of this measure.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I will not be interrupted until I have finished, and then I will answer any question that is put to me if I can. Reference then was made to the condition of affairs in England, and the application of the volunteer system to sending 4,500,000 or 5,000,000 men into the field. Surely the men who are in charge of the military affairs of that country ought to know best what has been done, whether it has been for the good or ill of that country in carrying on the war on their part, and when their leader confesses that England made mistakes because by her system of quasi coercion she compelled her people to enlist prior to conscription and took men out of fields of industry where they were of more service to the country than they could be at the front in the trenches, we ought surely to accept their verdict as final. [Applause.] Again my friend argues for the voluntary system on the ground that we concede that a voluntary army is better than a conscript army. I confess I do not like the word "conscript" because of the associations surrounding that word in the past. I confess that it appeals to men creating a prejudice in their minds which they ought to set their reason against and see that it shall not influence their action when the facts underlying demand that we shall apply the selective draft in this instance instead of the voluntary system.

No man can speak more highly than I of the men who have volunteered in the various wars of my country. No man can exceed me in meed of praise for what they have accomplished and all that they have done, but the gentleman is in error when he says this amendment is an attack upon the volunteer. It is an attack upon a system by which they come into the service of the country, and every man who thinks must know from history that it is true that the volunteer system has cost the Government in men and money, life and treasure, far beyond anything that it could claim of merit. [Applause.] Take the history of this country. I could read you if time permitted the language of Washington, "What this Nation needs is a good Army, not a numerous Army." They had a volunteer system in the Revolutionary days by which, in Massachusetts, for instance, any man who raised 59 men could officer that company and could come with it to the front. There were hundreds of thousands of men raised by the volunteer system, and yet our great Father of his Country had hours of anguish when his little Army dwindled below six and seven thousand effective men and he cried out, "The militia"—and that meant the volunteer system of that day—"The militia is of no service to me. I want the Regular Army augmented and strengthened so that I may conduct this war successfully." Reference has been made here to the War of 1812. Oh, I tell you, my colleagues, there is not much for us to be proud of so far as the land forces are concerned in the War of 1812. At Bladensburg five or six thousand men, with a loss in killed and wounded of less than 25 men, were routed and scattered by a force of 3,000 English troops, of which only 1,500 entered the list of battle, and the next thing your Capital City was in flames and in the hands of the conquerors.

For upward of two years your volunteer forces struggled unsuccessfully to penetrate Canada, which was garrisoned by a force of 5,000 English soldiers, a part of the English Army sent over from England. They, the English, maintained the war for more than two years against all our efforts. Oh, but you say, the crowning thing was the victory of Jackson below New Orleans. You forget that over two years of training had seasoned those men, and that experienced officers had been selected and that Jackson had gathered some of the best marksmen in our country, which was then noted for the skill of its men in marksmanship, and you remember he gave the famous order, "Do not fire until you can see the whites of their eyes," and they fired and decimated the British ranks. [Applause.] Oh, yes; I concede that on the sea our Navy did big things, but on the land your volunteer system failed. In the Civil War you had an illustration of it. The system failed. We had to resort to a draft. All honor to the men in blue and the men in gray, volunteers, who fought like heroes on every battle field in their cause. [Applause.] In the beginning of the second year of the Confederacy conscription, as you have heard here, read from President Davis's own message, was adopted in the South, and they conscripted the volunteer army which was about to retire, its time of service having about expired, and they secured a large number of others who were gathered everywhere through the Southern States, and then were welded and put together in the solidarity of a real army that held the Union Armies, outnumbering them by far, in abeyance, and forced them to fight for years before they won a victory over that conscripted army of the Confederacy. [Applause.] What did it cost the Union side, this volunteer system? Our Government did not even take the precaution of scattering the Regular Army through the troops which were presented by the channel of voluntary enlistment, but the volunteers chose their own officers, they preserved their own separate units, and the officers of their own choice when they came into the service of the United States. I say to you, my friends, therein consists the most pernicious element of the volunteer system, and Gen. Upton, in this little pamphlet which most of you have seen, said, reviewing all the wars:

> Neither volunteer enlistments, based on patriotism, nor bounties, can be relied on to supply men for the Army during a prolonged war. That a draft is the only sure reliance of a government in time of war.

This system which has come down through the years past to this time has proved a failure on the score of lack of efficiency and power.

Elihu Root, who resurrected Gen. Upton's writings upon the subject of military affairs and the United States policy, wrote:

> The great question before us to-day is the question of adopting a military policy that will correct the evils which we have suffered in every war from the beginning down to this time.

That eminent soldier, Gen. Upton, who commanded a division of Cavalry in the Civil War, wrote failure across the policy of volunteer enlistment as practiced then, and it is true of it as practiced now. If the call for volunteers came, I could, if I were of suitable age, gather together my friends and companions and say to them, "Let us form a regiment." We elect our own officers, generally inexperienced, and most times unfit. And had I time I could tell you of instances that came to my knowledge, told to me by my old preceptor in the law, gone to his home above, in which he showed how the regiment he went into was formed and fashioned, and how his officers were commissioned—all commissioned by the State, all commissioned by the governor of the State in which they were raised.

And I want to say another thing, that besides that system, which is pernicious, the enlistment of men without proper officers is the vice of the volunteer system. But when you raise an army under the power given to you in the Constitution it is not the militia; it ought not to be the National Guard; it ought to be an army that will be raised whose officers should be commissioned by the President. They should be men of experience. Why, I would scatter the whole of your Regular Army through the midst of these new men, as far as fitted for it, to be their officers, so that they may be more readily trained and have men of experience to command them.

The question before you is not a volunteer system or a system of selection alone. It is a question of efficiency. Col. Watterson's letter that was read here the other day had a pregnant sentence in it which every one of us ought to remember. He said:

It is like retaining the old stage coach when the times have gone beyond it and the stage coach has lost its utility.

War is in an advance era. War is no longer what it was when Jackson fought his battle below New Orleans. Then it was men against men. It was a question of marksmanship and courage. To-day it is a question of the highest condition of scientific efficiency and mathematical thought. [Applause.] That is what it is to-day. And to-day it is not a body of chosen men going out to meet the enemy to fight the battles of the country, it is a marshalling of every asset that the Nation has and welding it into shape and concentrated mobilized power, and hurling that power against the adversary in order that victory may come sure and soon. [Applause.] It is a question of the highest state of efficiency for every man to consider. War is now a great business question in which efficiency dominates all else.

We want the most efficient condition. Every man owes an obligation of service, and there is not a man here who dares deny it. Every one of us owes an obligation of service to his country, in the field or wherever he can best promote her interests in time of danger and peril. And when he is to be selected for service it ought only to be for the purpose of developing the highest efficiency of the national resources. That is what this amendment seeks in part, and that is all it means. We wage no fight against volunteers, no attempt to reverse the pages of history and say the volunteers have failed because of lack of valor. Only by a selective draft can we obtain the highest efficiency.

But how shall we have the best efficiency in handling the resources of the Nation? That is the question that is presented to us to-night. I do not like the language of many of my colleagues—and I am sorry to have to criticize it—used on this floor, that a conscript and a convict are convertible terms. Shame on the man that holds such a view. God knows, and you know, that many a man who did not volunteer was as brave as you or I or any soldier that was in the field. [Applause.] To attack the men who were not actually in the service is to commit a wrong against their records and against their characters. But they say you put a stigma on the men by the selection system, and the gentleman said, "I would not like to have my son associating with pool-room touts and rowdies and riffraff." My friends, by this process of selection you avoid all that, for you are taking every man by a fair chance and on an equality. You are selecting the man to serve, and you do not take the riffraff and the pool-room touts and the blackguards and the cowards, but you are taking the cream of your whole people, and you are putting them to the front as men should be put to the front to serve their country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And the argument that a conscript is a coward when taken under these circumstances is utterly fallacious. I need only point this thinking company, for you are all men of thought and judgment, to the facts of history, and ask you to say whether they do not prove that an army conscripted as you call it, can be as brave as lions and conquering as heroes. Think of Germany through the unification of her army and the selection of her men after the lesson of Jena, humbling proud Austria in 1866, in a period of about seven weeks. Think of Prussia humbling the proud Frank and capturing Napoleon the Third and his army at Sedan in 1870-71 in a period of seven weeks.

Gentlemen, those were what you call conscripts, and selected conscripts, too. Were they lacking in valor and vigor? No. You can not draw any invidious distinctions between the two classes of men, for under this selective system you are simply conserving the Nation's resources, and you are making the best use of the men who are fit for military service; and if there are some that are better qualified to stay in the factory or at the forge, aye, or on the farm, let them be kept there [applause], for war to-day means the marshaling of all our assets to the best advantage, and the question of food and the question of supplies become in this kind of war as highly essential as the question of arms and the question of men.

When the argument upon the declaration of war was on there was a continual picturing of the horrors of war. What right had any man to picture the horrors of war when we were called upon to settle a principle of morals and of right? I remember a picture I once saw of a Roman scene, a beautiful girl standing in the foreground while the Roman judges sat behind her and an altar erected to Jupiter, which had the sacred fire flaming on it, and alongside of it was an urn in which incense rested.

All she had to do to escape the death penalty was to pick up a small portion of that incense and drop it on the flame, so that she would be making an offering to Jupiter, and thus forswear her Christian faith. Her young and handsome fiancé stood at her side in all the splendors of a fine young Roman warrior. You could almost see his mouth moving, uttering words. What a frightful test it would have proved to that poor girl if he had pictured to her the horrors of the arena and talked to her about the fierce beasts gnashing their teeth and their cruel jaws tearing her fair flesh and crushing her bones! Every man of you would say that in settling a moral question that picture would certainly have been cruel and unjust. It would destroy her power to think truly and decide according to conscience and judgment.

To-day we are met with another thing, not the horrors of war, but every man here is playing on the idea of sentiment and the glory of the volunteer and the traditions to be violated. Sentiment is being brought to the fore—sentiment that has no place in the settlement of this great and grave question. We have no right to be sentimental over the volunteer and his history. We have a right to prize it, but we have no right to use that as an argument to swerve us from doing our duty for our country in this hour of grave and serious trouble. [Applause.]

A constitutional question has been raised by my friend from New York [Mr. CHANDLER]. But that needs no answer, for he simply said, with his splendid elocution, picturing that first convention, of which we are all proud, the Constitutional Convention, which divided the Government into the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches. So they did, but what has that got to do with this question that is presented to you now? [Laughter and applause.]

My friend the beloved Speaker of this House said to you:

Let us read from an old document—it is the Constitution. Perhaps we need not mind the Constitution, but I am going to read to you the eighth paragraph of the First Article.

And then he read that part which clothed Congress with power in case of war. The first paragraph he read related to the power to raise armies and appropriate money for their use. That is the power under which you act, and it is not the one that he read last, which relates to the militia:

To provide for organizing, arming, and equipping the militia and for governing such portion of them as may be employed in the service of the United States—

And so forth. Another section says Congress shall have power "to call forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion." Now, that is the limit of the use of the National Guard or militia, and that is as far as it ought to go. In time of war they may be called as any other citizens may be called—drafted into the Army, to fight for the country in the war that may be upon the country or threatening her. But to say that any constitutional principle is violated is to argue the most arrant nonsense and humbuggery. [Applause.]

There is no constitutional question involved. It is a question of business judgment, and of business judgment alone. How shall we best conserve all the resources of this great and mighty Republic? How can we best hurl them against the foe in order to secure a quick and complete victory for our arms? Let us support the President in his work. Let us trust him in his work. Let us give him this plan, and not sneer at it, because it comes from the military experts. Who else would give it but the experts, who are better qualified to speak? Let us stand for it! [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to——

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold just a moment—the gentleman from Alabama in charge of the bill—while I make a request?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. At the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] I am asking unanimous consent that the amendments which he will offer to this bill may be presented at this time in order that they may be printed in the RECORD, so that the Members of the House may have them before them to-morrow in the RECORD.

Mr. DENT. I understand that the amendment the gentleman from California offers is to strike out the volunteer feature of the bill as reported by the majority of the committee?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; and he has two or three other short amendments here that I think he has gone over with the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. NEELY). The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the amendments he sends to the desk may be printed in the RECORD without being read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the amendments referred to:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 3, lines 1 to 25, and page 4, lines 1 to 6, strike out the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for 500,000 volunteers under and in accordance with the act of Congress approved April 25, 1914, in so far as said act is not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act. That said act of April 25, 1914, is hereby amended so as to give to the President full and complete authority to refuse to accept in and to discharge from the service any and all persons designated in section 3 of this act. That in the event it becomes necessary to raise an additional force of 500,000 men, as specified in subdivision 4 of the section, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call such additional force by volunteers in the same manner. Such volunteer army shall be apportioned among the various States and Territories and the District of Columbia according to population and raised in regimental units or parts thereof in addition to the National Guard in such States and Territories and the District of Columbia now authorized by law: Provided, That such volunteer forces shall be recruited in local units as far as practicable and company officers may be appointed from such units upon passing such reasonable and practicable examination as to fitness as the President may direct. All other officers shall be appointed as specified in this paragraph. That upon the completion of the registration as provided in section 4 of this act, and in the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised under the call for volunteers as herein provided, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized."

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 5, line 19, after the word "by," strike out the words "volunteer or," so that the paragraph as so amended will read:

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength."

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 6, lines 9 and 10, after the word "Army," strike out the words "and additional forces hereby authorized."

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 6, line 16, after the word "draft," insert "and all other forces hereby authorized shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively."

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 10, line 20, after the word "registered," strike out all the remainder of the section, beginning with the word "Provided," down to and including the word "Act" in line 2, page 11.

The matter so stricken out reads:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the President from beginning immediately the registration of citizens liable to military duty as herein provided, or of otherwise commencing the execution of this act: Provided further, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask of the gentlemen who control the time on both sides permission to make a request?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, for reasons that are not necessary to explain, by some misunderstanding I have not had an opportunity to speak. My last promise was for this evening. I shall not be able to remain longer to-night, and if the committee has the power I want to ask unanimous consent to be permitted to use my 15 minutes to-morrow morning.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, that can not be done. We would have to vacate the order that has been made by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that that permission could not be granted.

Mr. SMALL. If it must be given in the House I will make the request in the morning.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object unless I can have the same privilege.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from North Carolina simply says he promises to make his request to-morrow in the House.

Mr. LANGLEY. There are a number of other gentlemen in exactly the same predicament as the gentleman from North Carolina is, who have been promised time but have been waiting in vain to get it. I am one of them.

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have seen gentlemen within the last week turn all the somersaults of a Christmas jumping-jack on this bill. [Laughter.] And how they can reconcile themselves to gyrations of that kind is something that I can not understand.

The bill of the minority for conscription is an impeachment of the declaration made by many of you when the resolution declaring war was before this House, that the country was behind the President and wanted war with Germany. They charged that those of us who believed that that resolution ought not to pass were not representing the American people nor our constituents. To-day, by asking the adoption of this conscription bill, they are impeaching the statements they then made.

Mr. Chairman, I did not agree to that resolution, but when it passed I was one who was willing to give my loyal support to the President of the United States and to the country in all proper ways, and I do not propose by my vote now to stultify those gentlemen by saying that they were advocating an untruth when they said the people of this country were for war. Here is an admission that the country does not want war, and that people will not volunteer to fight it. I am not willing to join you now in that admission, gentlemen. You are sending it out to the country that your declarations so vehemently made then were untrue. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but it is an impeachment of the patriotism of the American people. If, as you asserted a few days ago, the American people believe this is a just war, then I trust so implicitly their patriotism that I am sure there is no necessity for any resort to the draft in order to bring them into the trenches, or anywhere else that the Commander in Chief of the Army calls them to go. [Applause.] My fellow Members, that is exactly the attitude that you are taking. You are impeaching the courage and patriotism of the greatest and the bravest people on earth. I will not join you in that impeachment. One of the arguments made by gentlemen who favor this draft system is that we can not get the volunteers. Yet in a speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] yesterday in the Senate he inserted telegrams from many of the adjutant generals of the States stating that if the War Department would give them an opportunity they could raise all the troops that were demanded of their States.

Mr. Chairman, it is not only an impeachment of the gentlemen who made these declarations, it is not only an impeachment of the patriotism of the American citizens, but it is undertaking to tear down the volunteer system by which we have won every war since the organization of this American Union and Prussianize it. More than 140 years ago the American Revolution was won by Volunteers. The War of 1812 was won by the Volunteers.

But my distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] undertakes to quote Scripture written away back 3,000 years ago to justify conscription. The idea of my friend Mr. HEFLIN quoting Scripture reminds me of when the devil took the Savior up on the mountain and showed him all the nations of the world, and the cattle on a thousand hills, and said, "All these I will give unto Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me," and yet that old devil did not have a cow or a foot of land to his name. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the conscription system is a vicious one and never has succeeded. We have heard to-day the experience of that grand old man, Gen. SHERWOOD, a brigadier general in the Union Army, a man who came down through my country with Gen. Sherman when I was a boy about 9 years old. One day since we have been here he said to me, "BURNETT, do you know where Cedar Bluff is?" "Why," I said, "General, that is where I was born and raised, down in Cherokee County, Ala." He said, "Well, I crossed the Coosa River with Gen. Sherman there at Cedar Bluff." I said, "Yes; and you fellows were the ones that got my geese that I was raising down there." [Laughter.] He said, "Yes, if they were within our reach we got them." He has given you the experience of the northern side in regard to the failure of conscription. I am here to-day to tell you—and my good friend, Judge HOUSTON, from Tennessee, will agfee with me—as to the failure of conscription on the southern side. My friends, I was a boy more than 7 years old when the first gun was fired at Sumter, and I was less than 12 years old when the flag of the Confederacy was furled forever at Appomattox. I remember those dark days. I remember the troubles through which we passed, and I remember, in 1862, when the Confederate Government adopted conscription, and then it was that the prestige of the Stars and Bars that had been in the ascendant for 12 months began to wane. My distinguished friend from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] said in his eloquent speech for conscription that if there had been 20,000 more men at Bull Run there never would have been that defeat and rout there, and perhaps never would have been the subsequent four years of bloodshed and carnage. My friend is mistaken if he means that if there had been 20,000 more conscripts it would have been different, because, Mr. Chairman, if there had been 20,000 conscripts there, instead of that rout extending only to the Potomac, those 20,000 conscripts would have been driven to Cape Cod or Kalamazoo. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said that the star of the Confederacy remained in the sky for three years on account of conscription, and he quotes Upton to that effect. Gentlemen, there never was a more egregious error. I was there in those days. I know something of the conscripts, and I agree with my friend, Gen. SHERWOOD, who described them on the northern side, and I know it took thousands of brave men who wore the gray to dig the conscripts and those dodging conscription out of the mountains and woods and caves in Alabama and Georgia and carry them to the front. And when they got them out, when Gen. Sherman and the Federals got down to Chattanooga and Chickamauga, many of those conscripts deserted and went to the Yankee Army. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, that is the history of conscripts where I lived. I was then nearly 9 years old, helping to raise sorghum and corn and other things to feed our armies. The conscripts and those lying out to escape conscription would come out of the woods and the mountains and steal and destroy what the women and children and negroes were raising. Yet you are willing to give your indorsement to a law which will force those into the war who are unwilling to go to march side by side with the brave men who may be selected. The unwilling soldier will seldom make a good soldier. England has 5,000,000 in the trenches, and not a conscript has been sent yet.

Now, what is your system of selection? Oh, you tell the people that there is to be a selection by lottery. The Secretary of War states that the lottery wheel will turn out the men who are to fight. No; it will not. It will turn out the names of those from whom that selection is to be made. But when it gets to the selection, then what? This bill ought to be entitled "a bill to encourage slackers," because that is what it will do. What will be the practical result of the plan? We are practical men, as Mr. Roosevelt once said. The result will be that in many cases prejudice will tear some young man from his home and send him to the trenches, while some favorite will be left at home. Who are the people that want it? These men from the Eastern States are urging it, where to-day they are not joining or recruiting. You saw in this afternoon's Washington Star how Vermont is away behind, and Maryland, the home of my distinguished friend Mr. LINTHICUM, and Baltimore, where silver-tongued orators have addressed great meetings and begged them to enlist, and yet they did not find them enlisting. Gentlemen, you are not going to find them going under this bill either. The munition factories, the steel plants, the mines, and other like enterprises are short of labor and clamoring for men. How easy, then, will it be for the slackers to flock to these industries, knowing that their managers will urge their need of more workers and keep them out of war. The State of Kansas has furnished more than its quota already. And what will those people back on the prairies of Kansas say when these slackers are selected to stay at home, while the farmer boy is told to go? My distinguished friend who last spoke, Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, said this conscription bill will weed out the barroom and pool-room touts and street loafers and compel them to stay at home, because the bill exempts the morally unfit. He was actually applauded in that statement by men who yesterday were arguing that this draft would send those very fellows to the front. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, you ought to better agree as to whom it will hit. How can we believe them, gentlemen? One day they take one attitude and the next day a different one. It is not the wheel that will turn them out that is so vicious, but it is when that selecting board, and we do not know who they will be, makes the selection and says to these people up here in Pennsylvania in the district of my able friend Mr. GRAHAM: "You are needed here not only to make munitions of war, but shoes and clothes and other things, and must not go." Every day circulars are being sent to us from the East and North urging us to vote for the conscript system because they say they need the men that might want to volunteer to work in the big industries and fill the pockets of their owners with gold. They expect that the board will select their men to stay at home while the men in the backwoods of Kentucky are selected to go and fight the battles for our country. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. They will be ready to go if they are needed, but they want to volunteer.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, my friend; but they do not want to be forced to go side by side with the cravens that would hide in the mountains of Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky and in the great manufacturing centers of the East. How will our people that are plowing to make the wheat and the corn to feed and the cotton to clothe the armies of the country feel when they are selected to go to the European trenches, and yet these fellows be exempted over in Massachusetts, the home of my friend Mr. GARDNER, the gallant and valiant warrior, whom I heard speak the other day down on the corner of the street when he said "Heretofore we have been saying 'Let George do it,' but the time has come when you must go and help George do it"? Yet he never said one time that he would be there to help George do it, or that his people in the East would be there. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, there is where we who represent the rural districts have got to confront the conditions which the great manufacturing interests expect to put over us by the passage of this bill. "Oh," but they say, "we are going to exempt the people in agriculture as well as the others," and this deception has been scattered among the farmers. The bill does not say so. They ought to be exempted, because the Army has got to depend on the men that follow the plow to support them and to support their wives and children back home.

Let us see what the Secretary of War said when asked about that question of exempting farmers. In the hearings just a few days ago before the Military Affairs Committee, when he was asked as to exemption of the men on the farm, he said:

> The problem is largely one of three peak-load periods in the farming industry—the season of planting, the season of cultivation, and the season of harvesting.
> So far as the present year is concerned, it seems entirely unlikely that our arrangements could be perfected so as to begin the drafting of men until after the season of planting has passed and the season of cultivation is well advanced. The season of harvest would therefore seem to be this year the one we have most to consider. The Council of National Defense would undoubtedly be constantly in touch with that situation through the Department of Agriculture and subordinate committees, and, if it should turn out to be at all a necessary thing to do, some system of furloughing from the Army during the peak load of the harvest season might be adopted to relieve that situation.

Going to furlough them from Europe to go back and help gather the crops in Alabama and Texas or Nebraska! That is what we gentlemen who represent rural districts are told by the head of the War Department. But the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] saw that that would not do, and so he said to the Secretary, "But if our troops were sent to the battle fronts, how would you furlough the men?" The Secretary said, "Of course, it would be impossible under those circumstances." Mr. KAHN then said, "Then you would have to meet that situation." Secretary Baker said, "We would have to meet that situation just as it has been met elsewhere."

Gentlemen, how has it been met elsewhere? It has been met by England and France by borrowing millions of dollars from us to buy our farm products. We have the money to buy them, but where are we going to find the men to raise them and to sell them to us if they are in the war? Oh, but he will furlough them to gather the crops. There is what he says to you men who have been hollering "Stand by the President."

But you gentlemen are not yourselves standing by the President and the Secretary of War. In the bill which they asked the committee to report they would destroy the State units entirely and force the boy from Alabama away from the companions whom he knows, and make him serve side by side with the boy from Maine or from California. Even your leader [Mr. KAHN] could not take that, and you gentlemen have abandoned your Commander in Chief and are following Mr. KAHN.

The bill which the President wanted would take the boy of 19 from his mother's side and force him to fight side by side with the Cossack from Russia. Your leader, Mr. KAHN, would not stand for that, and agreed to the minimum age of 21. Again you have abandoned your Commander in Chief and gone off after a new leader.

The bill of the President and the Secretary of War increased the rank and pay of brigadier generals who are heads of bureaus in the War Department to those of major generals, while nothing is said about raising the pay of the private soldier, who only gets $15 per month.

The gentleman from California and his colleagues on the committee could not stand for that part of the President's bill raising the rank and pay of these brigadiers who fight here in Washington in swivel chairs, and cut that out. Again, gentlemen, you are deserting your Commander in Chief. I could point out many other respects in which the bill you are supporting causes you to abandon our President.

I understood a few days ago that all of our Alabama delegation were for the Dent bill, but somehow the rubber stamp has been affixed to several of them and they have made speeches on the other side. [Laughter.] "O Consistency," and so forth.

The confusion that the draft system will bring about will be intense. How will the farmer know whether or not to pitch his crops or rent his lands when his tenant or his helper, either white or black, may at any time be selected to join the colors? How can the clerk in the store, or the carpenter at his bench, or the blacksmith at his forge, or the laborer in factory or field know what contracts to make when the lottery wheel may roll him out, and the conscript board may select him any day to leave his home and native land to fight in trenches across the seas.

I voted for the Britten amendment to the war resolution, not to send our boys to the European trenches, except by consent of Congress, unless they volunteered to go, but if they are to go let us see to it by the legislation that they go thoroughly trained, equipped, experienced, and prepared for trench warfare and are willing to go.

Gentlemen, you have been receiving telegrams from boards of trade and mass meetings in the cities, but wait until you hear from the man behind the plow, who is always expected to be the man behind the gun. [Applause.] Wait until you start this unjust selective system. Wait until you undertake that process. Oh, but my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] said it is fair because it is a selective process. It selects whom? That is the trouble about it. It is too selective, and who is going to make the selection? Gentlemen, you know that this propaganda has been boosted from the East, and that these great factories and newspapers expect their men to be selected to stay at home, and the boys from your district and mine are expected to be sent to meet the bullets of the Germans in the trenches. Selective how? Who is to be selected? Why, the boy over on one side of the street who does not want to go is selected to go, while his neighbor who wants to go is selected to stay at home. One will be selected to go who is perhaps the only child of a widowed mother, and in order to exempt himself he will have to show that the mother is almost a pauper. You and I have had some experience in the early part of the Mexican War, no doubt, in getting gentlemen released on account of dependent relatives. Who is to pass upon it? The same kind of a board that is to say that the great mining interests of Pennsylvania, that the great Steel Trust of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and Alabama, that the great Armor Plate Trust all over this country are to have their men selected to stay at home, and yet our constituents are to bear the brunt of this selection. Gentlemen, is that fair? Is it just? My good friend, the able gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY], eloquent and splendid—and I am glad to call him my friend—told you of the great battles won by the Irish soldiery in our war for independence. That is true, but he forgot to tell you that not one of those brave Irishmen were conscripts, but everyone of them had volunteered to do his duty. [Applause.]

The gentleman says that in the wind-up of this terrific cataclysm he hopes they will meet around the table and do justice to the grand old Emerald Isle. He is nursing a hope to his soul that I fear will never come to pass. If they should select to sit around that table my good friend O'SHAUNESSY and myself, then, by the eternal, we would see to it that English autocracy should be crushed; Ireland should be free. [Applause.]

Gentlemen have prated volubly within the last day or two about this being a war for humanity and a war for democracy. Gentlemen, every drop of blood that flows through my veins on both sides is English. Away back in seventy-six, and before those days, those who were my sires were here from that great country. I have no sympathy with German autocracy, but I hate British autocracy just the same. If we ever trust England to give democracy to any of her Provinces, then may the shades of Robert Emmet look down upon us and declare that that which has come never had been hoped for by him or any other man. Talk about Balfour—and men going wild over him—the man who has done more to try to crush out freedom in Ireland than any other living man. The first loan that we made was to old John Bull, and he will get the rest of it if he can ever get his fingers on it. This is your war for humanity! The gentleman who sits before me, my friend from West Virginia Mr. LITTLEPAGE, has a grand constituency in that State. When they begin to pick out your boys on the farm and in the stores, and leave the men in the mines, then the mother whose son is wrested from her heart will point the finger of her woe at you and say that you may take to your soul the sweet unction that you helped to do this wicked thing. Gentlemen, I am not indulging in theory and speculation. I know what conscription is. These two brave men who were on the Union side—Gen. SHERWOOD and Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH—have told you that no man that they knew would admit that he had ever been a conscript. I believe they are the only two Union veterans here, and they are both against it. I believe there are only three Confederate veterans in this House, and I know that one of them—Mr. JONES—that grand old hero that followed Lee and Jackson till the sun went down on the Confederacy, is against it. He knows what it did for the Lost Cause.

Maj. Harllee, of the United States Marine Corps, with 17 years of gallant service to his credit, said to the Committee on Military Affairs last year that "unwilling men burden armies, eat its substance, retard its action, and give it panics," and he opposed compulsory service or any other kind of service than that rendered by willing men. Why, it took two good soldiers in the South to stand behind every cringing conscript and get him to face the bullets at all. I heard my venerable friend, Gen. SHERWOOD, say to-day that out of 70 conscripts that were sent to him every one but two deserted, and yet you want to send unwilling men to fight battles beside brave men. Gentlemen, it is wrong, and in less than 12 months from now you will have written over your brows, every one of you who vote for it, by the scorning mothers and fathers and wives of our country that anathema maranatha, which ought to fall on every man that would foist on his people such a measure as this. [Applause.]

Gentlemen on this floor have compared the selective draft to the system of drawing men to serve on juries. Gentlemen, have you no higher estimate of human life than to compare the selecting of a man to sit for a week in a peaceful court room to that of selecting men to be sent 3,000 miles from home across the seas to face death among aliens and strangers?

This bill exempts Members of Congress. A motion will be made to strike that out and I am curious to know how many of you will vote for that. Your excuse will be that you are needed here, but out of this body of 434 Members not more than 8 or 10 would be selected, and we could manage somehow to get along without you, or your people could select some one to fill your place.

I want to call attention to one thing I forgot. In to-day's Washington Post there is an article which says—

CHICAGO, April 25.

Five hundred students of the agricultural college of the University of Illinois left Chicago tonight for Winnipeg, Manitoba, on their way to the Saskatoon country of northwestern Canada, where they will help produce the "war-winning wheat crop."

The men will be distributed to the individual farmers by the Dominion Government, which has guaranteed a minimum wage of $50 a month and board, two-thirds of each man's railroad fare in Canada and promised a homestead of 160 acres to each who serves six months in the field.

Canada, with less population than Pennsylvania, has sent 400,000 men to the trenches but has not had conscription, and is to-day bidding your young men come over there and get $50 per month and 160 acres of land and escape the conscription that you propose to put on them, and they are going. Members of the American Congress, can you do it? If you can, then go home to your wives and children and tell them that you have voted to drive young men from American soil because you threaten them with conscription. [Applause.]

Many of the gentlemen urging this draft bill admit with brutal candor that it means the destruction of our volunteer system entirely. There is no doubt about this being the purpose of the General Staff.

We have been justly denouncing German militarism for two years, but to-day you are about to fix on the American people a system more autocratic than Germany ever attempted.

The Kaiser, with all his autocratic power, can not conscript a single soldier to go beyond the borders of his empire, and yet you propose to draft young men to go beyond the seas.

In Australia the question was submitted to a vote of the people, and the soldiers in the trenches were permitted to send in their votes, and by an overwhelming majority those battle-scarred soldiers voted against conscription, and it was defeated.

I insert the following from the New York Evening Post of April 25 in regard to the action of that country on the question:

AUSTRALIA AND CONSCRIPTION—THE COMMONWEALTH'S EXPERIENCE WITH THE FIRST EVIDENCES OF MILITARISM—WHY THE PROPOSAL WAS VOTED DOWN IN THAT COUNTRY.

[By Louis Esson.]

In an anticonscription speech delivered in Melbourne the father of Lieut. Jacka, the first Australian soldier to win the Victoria Cross, pointed out that his son had left the Commonwealth as a free man, and trusted he would be able to return to a free country. Australian soldiers traveled 12,000 miles to wage war on militarism, and in innumerable letters urged their friends and relations at all costs to prevent this curse ever blighting their own country, for they had no wish to meet the same enemy when they returned. Australia is fearful of becoming like the conscript countries of Europe. The dominance of a military caste, the eternal routine and mechanical discipline, what H. G. Wells calls "tramping foolery," are inevitably hostile to individual freedom and democratic institutions. Hitherto the United States, with its love of liberty and its nonaggressive foreign policy, has stood as an example to the younger democracies. It would certainly be strange if, without the fullest consideration, and not primarily for the sake of home defense, these States adopted the European principle of compulsory military service.

It is often stated, with a fine flourish of rhetoric, that in a democracy there are equal obligations for equal rights. In the Commonwealth of Australia, before the referendum decided the issue, there was the same talk; but the people had a sufficient foretaste of militarism to realize that its theory and practice did not tally.

Even before the vote was taken the prime minister, Mr. Hughes, issued a proclamation calling up all single men between the ages of 21 and 35 to be enrolled for military training, so that when the vote was passed in favor of conscription they might be sent to Europe as quickly as possible. In proportion to population Australia at one time had sent to the actual front more men than Great Britain itself, and far more than conscript Russia; but if many more workers left as soldiers it was believed, and with good reason, that their places would rapidly be filled with undesirable aliens. Indeed, a shipload of Maltese immigrants actually arrived at Australia; but when the fact was made known, owing to the force of public opinion, they were not allowed to land, but were sent on to Noumea.

PREMIER CONFIDENT OF WINNING.

So confident was the prime minister that conscription would be carried that he established in advance a number of military courts. Applications for exemption or time were summarily settled. In some cases a man was given a few weeks to sell off his farm or business and go into camp. They were exhorted by eloquent orators, most of whom were, fortunately, exempt through age or infirmity, to "let the crops rot on the ground and the wool grow on the sheep's backs." The conscientious objectors, who were really a small body, were foolishly and unfairly treated in these courts. The old argument of the mad bull seemed conclusive to the military mind.

These matters were just the first fruits of the military system, which threatened to be as severe in Australia as elsewhere. Whatever language it speaks, militarism is always militarism. The censor became a power in the land, with the result that the people were misinformed on the most vital issues. Newspapers had to submit all matter to the censor, and sometimes the most harmless papers appeared with whole columns blotted out. Before the referendum any intelligent discussion was regarded as unpatriotic, and anticonscriptionists had considerable difficulty in obtaining platforms even in municipal buildings. The war-precautions act gave the ministers practically absolute power. Never in its brief history had Australia experienced such a period of petty tyranny and futile autocracy. If the issue had not been so serious, this whole playing with militarism, which had no real relationshsip to the war, would have been ludicrous in the extreme.

A STEP TOWARD MILITARISM.

Australia had seen enough to know that conscription was the first fatal step toward militarism. The foundations of democracy were threatened. Many popular measures, such as universal franchise, arbitration courts for the settlement of industrial disputes, the minimum wage, the eight-hour day, the initiative and referendum—that had been won only after hard struggles—the people feared would be suspended, if not finally lost, under a military régime. The work of the country had to be kept going, but as the workers left for the front their places would have to be filled by cheap labor (as has happened already in other countries), something like the proposed drafting of men and boys for rural work in these States. Any protest would be regarded as a violation of military law. A white Australia policy would be no longer tenable. In some respects the Australian Commonwealth is the most democratic country in the world, and because of their faith in the cause of progress the people voted solidly against conscription. After the war, with the establishment of freer governments, the peoples of Europe, even the German people, as shown by recent popular resolutions, will, in all probability, put an end to compulsory military service.

The rise and fall of the prime minister, Mr. W. M. Hughes, is the most dramatic episode in Australian politics. As a result of his stand on conscription, he was repudiated by a majority of his own followers, and a new leader, Frank Tudor, elected. Though Mr. Hughes is still prime minister, he is no longer the great labor leader who created such a sensation in Great Britain, but depends for support on his old enemies, the Conservative Opposition.

It seems, if the United States too hastily commits itself to conscription, it will be torn by the same troubles and dissensions. Voluntarism has not failed in Australia or Canada, and with a scientific system of recruiting there seems no reason why it should fail in America. The danger is that the country will be overridden by the juggernaut of militarism and forced into conscription before voluntarism has been given a fair trial.

The name of Washington has been invoked by those favoring conscription, and yet he was president of the convention which framed our Constitution that reserves to the States the right to appoint the officers of the militia and of training it according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Yet the War Department and General Staff would destroy this provision and establish on its ruins a compulsory military system more autocratic than ever Prussia dared to do.

But what is the Constitution to the General Staff?

During war times it is so easy to tread down the liberties of the people.

Let us not right at the beginning of this war make constitutional liberty the football for Congress or of any other power.

Let us not at the very threshold of this awful tragedy do what England did not do for more than a year, what Canada and Australia and New Zealand, all British Provinces, have not done to this day.

We are in the war, and I want to see it won, and won quickly, but, gentlemen, unwilling soldiers never won any war. Some of the speeches in this debate have been an insult to the volunteer soldiery of all our wars, and in the names of those brave volunteers who fought with Lee and Jackson and Johnson and Wheeler, on the southern side, and those who fought with Grant and Sherman and Sheridan, on the Union side, I resent it. In the names of those who followed the cause of freedom from Bunker Hill to Yorktown, who followed Jackson at New Orleans, and Taylor and Scott in Mexico, I resent this aspersion of their memories.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have very high regard for the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] who has just spoken, and it is somewhat embarrassing to question the facts of history so boldly asserted by him, although confessedly based largely on personal observations of his made when he was about 7 years of age. [Laughter.] A young historian indeed is this. [Laughter.] I heard once of an old lady who made claim to a memory worthy of note, but the remarkable achievement of the gentleman from Alabama in professing to recall with accuracy and recite with minuteness of detail impressions and recollections at the tender age of 7 far surpasses her claim of memory. [Laughter.]

The lady in question was a witness to prove the contents of a deed, claimed to have been executed more than 50 years before that date. She had not seen the paper since the date of its execution, yet she was able from having heard it read once to give a minute description of 700 acres of land, more or less, by Government numbers, starting with the northwest corner of the southeast corner of section 6, township 24, range 6 east, and so on through. When she finished, the opposing attorney, with the manner of a Chesterfield, politely remarked, "Aunt Nancy, you have a remarkable memory!" "Yes," she quickly replied, "so they all say, and I reckon it is so, for I don't think I have forgotten anything since I was 8 years old." "Can you tell us, then, what happened on the 14th day of July, 1846?" She hesitated for a moment only, and then inquiringly asked, "What hour of the day do you want me to speak of, sir?" [Laughter and applause.]

There were many great men living in those momentous times to which the gentleman from Alabama refers. Many of them have passed over the river, but some, God bless them, are with us still, and unfortunately for this our historian of tender years their recollections of those occurrences did not and do not now justify the conclusions announced by him in reference to the draft bills of 1862 and 1863, but the lessons they draw therefrom strongly argue for the selective draft bill now under consideration. If I read aright the messages of Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln, the draft bills of 1862 and 1863, though not so well drawn as the selective-draft system we are now considering, were yet wise, sound, useful, and imperative.

I will later quote at some length, not only from the letters and messages of these great leaders, but also from Washington and Jefferson to show that the selective-draft system, based as it is on the fundamental idea of universal service, is not only just, democratic, and scientific but necessary.

We must not be deaf to the meaning of the messages of these great leaders, not heedless of their solemn warnings on this important subject. In passing, I wish to refer the distinguished gentleman, posing as a historian, to some living witnesses who were really actors in those stirring days from 1861 to 1865, and how remarkable to find that four of them, now Members of this Congress, three in the House and one in the Senate, are enthusiastic in their support of the selective draft as opposed to the volunteer system. [Applause.] I refer, of course, to those distinguished gentlemen from Alabama, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Maryland, respectively, Senator BANKHEAD, Maj. STEDMAN, Gen. ESTOPINAL, and "Uncle FRED" TALBOTT. [Applause.] Their reasons are well stated in a very recent interview from another distinguished Confederate veteran, the Hon. Hilary A. Herbert, whose vision and foresight in providing for the Navy, while Secretary, made possible the quick and decisive victory in the War with Spain. [Applause.] I beg to read you his interesting and informing interview.

I most heartily approve the announcement of Gen. George P. Harrison, commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans, that the reunion in Washington will be held as usual, regardless of the war. There were some good men who thought that the reunion, while we were entering upon what might be a serious war, was inappropriate. Their opinions were worthy of consideration. Gen. Harrison took time and, after extended inquiries, decided that the veterans by a large majority believed as he did that the present was the time of all for the Confederates to go to Washington.

CONGRESSMEN NEED BACKBONE.

We think our tramp along Pennsylvania Avenue would put a little backbone into some of our Congressmen. I wish that this week had been set for our visit and next week for a similar visit by the Grand Army of the Republic. If only this could be so, I would venture to say that in 10 days after the two visits were over the President's program would be enacted into law and the Congressmen on their way home to look after their food crops and their political fences.

[Applause.]

I have consulted with many veterans during my two months in Florida and two weeks in Alabama, and I have yet to find a single veteran suggesting that the President's program ought to be modified in any way. They think that Woodrow Wilson, who knows more than any of our Congressmen about how the battles were won and lost by American troops, has wisely consulted our military experts, and that these experts are up to date in their knowledge.

EXPERIENCE IN CIVIL WAR.

They do not believe that plans devised by our military experts for an army during war that is upon us, plans approved by President Wilson, can be improved upon in Congress. The Confederate veteran knows that during our war our regularly drilled troops, when in the enemy's country, always swept away home guards like chaff before the wind, and the experience of the Federal troops with our home guards was always precisely the same.

[Applause.]

Experience that sank into them and became knowledge of war has made, I venture to say, 99 per cent of Confederate and Union veterans favor the plans President Wilson is advocating. They know what drill and discipline can make of the average American soldier. Some men, of course, in every organization, whether volunteer or what not, prove to be cowards in battle, but these are few. The presumption is that 99 per cent of the American freemen, universal service once adopted, will make, when properly trained, first-class soldiers. Every veteran of our war knows that. But it seems that many modern Congressmen can not learn by observation.

Mr. Chairman, there are some principles on which every Member of the House and every citizen of the country can and will agree.

The Nation is now engaged in a war, thought by every true American to be just, against an enemy shown to be ruthless and implacable. The United States must contribute its full share to crush that enemy or itself be overwhelmed and go with all other democracies down to destruction while autocratic government flourishes. For self-preservation, if for no other and higher motive, the whole country must conduct the war to success, and that means in modern times that the resources of the Nation must be fully spent until Prussian military autocracy is destroyed. We have no quarrel, as the President well says, with the German people themselves. [Applause.]

Let it not be forgotten that we are now at war with an enemy that has held at bay the combined armies and navies of the giant nations of Europe, outnumbering her in men, money, and munitions, and yet after three years not a battle has been fought on German soil, not a ship of her vast fleet, so long as it was content to remain safely housed in German harbors, has been sunk.

We have been forced into war with this dangerous and powerful antagonist. We have numbers, wealth, and size, but it is not so much a question of numbers, wealth, or size; but rather one of organization, efficiency, and preparation. Success involves the creation of the most efficient army possible, with due regard to the development of the equally important industrial resources, and that in turn means the distribution of the man power of the Nation in such way as to secure by coordination of effort the utmost power of offensive.

War is no longer a mere collision between armed forces, but largely a contest of economic resources. The man at the forge, in the factory, and above all the man with a hoe, is as much a soldier as the man with the gun and sword. [Applause.]

The Government can surely make a better disposition of the mighty and indispensable element of man power than would result from a promiscuous selection of their own share of the work made by volunteers. We must devise at the very beginning of this war some system that will provide a regular, orderly, and systematic supply of man power, when and where needed, whether in ranks at the battle front or in the equally important work of supplying food, clothing, and munitions. [Applause.]

The bill now before the House to increase temporarily the military establishment involves the selection of the men who shall serve in the fighting line and conversely the determination of those who shall remain in the ranks of productive industry.

The immediate question now under discussion, though in fact not presented by any report from the committee, as I will later show, is whether conscription or volunteering will better secure prompt and systematic distribution of the power of the Nation where it will assure victory, which must be won if the Nation is to endure; for we might as well recognize now that the life of the Nation is at stake. Although it seems self-evident that conscription is the wiser course to the desired end, yet every reason in a matter so important should be investigated, so that no one may hereafter be able justly to accuse this body of neglecting in this hour the high duty and solemn obligation imposed on it.

The selective draft, unquestionably, not only provides a regular and orderly flow of men when and where needed, but is founded upon that unchanging truth that on every man there rests a like duty to give life and property to the Nation in its hour of need. [Applause.] It recognizes that the call should not be alone to those gallant and courageous souls that always hasten to enlist at the first sign of danger, but that it should be to every able-bodied citizen capable of rendering full or even partial military service. [Applause.]

Americans share common privileges and a common destiny, and why should they not share common burdens and common duties? Who has assigned, who can assign, any just reason why the burdens of a nation at war should rest upon the shoulders of the volunteer alone? The right and the duty to defend the honor and the life of the Nation, to defend those sacred rights, those sacred principles and aspirations upon which the Nation rests is truly the obligation of all. And no mother's son should be allowed to make a sacrifice that every mother's son similarly circumstanced may not also be called to make. [Applause.]

The reasons given in support of this system are: The consensus of opinion by the military authorities of all times, the conclusions of the great statesmen of the country, an examination of the cost in money and men of a volunteer system, and a study of the conditions of the present war.

I am not unmindful that a great sentiment exists in favor of the volunteer, and, in view of the character of the men who have always thus offered their lives to their country, one may well feel those thrills that come for the brave. Yet a calmer view of the military history of our country favors the conclusion that those immortal and gallant souls have never had a fair deal and that their splendid efforts must be more wisely directed. They have been sacrificed in numbers out of all proportion to their duty, and the time has now come, I trust, when a policy so unjust and unfair will be ended in this country forever. [Applause.]

Napoleon, not to enter ancient history, found it necessary to establish conscription in France, and it still obtains there; Von Moltke approved it for Germany; all the military leaders, the men who have been called to positions in the general staff of the great armies of the world, now indorse enforced military service in war in one form or another.

The General Staff of our own Army regards it as necessary, and have laid their reasons frankly and fully before the Military Committee and, through them, before this body.

George Washington, speaking as the statesman of the Nation which he helped to form, and as the general of the Army, has expressed himself very forcibly against the militia-volunteer system—I repeat, against the system, not against the men who were its victims—and has given unqualified approval to the enforced draft. [Applause.]

In a letter on November 18, 1779, to the President of Congress he said:

In the more early stages of the contest, when men might have enlisted for the war, no man, as my whole conduct and the uniform tenor of my letters will evince, was ever more opposed to short enlistments than I was, and while there remained a prospect of obtaining recruits upon a permanent footing in the first instance, as far as duty and a regard to my station would permit, I urged my sentiments in favor of it. But the prospect of keeping up an army by voluntary enlistments being changed, or at least standing on too precarious and uncertain a footing to depend on for the exigency of our affairs, I took the liberty in February, 1778, in a particular manner to lay before the Committee of Arrangement, then with the Army at Valley Forge, a plan for an annual draft as the surest and most certain, if not the only means left us, of maintaining the Army on a proper and respectable ground. And, more and more confirmed in propriety of this opinion by the intervention of a variety of circumstances unnecessary to detail, I again took the freedom of urging the plan to the committee of conference in January last; and, having reviewed it in every point of light and found it right, or at least the best that has occurred to me, I hope I shall be excused by Congress for offering it to them, and in time for carrying it into execution for the next year, if they should conceive it necessary for the States to complete their quotas of troops.

In May, 1780, he again wrote to a committee from Congress as follows:

Unless the principal part of the force be composed of men regularly organized, and on the continuance of whose services we can rely, nothing decisive can be attempted. The militia are too precarious a dependence to justify such an attempt, where they form a material part of the plan. Militia can not have the necessary habits nor the consistency, either for an assault or a siege. In employing them essentially we should run a risk of being abandoned in the most critical moments. The expense and the consumption of provisions and stores, which we are bound by every motive to economize, will be very considerably increased. As we should not be able to keep the same body in the field during the whole campaign, we should a great part of the time have a double set of men to pay and feed, those in actual service and those on the march to relieve them or returning home when relieved. The operations of husbandry will suffer in proportion.

The mode by draft is, I am persuaded, the only efficacious one to obtain men. It appears to me certain that it is the only one to obtain them in time; nor can the period which you have appointed for bringing them into the field be delayed without defeating the object.

have little doubt that at any time, and much less at the present juncture, the powers of government exerted with confidence will be equal to the purpose of drafting. The hopes of the people, elevated by the prospects before them, will induce a cheerful compliance with this and all the other measures of vigor which have been recommended and which the exigency requires.

Later, on March 12, 1782, he wrote to James McHenry as follows:

It is idle at this late period of the war, when enthusiasm is cooled, if not done away, when the minds of that class of men who are proper subjects for soldiers are poisoned by the high bounties which have been given and the knowledge of the distresses of the Army so generally diffused through every State, to suppose that our battalions can be completed by voluntary enlistment. The attempt is vain, and we are only deceiving ourselves and injuring the cause by making the experiment. There is no other effectual method to get men suddenly but that of classing the people and compelling each class to furnish a recruit.

Had we formed a permanent army which had been capable of discipline, we should never have been compelled to retreat across the Delaware. We should not have remained all the next winter at their mercy if they had seen fit to march against us. We should not have suffered at Valley Forge.

Nor have all the ill effects been confined to the military line. The derangement of our finances is to be ascribed to it. The expenses of the war have been multiplied by it. We have had two sets of men to pay—the discharged men going out and the levies coming in. Our discipline has been much hurt if not ruined by such constant changes.

Regular troops alone are equal to the exigencies of modern war, and whenever a substitute is attempted it must prove ruinous.

No militia will ever acquire the habits necessary to resist a regular force.

No one doubts Washington's love of country nor the wisdom of his counsel, and he thus speaks to us through many letters and messages with remarkable clearness and force, urging the adoption of the selective draft. [Applause.]

Thomas Jefferson, the apostle of democracy, was in favor at first of a citizen soldiery. In 1801 he wrote:

For defense against invasion the Regular Army is as nothing, nor is it conceived needful or safe that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace. * * * The only force which can be ready at every point and competent to oppose an enemy is the body of neighboring citizens as formed into a militia.

He was likewise at first opposed to the establishment of the Military Academy at West Point and opposed to coast fortifications. Yet later, after the Battle of Bladensburg and the subsequent burning of public buildings at Washington, his attitude on these matters was entirely changed, and he expressed deep regret and sorrow that the plan submitted by Monroe, while acting Secretary of War, for compulsory military service had not been adopted. [Applause.] This plan sought to introduce in the United States Napoleon's method of classification by age and conscription, and when it failed of adoption Jefferson sent to Monroe the following note:

Nothing more wise or efficient could have been imagined than what you propose. It would have filled our ranks with Regulars, and that, too, by throwing a just share of the burden on the purses of those persons who are exempt either by age or office; it would have rendered our militia—a Nation of warriors. But the go-by seems to have been given to your proposition, and longer sufferance is necessary to force us to what is best. We seem equally incorrigible.

[Applause.]

In another letter to Monroe, he wrote:

We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens, and make military instruction a part of collegiate education. We can never be safe until this is done.

In a later letter to J. W. Eppes, a personal friend, he said:

I think the truth must now be obvious, that our people are too happy at home to enter into regular service and that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier, as the Greeks and Romans, who had no standing army; and that in doing this, all must be marshaled, classed by their ages, and every service ascribed to its competent class.

The South, in April, 1862, adopted a conscription act, which, after allowing certain exemptions, required every man physically able, between the ages of 18 and 35, to serve in the Confederate Army. It is well to remember that the first rush of volunteers was then over, and the type fit to command had laid down their lives in large numbers in the ranks for the cause.

The first enlistments had been for 12 months, and the terms of service of many were expiring. Volunteers to take the places of the outgoing troops were coming in slowly, and there were but few reenlistments. The Government was thus forced to meet the issue squarely, and its able statesmen and military advisors promptly secured the adoption of the draft law. It had its faults, chief among them being the allowance of substitutes and some unjust exemptions, but even then it served well its purpose.

On this let me quote from no less an authority than Jefferson Davis, as follows:

The defense of home, family, and country is universally recognized as the paramount political duty of every member of society, and in a form of government where each citizen enjoys an equality of rights and privileges nothing can be more invidious than an unequal distribution of duties or obligations. No pursuit nor position should relieve anyone who is able to do actual duty from enrollment in the army unless his functions or services are more useful to the defense of his country in another sphere.

During the first year of the war the authority granted to the President to call for volunteers in the army for a short period was sufficient to secure all the military force which we could fit out and use advantageously. As it became evident that the contest would be long and severe, better measures of preparation were enacted.

I was authorized to call out and place in the military service for three years, unless the war should sooner end, all white men residents of the Confederate States between the ages of 18 and 35 years, and to continue those already in the field until three years from the date of their enlistment.

This was the first step toward placing the army in a permanent and efficient condition.

[Applause.]

In the year 1863 the leaders of the North likewise found that the volunteer system, with all of its bounties, failed to furnish the men needed to meet the staggering human wastage.

Lincoln, with his great clearness of vision, saw what was needed, and secured the enactment of the Federal draft act, and in a memorandum of his own said:

This is the first case in which the degree of effrontery has been ventured upon of denying a power which is plainly and distinctly written down in the Constitution.

The Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies."

The whole scope of the conscription act is to raise and support armies. Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free government? * * * Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

[Applause.]

Thus we find that the four men who have wielded such great influence in framing the policies of the Nation have declared in favor of compulsory service. [Applause.]

The volunteer system in no war that our country has engaged in has supplied the number of men needed from time to time, and under a call for volunteers the response has always continued to grow less and less as time wore on, and from the standpoint of efficiency and economy it does not hold promise of success as compared with the more scientific method, now indorsed by all students of military tactics and policies. [Applause.]

It may be interesting in this connection to note that in the Revolution the total number of troops were 395,858. The greatest number we had at any one time was 89,000 in 1776, and it had steadily dwindled down to 29,000 in 1781. The British never had more than 42,000, and if the Army of 1776 had been retained until it was seasoned, and its officers experienced, who can doubt that success would have come to American arms much earlier, and without the suffering of Valley Forge and the horrible waste of men and money?

Upton, in his Military Policy, gives the cost of that war, exclusive of large bounties paid and provisions seized, at $370,000,000, and we were then a Nation of but 3,000,000 people.

The same conclusions as to the weakening effect of the volunteer system in failing to keep the ranks supplied with trained soldiers applies to the War of 1812, and likewise, as already shown, in the Civil War to the time of the passage of the draft acts of 1862 and 1863.

It is well to remember that under the volunteer system prevailing in the North during the Civil War more than $650,000,000 were spent in securing volunteers. The business of bounty agents and bounty jumpers was prosperous in those days, but this Congress will see that no system like this for raising an army can ever prevail again in this Nation of ours. [Applause.]

What our allies now need, even more than they do the armies we will raise and make ready, is the use of our money, our food, our munitions, our industrial resources throughout the land, and it is of just as great importance that the Government should say who shall stay and work as it is to select those who shall have the burden and the honor of camp and battle. [Applause.]

The true American, whether he goes as a volunteer or in response to his country's call under a system providing for universal service, will, we may be sure, do his full duty, and it is for us to legislate wisely on his behalf that the great army, those on the battle front, as well as those giving their best to provide for them, shall be as efficient as forethought can make it, that those who return may say "our country did its best once more for freedom."

The selective-draft system, which the House will be called to vote on, has the unanimous indorsement of every member of the distinguished Committee on Military Affairs, and the only difference between the majority and minority reports of this committee is whether the President in the raising of a new army shall be authorized, not directed or required, to call for volunteers, pending the time found necessary to enroll those liable for national service under the selective-draft system.

The committee are agreed as to all other provisions of the bill as reported, and while allusion has been made to certain differences between the House bill as reported and the bill originally recommended by the General Staff of the Army, yet those differences are not really pertinent or germane to the discussion of the bill now before the House. All seem to be agreed that the minimum age should be 21 instead of 19, and my information is that the War Department is really not opposed to this, but the real difference seems to center on the one question just pointed out, namely, whether the President shall be authorized, not required, to call for volunteers for the new army.

Let me now say to those gentlemen, who have paid such beautiful, deserving, and eloquent tribute to the immortal volunteers, that those are sentiments to which all gladly subscribe. No one, I trust, will ever seek to detract one iota from the valor and patriotism of the brave volunteer. But may I ask in all sincerity whether the majority feel that their report provides a system that really does honor to the splendid tributes paid the volunteer? Have you provided for and preserved a volunteer system in keeping with your claim as to the willingness of men to volunteer and serve in numbers larger than the Nation needs? Why, no! You have coupled it with a draft. And what more? Why the distinguished chairman, for whom I entertain high and affectionate regard, in his opening statement substantially said:

> I wish to correct some misrepresentations as to what the majority report recommends. It has been said that we are not standing by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Nothing is more incorrect, for, said he, we have not directed that the President shall call for volunteers, but simply authorized him to do so. We have given to him absolute authority, exercisable in his discretion, to put into effect the selective-draft system provided for in the bill.

I wonder how those who favor a volunteer system will feel when they find that their so-called friends have, in truth, provided in this bill for no volunteer system, though strongly commending such a system in their speeches and asserting that it would readily and promptly supply all the men needed. [Applause.]

Instead they propose only an authorization to the President to call for volunteers, and the President is vested with absolute power to put the selective-draft system in effect when, in his judgment, it is expedient or necessary.

The President has been very frank with the committee and Congress on this subject, and in a way that can not be misunderstood, for he has declared unequivocally that, in his judgment, the volunteer system should not be employed to raise the new army, and has strongly urged the selective-draft system for that purpose. Can there be doubt as to the President exercising the discretionary power given him by this bill to make effective the selective draft? Why, he has actually served notice that he will, and in doing so he will be simply giving effect to the opinions of all the Government's military advisors. [Applause.]

So in this bill you say to the President, in effect, "It is true you have said that the select-draft system should alone be adopted in raising the new army, but we just want you to say it again, and this bill clothes you with full authority to do so." [Applause.]

May I not respectfully suggest that this has too much the appearance of shifting a solemn responsibility? [Applause.]

Then, again, let us assume that the bill could pass with the dual system as outlined—what would be urged as the compelling force to secure volunteers thereunder if the President should call for volunteers? Unquestionably, all within military age would at once be told to volunteer now or you will be drafted, for your name is being enrolled, and as soon as the roll is complete the President will withdraw the call for volunteers and make effective the selective-draft system. Would he who then answered be really a volunteer?

Let the selective-draft system, however, be put in force at once, and let all who come within its provisions feel that they are rendering a national service by promptly registering their names and holding themselves in readiness thereafter to go where and when the Nation calls. They who thus respond will be true and brave patriots and deserving of the highest encomiums of their countrymen. [Applause.]

In conclusion let me say we have fought wars in the past for the cause of liberty and humanity, and for these same high purposes we are now entering upon a new war. War is never new in one sense; it brings with it the same horrors, the same losses in fortune and sorrow to the homes; it entails the same sacrifice of life and of those dearer than life, and we may well cry out because this woe has been thrust upon us. But our ancestors made the same sacrifice to secure the liberty of this land, the right to have a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and to overturn the divine right of kings to plunge the world into war or to inspire fear of their word. And it is not for us at this time, when Prussianism is imposing itself upon the whole civilized world, to forget our ideals, to forego our American birthright or to fear or even hesitate to bear our part, as American men and women in the past have ever done, worthily.

Once more we are fighting for freedom, with no material gain in return for the cost, but the maintenance of pure democracy and the establishment of permanent peace throughout the world. The military aristocracy of Prussia is a menace to the freedom of all nations and must and will be overthrown. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 15 minutes.

AMERICA; LOYAL AND UNITED.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, tribute has been paid to the temper and patriotism of this House. Tribute should likewise be paid to the loyalty of Americans all over this country, and especially to the many whom I know, of German descent or German birth, who were opposed to a declaration of war, sympathizing as between the belligerents with the central powers, and who yet since the declaration of war have written, spoken, and worked for national preparedness in this great crisis of the Nation. I know one, a physician and surgeon of the highest rank, who is ready to give up his large income to go and help the Government, and who was distressed when he found he was beyond the legal age.

MUST TRAIN AFTER WAR IS BEGUN.

I pay this tribute first. We are all Americans, and we stand for preparedness in this emergency. We have to meet a great war. We want to raise an army. If our people had been trained, armed, equipped, and furnished with officers we could simply call out an army. But we can not do that now. We must equip and train and officer the people in midst of this war, and do it so as to have, in the words of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], an efficient fighting force.

I remember how we called for volunteers at the beginning of the Civil War. I remember in the later call, when real volunteers went out in 1862, before the bounty system came in, how my friend of 16, when I was 14, left my side at school, went to the war, and came back at 18 a lieutenant in command of a company, marching with Sherman's troops through Washington. That man afterwards became governor of New Jersey.

That man and many others as young proved to us then that the country needs and depends on the young in time of war. Probably we ought to amend the Army bill so that those who are accepted as fit to fight shall be deemed fit to take a commission. They can not do it now before they are 21. But that is perhaps not properly for this bill.

The Military Establishment is to be increased, trained, armed, and officered. They must be trained.

EXPAND THE REGULAR ARMY AND NATIONAL GUARD.

If we call troops in this war and send them out untrained, as we did against the untrained troops of the South—if we send such raw levies abroad to meet the new conditions of this war it will be simply murder. We must have some other system. Now we have a better system. Our first line is the Regular Army. In the Civil War that little Regular Army was depleted of its officers and got few enlistments, so that it was hard to keep it up even to an ordinary size. It did its duty well all through, but it did not count much, because it was so small, although Sykes's Regulars saved Gettysburg.

We have changed all that. I had the honor—and I feel proud of the fact—to have introduced the first bill allowing each company of the Regular Army to be doubled in time of war. That bill was not passed then, but during the Spanish War we passed that proposition. (Act Apr. 26, 1898, sec. 2.)

I sometimes wish that we had passed the other section of my bill which allowed the Regular Army to be recruited by localities and to bear upon the banners of its regiments the legend: "Recruited in such and such a State," so that the men once recruited would not dare desert because they dared not go home to a State that would be proud of its own regiment.

Our Regular Army can now be expanded under the national defense act; 150,000 men can be added to our Army, which lately was only about 62,000, but is now 137,000 men. With 150,000 more it will be 287,000 men. There is where we want recruits first, because they can be trained quickest there, with good officers and good equipment; good noncommissioned officers and comrades who can teach them their work within three months with intensive training.

WILL VOLUNTEERING BE SUFFICIENT?

That training can not be given in less than double that time in the National Guard, even in the forces that have been on the border. It will take one or two years with the new 500,000 who are to be called out by this bill. The Regular Army of nearly 300,000 men can be first put in the field—if we can get the men. We need that first corps. Will the people enlist by the volunteer system in the Regular Army to the number of 150,000 more? Our experience does not seem to promise it.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has put in the hearings, on page 26, a statement from a Topeka paper that the Topekans are ready to enlist to go to Europe right away to fight, but they will not go into the Regular Army for training.

NOTE.—The following is the reference just made:

Mr. ANTHONY. I have a newspaper from home, the Topeka Capital, and I want to read to you the headlines, as coming direct from the people:

"Topekans would go to war only as 'volunteers.' While Army and Navy recruiting offices are swamped with applications, they are not for the 'Regulars.' Desire to see actual fighting. Not a single recruit for the Navy, because for long-term enlistments. Five for the Army."

Then I want to read from the first paragraph:

"The local Army and Navy recruiting offices were swamped with applicants to enlist as volunteers in the first American overseas army to be sent to France in case of actual warfare on Germany, yesterday, although not a single man offered to enlist in the United States Navy for the four-year enlistment and only five offered their services to the Army. All day yesterday the applicants filed into the recruiting offices. At noon a line of men extended from the recruiting desk into the street. It was composed mainly of workingmen, machinists, laborers, and scores of clerks. They were eager to go to France, but refused absolutely to enlist in the Regular Army without some definite enlistment provision which guaranteed their being sent to Europe to fight the Germans. The applicants who wanted places as volunteers all appeared to be desirous of fighting, and it was not because of their lack of patriotism that they refused to join under some other line of service. They declared they wanted to be in the midst of the trouble while it was going on, and to be discharged when it was over. As President Wilson has issued no call for volunteers the local Army recruiting officers could not accommodate the would-be recruits. One young man came from Manhattan yesterday to join as a volunteer. He appeared very much disappointed when the officer told him he could not be received unless he joined as a 'Regular.'"

But all the national forces provided for in this bill must first be trained and its provisions are all for training. The 500,000 must stay here at least a year before they do much else. The National Guard is now having trouble about its enlistments. If the Guard were promptly increased to the full war force they might go in a short time. The Regular Army, if increased right away, might go, and might go promptly with men and officers to find out and practice the conditions of foreign warfare in the field and be able to send trained officers home and teach the rest.

During the Civil War it took us three or four years to find out that we must not form new units, but have recruiting stations and fill up the old units, and that a veteran regiment was worth three green regiments. We must fill up existing forces.

We must learn this lesson now at the beginning and not at the end. Our first line is the Regulars. Our second line is the National Guard. Our third line consists of men in training camps, and back of the Regulars and the National Guard will be a camp of 100,000 for recruiting Regulars and another of probably 150,000 for recruiting the National Guard. The question is whether all these men can be provided immediately by the volunteer system. They are not going to the front right away. Is it true, as stated in the Topeka newspaper, that nobody can be got to volunteer unless they think they are going to the front, as New Jersey regiments in 1862 went out so as to get into the Battle of Antietam within two weeks after they had left their homes—boys who knew nothing about war. We can not let this be done now.

CIVIL WAR EXPERIENCE; VOLUNTEERING AND THE DRAFT.

This bill provides how these forces are to be raised. I am glad that we should try in the Regulars and the National Guard to recruit them by volunteering. It is doubtful whether we can. The adjutant generals think new regiments and new units can be had. They do not say whether we can fill up the Regulars or the National Guard. Experience will decide. But we want an army right away, and we must get the men by enforcing the universal obligation of the citizen in such a crisis as this. We have never tried this method fairly. During the first year and a quarter of the Civil War there were plenty of volunteers. In the summer of 1862 we did not get enough. Our great President drafted the militia for nine months, and ninth months' regiments went out. In September or October, 1862, we still sent regiments which were real volunteer regiments, who went for patriotism and not for bounty. But in March, 1863, before they came back, the first so-called conscription act was passed. That act, however, provided that any man who was drafted could pay $300 and be excused, or could find a substitute. The money provision did not work, and in July, 1864, a new act omitted that provision, but allowed the drafted man to find a substitute, and in both those acts there was no draft if the district filled its quota by volunteering. That is what some men ask us to do now, to try volunteering and the draft together. The result was disastrous. While many good men accepted the bounty and volunteered, others were not of that class. Towns, counties, districts, and States bought hirelings, citizens or not citizens; and instead of the draft being a call upon the citizen to do his duty to his country, it was simply a suggestion that somebody should be bought to go in his place. Local and State bounties ran up to $1,500. There were bounty brokers and bounty jumpers. They tell us that all the forces of the Union except about 60,000 were got by volunteering, but it was largely by that sort of volunteering, a volunteering that sent men to the old regiments whom the older men would hardly associate with because they were hirelings and "cared not for the sheep."

Real conscription is a different thing. I do not like the word, but if there is no buying of a substitute and no bounty, and you or I or anyone else is asked to do, not jury duty but military duty for his country, he will do his duty as a man. But if he is allowed to say, "I can hire somebody else," a different service will result.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what we need now is speed. We can talk as we please about the great exigencies of the Civil War. The exigency was no greater then than it is now. What are they doing in Russia? What is going on on the western front? You may ask the condition of food supplies in Italy and England; yes; and here, too. The people do not realize that we are in the presence of war, and that our defense now, whatever it was three weeks ago, lies on the lines in France where support may have to be given, where the French now say they are out of men, and that they need reinforcements.

In 1863, when the governor of New Jersey asked President Lincoln to postpone the draft so that he could raise men, the President wrote back: "For 20 or possibly 30 days." And when Gov. Seymour asked that the draft should be postponed until the constitutionality of the law should be decided, President Lincoln replied:

I do not object to abide a decision of the United States Supreme Court, or of the judges thereof, on the constitutionality of the draft law. In fact, I should be willing to facilitate the obtaining of it, but I can not consent to lose the time while it is being obtained. We are contending with an enemy, who, as I understand, drives every able-bodied man he can reach into his ranks, very much as a butcher drives bullocks into a slaughter pen. No time is wasted, no argument is used. This produces an army which will soon turn upon our now victorious soldiers, already in the field, if they shall not be sustained by recruits as they should be. It produces an army with a rapidity not to be matched on our side, if we first waste time to reexperiment with the volunteer system already deemed by Congress, and palpably, in fact, so far exhausted as to be inadequate, and then more time to obtain a court decision as to whether a law is constitutional which requires a part of those not now in the service to go to the aid of those who are already in it, and still more time to determine with absolute certainty that we get those who are to go in the precisely legal proportion to those who are not to go. My purpose is to be in my action just and constitutional, and yet practical, in performing the important duty with which I am charged, of maintaining the unity and the free principles of our common country.

Your obedient servant, A. LINCOLN.

[Applause.]

THE QUESTION OF AGE.

This bill also is attacked on matters of detail. It is objected that the young are asked for. Well, if they were volunteers, they would be the young. If the country wants men who usually are not wedded and who have no dependents, it will take the young. If it wants men who have not made their way in the trades and professions, and are not essential there, take the young. If it wants to follow the example of every Government over the world in military training, take the young. Our policy now is to train an army, for we can not send it out when it is not trained. If this Congress wants to follow our own precedents, I believe it was in 1792 that we passed a militia act, in the administration of George Washington, which made it necessary to enroll every man from 18 to 45 in the militia for the purpose of suppressing insurrection or repelling invasion; and George Washington called out that militia, consisting largely of boys of 18, to go and put down the Shay rebellion. If you want precedent for a call of the people, well and good. If you want to excuse certain classes, well and good. I do not much admire the wheel with its draft. It is luck. It is a better idea that they have abroad of saying that every citizen is liable, and all are enrolled. Then they call out classes by age, beginning first at 20 and 21 and 22, and going up, I believe, to 35 if unmarried, and going down then to 19 and 18, and then taking the married and those who are otherwise excused. A universal obligation of that sort is better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I ask for five minutes more?

Mr. LUNN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

MODERN WARFARE—THE ATTACK.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are to meet modern warfare, of which our Army knows nothing, officers as well. To understand modern warfare you must go to a field in France and see before you an open plain, with aeroplanes flying over it taking photographs, showing lines on lines of the enemy trenches, in a little film which is enlarged upon a screen, new photographs being taken day by day to see what new work has been done. The enlarged photograph is plotted into squares and put into maps, which are given to the artillery. Over that plain are barbed-wire entanglements made of quarter-inch square iron and steel rods, and trenches, and those are blown up by trench mortars, throwing bombs of high explosives from 13 inches down to 3 inches in diameter, with a stick fastened to the bomb which goes into a small mortar. Wings are attached to feather the bomb, so that it falls on its head and explodes. After that has been done the attack forms, such an attack as no army has ever seen before, with such a coordination of artillery and aeroplanes and men. The front line of men, 5 yards apart, in skirmish line, carry nothing but grenades so arranged that when they are thrown the fuse is lighted by a spring and the grenade explodes seven seconds afterwards. One out of every 8 or 10 men has an automatic gun firing 20 or 30 shots, and he is followed on either side by a man carrying ammunition. Back 10 yards is another line of men scattered in the same way—none close to one another—another line carrying rifles, and on each rifle is a basket holding a rifle grenade. When the rifle is fired the bullet goes through a hole in the grenade, the gases light the fuse, throwing the grenade 200 yards, and it goes off in the same way.

In the third line are trench cleaners who carry only bayonets, pistols, and grenades to clean out the trenches when they get there.

I get this not from the books but from a man who has seen it. They train and practice in camps near the front where they can have the man from the trenches to tell them what to do.

[Here the hammer fell, and under leave to extend, Mr. PARKER submits the following:]

These three lines constitute the first wave, and 100 yards or so behind follows the second wave, composed of skirmishers carrying rifles, in two lines.

Some 200 yards behind them are the reserves in line of squad columns; that is to say, the squad of 12 to 16 men is put in file and the other squads of the same company in like files, with other companies in columns of squads in the same order alongside of them.

All this makes the attacking force which is preceded at a distance of about 100 yards, or as near as is consistent with safety, by a curtain or barrage of bursting shrapnel, thrown by the light artillery, which is a kilo or two behind. The whole force advances at a slow pace of 50 meters to the minute, and the curtain of fire advances in the same way. Meanwhile, other artillery are bombarding the position which is to be captured, and the enemy's heavy artillery in the rear is attacked by the big guns, which are also a good way back of the attacking party.

All this attack is taken care of by aeros, which are either infantry aeros, artillery aeros, or battle aeros. There is a fourth class composed of large, slow machines for throwing bombs, but they are not generally used with this sort of attack. The infantry and artillery aeros are of medium size and speed and carry a pilot and an observer, as well as one or two machine guns, which are used if necessary. The battle aeros are of the very smallest and swiftest kind, carrying but one man, at great speed, which, in the Nieuport, is about 160 kilos an hour and in the new Spad about 200. New ones are being tried that may be even faster.

In the attack the infantry aeros are with the troops. They may go to a distance to find out what the enemy is doing, but they circle about and return to the line of attack, so as to keep the infantry informed as to what is before them and in touch with the troops alongside. They give ordinary signals by light balls, somewhat like a Roman candle but much brighter, so as to be seen by day, and the number of balls, according to no fixed rule, but as agreed, will signal to stop, or advance, or stop and wait till you get in touch, or other information as arranged. If they wish to give a more complicated message, as for instance, that the enemy is in force at a certain place, they will fly low over the troops and drop a letter attached to a red flag to the infantry. In one battle such a message enabled the attack to surround and capture the defending forces.

Communication with the commanding officer from the attacking lines is a matter of some difficulty. It is done by telephone, when the wires are not cut by the artillery fire, or it may be by flags, flashes, or other signals, or it may be impossible except by messenger.

Artillery aeros are more independent. They go forward over the enemy's lines, as well as they can safely. After observing they communicate with their own artillery by wireless. The country is all mapped into squares, and they signal that the fire is going beyond or short of a certain square, that part of the curtain of fire needs to be advanced, that an enemy's battery has just opened or has been put out of business, or as the case may be.

The battle aeros are the lightest and swiftest of all and carry only one man. The gun is fixed to the aero and points directly forward. With the French it used to be the Lewis gun, and fired above the propeller, but this was found inconvenient to reload and not a very firm or good position, and a Vickers-Maxim gun was adopted, which is heavier and fires through the circle of the propeller, being so arranged that when the operator pulls the trigger it only goes off after the propeller blade has passed the line of fire. They were changing the Lewis gun to the Vickers gun when somebody suggested that they might have both, and some do carry both. The Lewis only fires a small number of shots, but the Vickers will fire 250, or even 500, one after every revolution of the propeller, which is often 1,200 to the minute. The attack of these small machines is direct, as they can only shoot in the direction that they are going.

Specimens of all these various aeros and other machinery have got to this country, but it would take us a year or so to duplicate the wonderful engines they carry, except that one of the best is about to be made here.

Each sort of aero needs different management and schooling. Some of our Americans already understand it. We have Americans abroad that understand all sorts of aeros, and I hope more will go for instruction. Some raiding is done by night, but it is so easy to light up No Man's Land at night that it is usually only patrolled by listeners, who give the signal if any attack is attempted.

In a book called "Germany Within the Lines," by Swope, the section as to air battle is interesting. The most successful German fighter did not do any diving, but relied on superior speed to enable him to get behind his enemy and follow him up until he shot him down. What is perhaps most thrilling is the speed with which the corkscrew descent or vrille is performed.

AFTER TRAINING HERE FINAL SCHOOLING MUST BE AT THE FRONT.

All this is modern warfare. It can be learned only where it is carried on. The weapons and their use and their coordination are all new. We must make those weapons, be it grenades, heavy field guns, trench mortars, rifle grenades, air planes of the best and their attachments. Their use needs special training.

The English send officers on "Cook's tours" to the front for a few months to learn this warfare. The French give the command of their new regiments to officers who are convalescing from wounds or sickness. Both nations maintain camps near the front where the troops spend their last few months of training in practicing the modern warfare, and especially the attack, or, as the English call it, the "show." There are grenade and bombing schools and machine-gun schools. Warfare has been revolutionized. War is the only school of war. We must train our troops with speed, and send the best where they can become veterans and come and teach the rest. The war is upon us. Let us stand up to it as men, and let deeds, not words, speak for us. The lines of the national defense are the battle lines of France.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN].

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Chairman, Polonius, speaking to Laertes, gave him some words of advice by which we might all to-day profit. The words are these: "Beware of entrance to a quarrel, but, being in, bear 't that the opposed may beware of thee." None of us like war, none of us have sought war, but being in, it is our imperative duty to so bear it that our opponents may beware of us. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us as legislators to enact such laws as will provide for the country, in the quickest time possible, the best and most effective force that can be procured in order that we may prosecute this war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

This committee may make the maximum of the selective-draft provision any age it sees fit, but I am opposed to conscripting minors—boys under 21 years of age—for foreign military service. I should not oppose in ordinary times the compulsory military service of youth of this age under regulations which have been found to be desirable in foreign countries, because I can imagine conditions arising out of post-bellum necessities under which it would be expedient to have reserves of well-trained and effective military forces amply equipped with the arms and munitions of war. But we are facing a different condition to-day, Mr. Chairman. The most effective fighting male unit is a free agent. Some men fight naturally from love of fighting. Alexanders and Napoleons in embryo are rare, thank God, in a country enjoying the blessings of free institutions. Some men fight for love of their own country; others from hate or resentment due to injuries from the people of other countries. But sentiments of patriotism in actual warfare are soon merged into the mere lust of killing. Manslaughter is man's work, or perhaps I should rather say the devil's work; and manslaughter is no child's game. A boy under 21 is still a child in the eye of the law. There is a physiological and psychological reason for this age limit, which at 21 gives an American youth the ballot and relieves him from parental control. Until a boy's muscles are hardened into the bone and sinew of manhood his mind is generally plastic, susceptible, full of vain fancies and immature impressions.

Mr. Chairman, I grant you that the experiences of our Civil War will show in its closing year whole regiments made up of beardless youths, led sometimes by captains in their teens; but this fact proves nothing except the folly of forcing the youth of our land under 21 into the greatest war in history—a war waged in foreign lands, under conditions which do not characterize the end of the Civil War at home in any way analogous. In 1864 and 1865 the women of the Confederacy as well as the mothers of the North sacrificed what was left to them upon the altar of their country. It was a last supreme sacrifice. It was made in defense of invaded homes; it was made to settle purely domestic problems and grievances. When Judah and Benjamin had died for such ideals, the god of war, and many times the angel of death, demanded and took Joseph. And in how many homes of this country half a century ago, Mr. Chairman, went up the cry of David, "Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

The youth of this free country are its most cherished and prized possessions. Boy or girl, they are equal in mind, body, or estate to the flower of any country on God's footstool. Indeed, I go further; I claim for them a greater heritage, a diviner essence, a certain pure bloom and fragrance—and here I speak of our boys and girls—which distinguish them, in quality at least, from the youth of the Old World. I would not labor this point. I would not detract from the luster of those examples of young manhood who have given the last measure of their devotion to their beloved country. But other countries, other customs. Europe has its human canons, standards, privileges, and immunities which have not yet become the fixed possessions of the youth of America. After nearly three years of fratricidal war human life is less sacred. After fighting side by side with savages from every continent and island of his far-flung possessions, do you think the English lad is the same to-day as he was in 1913?

And this consideration aside for a moment, Mr. Chairman and members of this Committee, do you know that the morals of the European boy, no matter how carefully bred, are different from standards set up and exacted in American homes by American parents in our God-fearing communities. Woman is differently regarded over there among the masses of the people. This is evidenced by the literature of continental countries, by the newspapers and periodicals and their illustrations, in which the relations of the two sexes are treated in the grossest and, to our thinking, their most objectionable light. Coeducation after a certain age is entirely unknown in Europe, therefore the free and friendly association of their youth is impossible. Do we want our boys to be sent to Europe to acquire those ideals and manners? Yet how shall an impressionable boy under 21, away from his home, exposed to the subtle influences, the talk of the trench, the jest of the barracks, the daily and nightly contact with the soldiers of these warring countries—how, I ask, shall he escape contamination?

I am speaking now of moral influences. We have in this country such an observance as the Christian Sabbath. To the continental soldier all days look alike. To the continental soldier, especially in this hell of war, there are no saints' days, no saints, nor sacred things. To kill is their trade, and, in the intervals of manslaughter, in their brief furloughs, when they are turned loose in Paris or London, the lusts of the flesh are the gods of their idolatry.

For this worship they must pay, and they do pay. Is it nothing to the mothers and sisters of this country that these boys should return to them, if they return at all, or if unmaimed, unmutilated, in the possession of all their senses, is it nothing, I ask, that they return hopelessly changed. Whither has fled the pure and candid soul, the unsullied mind which once naturally sought communion with the mother's heart? And what of the body? Above and beyond wound inflicted by bayonet, bursting shell or shrapnel, the deadly microbe of the infected trench, the contagion of tuberculosis, tetanus, gas gangrene, typhus, diseases of the ear caused by shell shot, new and tropical diseases of the eye caused by contact with imported mercenaries from Africa, maladies of the brain, in their manifestation horrible to contemplate. Beyond all these, the inevitable sequence of a war is the deadly corruption of the bodies of our youth. Better that they should die abroad than bring to thousands of innocent homes the loathsome contagion of the so-called military diseases.
